

ALLEN COUNTY PUBLIC LIBRARY

3 1833 01742 5742

GENEALOGY
929.102
F91FRI
1881-1882

THE FRIEND.

A

RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOLUME LV.

PHILADELPHIA:

PRINTED BY WILLIAM H. PILE.

1882.

INDEX.

- Address to the members of Brighouse Monthly Meeting. An. 150. 156, 165.
- Adelphi schools. Report of the managers of, for 1881, 275.
- Affliction. On the right way of looking at, 68.
- Africa. Curious superstitions of natives of, 19.
- Notice of the large spread of Mohammedanism among Negroes in, 102.
- Notice of a recent exploration of, accomplished without loss of life, 130, 138.
- Narrative of a missionary of remarkable preservations in Central, 148.
- Notice of the rapid extermination of the elephant in, 159.
- Notice of proposed explorations in, 173.
- Agents for "The Friend," List of, 15.
- Agriculture. On a probable benefit to, by a knowledge of the climatic influences favorable to insects, 342.
- Agricultural fairs. Disapproval of the attendance of, by Methodists, 71.
- Aims in life. Essay entitled, 323.
- Amber. Notice of an artificial, 103.
- Amusements. On the folly of some, in civilized circles, 76.
- Andover Seminary. Notice of a disregard of the Presbyterian creed in the election of a professor, 326.
- Anecdote of President Garfield, 12; Daniel Webster, 29; Bishop James, 200; Hugh Miller, 301.
- Animals. On the varying susceptibility of, to poisons, &c., 310.
- Ants. On the habits of leaf-eating, 358.
- On foraging of, Nicaragua, 374.
- Anonymous communications to "The Friend" deprecated, 322.
- Antinomianism. On a subtle spirit of, in the U. States, 333.
- Apprentices' leap. Extract entitled The, 317.
- Arctic cold, and how to endure it, 242.
- Flowers. Observations on, 246.
- "Asia Hip" Nantucket. Notice of the, 199.
- Assassin. Comments on a remark of a recent, that he was not afraid to die, 147.
- Astronomical prizes offered in the U. States, 334.
- Atmosphere. On the power of the, to absorb moisture, 286.
- Australia. Notice of the atrocious treatment of the natives of, by British colonists, 405.
- Remarks on the desolate character of the interior of, 406.
- Backhouse James. Account by, of the conviction of a criminal in San Dieman's land, 357.
- Account by, of the nature of his religious labors, 357.
- Backbiters and concealed people. Advice of William Penn to avoid, 50.
- Babylon—a mixture. Essay entitled, 70.
- Baptism with water not a command of Christ, 371.
- Baptists. Notice of proceedings of German, 13.
- Declarations of, respecting spiritual religion, 111.
- Barclay Robert, "The Apologist." Delineation of the character of, 26.
- Letter of George Fox to the widow of, and comments, 34.
- Observations of, on not reading the Bible in meetings for worship, 213.
- Barclay John. On the danger of a worldly spirit by, 140.
- Barker Joseph, a converted infidel. Declarations of, 98.
- "Be not faithless, but believing." Essay entitled, 346.
- Beacons. Remarks on the rise and progress of, among Friends, 195.
- Bees observed not to injure ripe fruit, 63.
- Beat my sheep. Remarks on speaking the Truth in love entitled, 182.
- "Beginning the day right." Essay entitled, 290.
- Benevolence. On the pleasures of active, 258.
- Betrayer betrayed. Remarks on the wages of sin entitled, The, 182.
- Bible Association of Friends in America. Circular of, 85, 92.
- Bird. Account of the honey, 51.
- Anecdotes of the display of kindness in a, 111.
- On the habits of the crow black, 254.
- Observations on the flight of, 350.
- Birds. On the foresight of, 127.
- On the migration of, as observed by keepers of light-houses on the Atlantic coast, 330.
- Blessings sent by differently gifted servants, 177.
- Book notices, &c. Geikie's Life and Words of Christ, 33.
- Temperance Lesson Book by Dr. B. W. Richardson, 118.
- Book notices, &c. Fifty-second Report of Bible Association of Friends in America, 159.
- "The Freedmen's Friend," 159.
- First Annual Report of The Friends' Institute for Young Men, 159.
- The Day star, 160.
- Printed Minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting (smaller body), 160.
- George Fox and his Salvation Army, 200 years ago, 191.
- "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," 191.
- Address on Christian Ministry by William Pollard, 207.
- Notice of the Forty-ninth Annual Report of the Penna. Institution for the Instruction of the Blind, 230.
- Annual Report of Friends' Free Library and Reading Room, Germantown, Phila., 263.
- "The Council Fire and Arbitrator," 271.
- An Address on some growing evils of the day, especially demoralizing literature and art. By the Representatives of the Religious Society of Friends, &c., 279.
- "Views of Christian Doctrine held by the Religious Society of Friends," 287.
- Eighth Annual Report of the State Hospital for Women and Infants, 327.
- "The Traffic in and the use of Opium," 327.
- George Fox, his life, sufferings and death," 344.
- "A Smaller History of the United States," by Josiah W. Leeds, 351.
- "The Outlook," 391.
- "Our ancestors," 399.
- "Wanderings south and east," 405.
- "Into the Sunshine," 408.
- The Narragansett Historical Register, 415.
- Books. On the proper choice of the we read, 13.
- "Bondage of sin." Essay entitled, 43.
- Boys. On fitting to go where most needed, 230.
- Borneo. Unsuccessful attempt to discover tailed men in, 215.
- Botanical excursion to the Pine barrens of New Jersey. Account of a, 362.
- Botanical excursion to Hammonett, N. J. Account of a, 401, 409.
- Bread. On the making and eating of, in Syria, 126.
- Bread and wine as an ordinance, inconsistent with the gospel dispensation, The, 371.
- Bricks. On the cause of the light color of certain burned, 254.
- British Museum. Account of the library and reading room of the, 321.
- Brown Phoebe H., the poetess. Account of, 364.
- Bundy Walter T. Account of the last illness and expressions of, 329.
- Business. On the dangers of a too intense application to, to a growth in grace, 140.
- On the obligations of Christians, and the advice of Friends respecting hazardous or speculative, 213.
- On the uprightness of early Friends in, 325.
- Remarks on honesty in, 354.
- Butter-producing cow. Notice of a, 190.
- Butterfly. An instructive comparison between the, and the soul of man, 187.
- California. Notice of large pumpkins grown in, 159.
- Observations made during a recent visit to, 186.
194. 204. 211. 217. 226. 252.
- Calumnies in danger. Incident of, 278.
- Carnfield Francis. A testimony to the Truth by, in 1693, 25.
- Camm Thomas. Comments on the character and death of, 31.
- Camp meetings. Observations on the frequent injuries results attending, 54.
- Canal. Account of a pleasure excursion by, in Pa., 2, 9.
- Carthage. A visit to the ruined cisterns ancient, 373.
- Callid Mary, the wife of John Newton. Notice of, 37.
- Capper Mary. Remarks on the religious character and services of, 350.
- Charlesworth Maria L. Anecdote showing moral courage of, 244.
- Charrington Fred. N. The moral course of, in declining an interest in his father's brewery, 53.
- Children. On the safe rule for the management of, 124.
- On the danger to, of evil associates, 188.
- On caring for the health of, 246.
- On the playthings of, 278.
- Notice of the preservation of lost, in the Indian Territory, 286.
- Children. On the injury done to, by vicious literature, 294, 406.
- On bearing with annoyances from, 302.
- Of Friends. Remarks on the visitations of Divine grace to, 316.
- On evil reading for, 330, 406.
- Hard words on the management of, 332.
- Anecdote for, entitled Telling Mother, 333.
- Observations on defective hearing in, 342.
- Instrumental in strengthening the hands of the Lord's servants, 394.
- A large number of, indicted as criminals, and executed, 406.
- Chimborazo. Account of the ascent of, 20.
- China. On the number of deaths from the use of opium in, 30.
- Remarks of a statesman of, on the opium trade, 60.
- On the remarkable career of a colored man, S. A. Butler, in, 83.
- Religious equality granted by, to foreigners, 102.
- Notice of a new treaty made by the U. S. Commissioners with, providing against the opium of, 102.
- Notice of the identification of criminals in, by the thumb, 127.
- The opium trade the greatest obstacle to the progress of Christianity in, 158.
- Animal versions on proposed legislation to prohibit emigration from, 171.
- Notice of a mode of burial formerly used in, 326.
- Notice of the efforts of Roman Catholics in, 334.
- Primitive methods of manufacturing in, identical with those in other lands, 412.
- Chinese in California. Official statement of the healthy and cleanly condition of the, 353.
- Comments of The London Spectator on the attitude of the U. States towards the, 395.
- Christian professors in league with the spirit of the world, On, 3.
- On the part which a true, should not take in parties, 67.
- Humility. On the necessity of, in moderating the pursuit of human learning, 95.
- On seasons of spiritual want in the experience of the, 112.
- example will have an influence, A, 175.
- Facility of support in danger. Instance of, 278.
- Christians. A Jewish sermon to, 246.
- Worldly, unhappy, 46.
- The inexpediency for, of a showy house, 414.
- Christ. Those that really believe in, receive power to withstand evil, 25.
- On the benefits in a humanitarian aspect of the teachings of, 3.
- On the expectation of the Jews in regard to the coming of, 41.
- On the legal righteousness of the Jews at the coming of, 49.
- Must be known by his inward operations in the soul, 53, 259.
- On the light of Christ in the soul, 82.
- A belief in the light of, a fundamental doctrine of Friends, 157.
- Comments on the above, 186.
- Remarks on the delusion of trusting solely to the death of, without seeking Divine help to keep the precepts of, 182.
- The government of our lives to be by, 219.
- On the necessity of waiting for, 294.
- On confessing, 301.
- On the necessity of believing in the presence and operation of, in our hearts individually, 346.
- On the folly of trusting to the finished work of, without repentance, 388.
- Christianity. Observations on the progress of, 341.
- Church. On membership in the, 52.
- Definition of, as, by William Penn, and comments, 188.
- On checking the spread of worldliness in the, 262.
- Church debts. Notice of the lessening of, in and near Philadelphia, 407.
- Clarke Adam. Testimony of, against music in places of worship, 407.
- Clay. Method of purifying, by the electro magnet, 215.
- Clifton Sanitarium. Notice of the gift of, for benevolence purposes, 102.
- Coal-dust shown to promote the explosion of fire-damp in galleries, 149.
- Colorado. Extracts from recent letters descriptive of scenery, &c., in, 173.

- impression on solids. Effects of powerful, 335.
 influence and safety. On the distinction between, 100.
 chineal. On the collection and use of, 6.
 munition with the Lord in spirit. On the necessity of continual, 86.
 inscience. Notice of a recent imprisonment for, in 1835, 29.
 Remarks on a tender, 79.
 smetic. Carbonate of lead found in a poisonous, 14.
 rk. On the growth and collection of, 30.
 topaxi. Account of a recent ascent of, 26.
 tion. Notice of the manufacture of raw, into wear-after appeared in a single day, 130.
 emplacency may endear to the world. Essay entitled, 370.
 aversion. Remarks on the proper introduction of religious subjects in, 135.
 On faithfully carrying out our convictions in, 370.
 opal. On the source of supply of, 167.
 pe Samuel. Notice of religious exercises of, 163. 171.
 time and sensational literature. Observations on the connection between, 190. 330.
 time. On the duty of turning away from thoughts of, 252.
 treedle. Adventures with a, in Lake Tanganyika, 140. vossfeld Jane. Copy of a certificate of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia concerning the religious labors of, in 1761, 335.
 vinal. Notice of a collection in a converted, 322.
 account of the death of a, in prison, 341.
 Experience of a, in abandoning intemperance, 367.
 ward. On the use of the, in early times, 340.
 upmark. On the origin of the word, &c., 86.
 amascus altar. The, 299.
 anction rebuked by Presbyterians, 238.
 rebuked by Methodists, 240.
 ancing manual relinquishes his profession from conviction, 246.
 eaths.—Mary Allen, 192; Josiah Allen, 356; Jacob Aldridge, 156; Mary Bartlett, 80; Mary P. Balderson, 144; Anna G. Brinton, 144; Rebecca L.
 Bowne, 160; Lemuel Brackin, 272; Sarah S. Bacon, 238; Levi Boulton, 328; William H. Bueon, 328;
 Eliza B. Boyce, 322; Ellis Branson, 408; Ann W.
 Comfort, 367; Jane S. Comfort, 64; Benjamin H.
 Costes, M. D., 104; Elizabeth B. Comfort, 184; Mercy Comfort, 143; Samuel Craft, 216; Mary F. Collins, 224; Clayton Collins, 288; Margaret Coulson, 352; Isaac Childs, 352; Thomas Cornwell, 360; Sarah
 A. Deacon, 112; Hannah G. Davis, 144; Benjamin
 Dickinson, 286; Tyndal Embree, 140; Abigail P.
 Elfric, 285; Maria H. Eldridge, 222; Phoebe Ann
 Edmundson, 240; Rebecca K. Embree, 240; Joseph Eldridge, 392; Hannah Flanagan, 184; Eliza P.
 Gurney, 144; William Gidley, 208; Rachel Green,
 266; Caleb Gregg, 304; Patience Garrett, 376; Sarah
 T. Harry, 48; Richard Hall, 124; Thomas Hutchinson, 192; Robert W. Hodson, 240; Samuel C. Hart, 240; Caleb P. Haines, 243; Elizabeth W. Hoopes,
 272; David Hodgson, 288; Margaret H. Hilles, 304;
 Martha B. Haines, 304; Jane Jones, 256; Elizabeth
 Kiteley, 200, 216; Robert R. Levick, 264; Sidney
 Ann Lewis, 288; Lucy A. Lippincott, 394; Phoebe
 L. Jones, 80; Walker, 182; Rebecca A. Pennell, 244.
 Elizabeth G. Price, 280; Elizabeth Pierson, 288;
 William A. Palmer, 320; Rebecca J. Potts, 328;
 Rachel H. Roberts, 16; Jonathan Richards, 248;
 Mary Raley, 328; Hannah W. Richardson, 328;
 Allen Roberts, 344; Hannah Roberts, 394; Richard
 H. Roberts, 192; Rebecca A. Pennell, 244.
 Lydia Ann Smith, 104; Unity Stratton, 128; Chakley Stokes, 168; William Smedley, 200; Thomas Satterthwaite,
 224; Rebecca W. Smith, 224; John E. Sheppard, 248;
 Rebecca Shinn, 264; John H. Stanley, 272; Elizabeth Stroud, 272; Elizabeth W. Smith, 328; Deborah
 W. Thomas, 200; Joseph R. Whitacre, 280; Cyrus Simmons, 360; Charles L. Sharpless, 408; Eudiah C.
 Thompson, 280; Hannah Thomson, 304; Benjamin
 Wiggins, 88; John J. Woolman, 136; Mary Willets, 144; Lydia S. Wills, 160; Elizabeth Williams, 184;
 Ruth R. Williams, 184; Samuel Whitall, M. D., 280; Joseph R. Whitacre, 280; Joseph R. Whitacre, 280; Hannah Woolman, 312; Anna Walton, 408;
 Thomas Yarnall, 328.
 Deacon Sarah A. Notice of the sudden death and character of, 129.
 Deafness. A curious case of partial, 30.
 Dead. Testimony of Hendrick B. Wright against wearing mourning for the, 350, 398.
 Death's solemn summons. Essay entitled, 75.
 Dewees Rebecca. Extracts from the, 177. 185.
 183. 201. 209. 217. 225. 233. 241. 243.
 Comments on the above, 183, 202, 204.
 Dickinson James. Notice of the appearance of, in the ministry in early life, 413.
 Divine nature. On the danger of speculative inquiries respecting the, 367.
 Dogs. A trap for sheep-killing, 223.
 Anecdotes of sagacity in, 333. 413.
 "Draw night into God." Essay entitled, 331.
 Dress. Display in, at places of worship a hindrance to the spread of the gospel, 29.
 Parents sometimes led by their children to a worldly conformity in, 151.
 Remarks on a protest against certain articles of,
 by women in England, 259.
 Outward adorning in, inconsistent with a profession of Christ, 299.
 Dudley Elizabeth. Extract from the Journal of, 190.
 Dunkers or German Baptists. Account of the, 167.
 Notice of a free ministry among, 374.
 Ear. Observations on, in the children, 342.
 Removal of insects from the, by light, 343.
 Earth. The agency of the, believed to be in continual movement, 238.
 The density of the, 238.
 The motion of the surface of, in Patagonia, 238.
 Earthquake in New Zealand. Notice of a recent, 78.
 Earth-worms. On the formation of vegetable mould by the agency of, 190. 236.
 Easter pilgrimages in the East, 349.
 Editorial.—On the commencement of a new volume, 7;
 Comments on passages omitted in the New Revision of the Testament, 7; On the unprofitableness of formal prayers, 15, 63; the dependence upon sacred preaching and the danger of teaching a weakness in most of the Christian professors at this day, 23; On the character of Thomas Caim, and on avoiding panegyric in the praise of men, 31; Appeal for aid for the Sanitarium Association of Philadelphia, 47;
 On the death of President Garfield, 55; Comments on some of the Christian Worker upon editorial remarks in this Journal on formal prayers, 63;
 Remarks on the danger to Friends of an undue pre-of intellectual knowledge and of riches, 71;
 Notice of a contribution entitled "Western Friends in Court," 72; Notice of the proceedings of the Iowa Yearly Meeting, 103; Reasons for the non-conformity by Friends to the customs of the world in wearing mourning apparel, &c., 79; Notice of the Home Catechetic Society, 79; Incentive to faithfulness on the part of the younger members of our Society, 87; On the origin of epistolary correspondence between Yearly Meetings of Friends, 95; Letter from a person recently convinced of our principles, on the departures in principle and practice of the "Progressives," and comments, 103; Explanation of an editorial remark respecting Ohio and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings, 104; Notice of a meeting of Friends in Iowa, 104;
 Notice of the proceedings of the Iowa Yearly Meetings of Western Yearly Meeting (smaller body), 111;
 An incentive to faithfulness, 112; Extract from The British Friend on proceedings in Iowa Yearly Meeting of 1881, and comments, 119; Notice of the proceedings of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, 120; Notice of the proceedings of the Kansas Yearly Meeting (smaller body), 135; Refutation of a false doctrine of unsound doctrine, 135; Notice of false doctrine preached by some under the name of Friends, and comments, 143; On the duty of self-sacrifice in helping the poor, 145; Comments on a circular of the British Association, 143; Remarks on the ministry, and the proper exhortation in it, 151; Notice of the Indian Treaty-keeping and Protective Association, 152; On the extravagance displayed by many at the time called Christmas, 159;
 Notice of the 52nd Report of the Bible Association of Friends, 160; Notice of the labors of "Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philada.," 159;
 Notice of the first Annual Report of the "Friends Institute for Young Men," 159; Notice of "The Day-star," 160; Notice of the printed minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting (the smaller body), 160; Notice of the annual meeting of the Bible Association for temporal and spiritual conduct, 167; Comments on letters describing a recent exodus of freedmen from
 S. Carolina, 175, 207; Notice of proceedings of Kansas Yearly Meeting (larger body), 176; Remarks on the proceedings of a "Home Mission Conference" in

- London, 182, 215; Remarks in reference to war, 183;
 Notice of the memoranda of Rebecca Dewees, 183;
 Remarks on the death and character of Hannah
 Flanagan, 185; Remarks on a pamphlet entitled,
 Georgia, and its Station, 186, 200, 209, 210, 211;
 191; Notice of "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," 191; Remarks on the correctness of a statement copied from a California paper, 191;
 Remarks on the duty of those who vote, 198; Remarks on an address of the Methodist minister, 201;
 William Arner, 207; Remarks on the practice of "hazing" in institutions of learning, 215; On the fundamental errors in doctrine now advocated among Friends, 223; Remarks on the proceedings of a Conference on Education, and doctrines of Friends in regard to qualifications for the ministry, 224; Notice of the 49th Annual Report of the Penna. Institution for the instruction of the Blind, 230; On the proposed Congress for the settlement of international disputes without war, 247; Remarks on the service for Truth resulting from the holding in silence of an appointed meeting for worship, 247; Notice of the Annual Report of Friends' Free Library and Reading Room at Germantown, Phila., 263; Remarks on correct sentiments respecting salvation from sin in an Address to the Alumni of Haverford College, by Sereus Mendall-hall, 265; Remarks on the publication of a Liberator notice in this Journal, 265; Notice of "The Council Fire and Arbitrator," and on the just treatment of the Indians," 271; Animadversions on proposed legislation to prohibit emigration from China, 271; Notice of steps which have been taken to suppress begging in the streets of Philada., 273; Remarks on an address on denormalizing literature, &c., issued by the Meeting for Sufferings, 279; Observations on the Scripture expression "a peculiar people," 287; Notice of the issue of an abridgment of K. Barclay's Apology, entitled "Views of Christian Doctrine," &c., 287;
 Remarks on the approach of the Yearly Meeting, 287;
 Remarks on the departure from the principles of Friends in the "Home Mission" movement, 295.
 327; Notice of the proceedings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, 302; Remarks in reference to Hugh Judge and to Job Scott's Essay on Salvation by Christ, 311;
 Remarks on a suggested contribution to the Yearly Meeting in reference to Ohio Yearly Meeting, 319.
 335. 343; On the unhappy condition of Ireland,
 337; Observations on anonymous contributions, 327;
 Notice of the 8th Annual Report of the Sanitary for Women, 327; Notice of "The Traffic and the use of Opium," issued by the Representatives of N. E. Yearly Meeting (larger body), 327; Notice of the 63th Annual Report of the Managers of the Frankford Asylum, 327; Remarks on the reading of certificates of ministers' names, 327; On the meeting of Friends, and on subscribers, 330; Remarks in reference to Ohio Yearly Meeting, 343; On being watchful and lively in spirit, 344; Notice of a pamphlet entitled "George Fox, his life, sufferings and death," 344; Correction in regard to the authorship of "Via Solitaria," 344; Remarks on the differences in the gifts and labors of Friends in the Church, as exemplified in the religious labors of Sarah Grubb and Mary Coper, 350; Remarks on the expression
 "the eye of a needle" and on the possession of wealth, 351; Notice of "A Smaller History of the United States, &c., by Josiah W. Leeds," 351; Remarks on recent strikes of Iron-works, &c., on the effect, and on the importance of the application of Christian principles in settling disputes between labor and capital, 351; On rightly profiting by seasons of depression or sadness, 355; Observations on the dangers of violent athletic exercises, 367; Notice of the proceedings of London Yearly Meeting, 1882, 399; Notice on a selected article entitled "Selling Cream," 370; Remarks on the visit to the meetings and members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, by a committee of that body, 383; On the usefulness which invalids may be of to those around them, 391; Notice of The Outlook, 391; Remarks on the war in Egypt, 397; Notice of "Our Ancestors," 399; Notice to a correspondent, 400; Remarks on the spread of the religious principles held by Friends, in the world, 407; Comments on the inconsistency of membership in secret societies, as Free Masons, &c., with the practices of Friends, 408; On the testimony of Friends against the observance of public fasts and so-called "Holidays," 415; Notice of the Narragansett Historical Register, 415.
 Editors. Observations on the great responsibility of,
 Education. Considerations on preserving the health, in connection with, 340.

- Egg-gathering on the English coast, 162.
 Egypt. Notice of an important discovery of royal mummies, in, 62.
 Remarks on the abolition of slavery by, and the noble purposes of the present Kheivee of, 290.
 Notice of an herbarium of the flowers of ancient, 318.
 Remarks on the present war in, 399.
 Electric light, recommended for use in collieries, The, 118.
 said to be preferable to gas for the eyes, 142.
 machines. Serious accidents from, 230.
 bell used in measuring conscripts, 244.
 Elephant's milk. On the character of, 39.
 Elkinton Joseph. Letter of, 161.
 Ellis Mercy. Testimony of Muncy Monthly Meeting concerning, 153.
 Notice of the character and services of, 227.
 Enemies. On deriving benefit from the allegations of, 387.
 England. Notice of the sympathy of, with America, 5.
 Notice of the circumstances attending the return of Jews to, in 1655, 286.
 England and Wales. Statistics of the attendance at places of worship in, 5.
 England. Church of, Notice of the money value of certain "livings" in, the, 22.
 Episcopal church. The disestablishment of, in Ceylon announced, 33.
 The disestablishment of, in Scotland proposed, 94.
 regarded by many of its members as a branch of the church of Rome, 118.
 Views of Spurgeon on the immediate necessity for the disestablishment of the, in England, 142.
 account of boy bishops in the, 174.
 clergyman. Notice of the imprisonment of an, 127.
 Protest against the payment of tithes to, 270.
 in England. On the complicity of, with intemperance, 309.
 Espousal to Christ. Essay entitled, 413.
 Evans Elizabeth. On some of the religious exercises of, 291.
 Evans Ellen. Remarks on the character of, and letters of, 35.
 Evans John. Short account of the character of, and letter of, 73.
 Evans William. Extract from the Journal of, on West Town Boarding School, and comments, 139.
 Evil reading for children. On, 330.
 Eyesight. On the preservation of the, 206.
 Eye stones. On the origin and use of, 87.
 Eyes. On educating the, 340.
 Example. Illustration and remarks on the power of, 34.
 Excessive Dissipation. Essay entitled, 89.
 Excessive struggle for wealth. The, 163.
 Fakir's answer. Extract entitled, The, 193.
 Fashion. Remarks on a protest against the tyranny of, in certain particulars, 259.
 Fashionable dressing and outward adorning inconsistent with a profession of Christ, 260.
 Fasts. Notice of a memorial of Baptists against days for public, 318.
 Fellowship. Essay entitled, 410.
 Fiction. The deleterious effects of, in public and First-school libraries, 50.
 Remarks on shielding the community from the effects of, by public libraries, 263.
 Fires. A vivid picture of the Michigan forest, 154.
 in the New Jersey swamps in 1881. Notice of, 230.
 First day of the week. The feeling of President Garfield in reference to the faithful observance of the, 12.
 Remarks on the proper occupation of the, 89.
 Observations on the pernicious effects of reading newspapers on the, 262.
 Reasons for the increased disregard of public worship on the, 273.
 Notice of the violation of the laws of California, in reference to, by liquor dealers, 326.
 Notice of a periodical issued to advocate the more religious observance of the, 391.
 Fish bait. Worms found on trees used for, in South America, 23.
 plagues. Notice of, in the Gulf of Mexico, 39.
 Notice of a method of capturing, by explosion of gun powder, 63.
 A destructive method of capturing, by a water wheel, 215.
 Fitness of one's place. On the, 155.
 Flanagan Hannah. Reflections at the grave of, 181.
 Observations on the character of, 183.
 Fletcher John. Providential deliverances of, while young, 10.
 Flowers. On the absence of, in tropical countries, 254.
 Flycatchers. On the causes of the bursting of, 14.
 Fog. Yellow glass useful in a, 78.
 Forgiveness. On the blessedness of, 283.
 Fox George. Letter of, on the death of Robert Barclay, 34.
 On the doctrine of the light of Christ in the soul, 157.
 Forest. Notice of an agatized, near Denver, Col., 287.
 France. A recent case of imprisonment for conscience sake in, 30.
 On the evils of the union of church and state in, 214.
 Freedman. Notice of a liberal gift of, a, 14.
 Freedmen. Notice of an exodus of, from S. Carolina, 175, 207.
 Freeman Ann. Extracts from a Memoir of, and comments, 365, 371, 381.
 Friends. Religious communications addressed to, 27.
 43, 54, 60, 75, 82, 106, 114, 115, 122, 131, 138, 140, 166, 178, 187, 197, 202, 219, 226, 234, 237, 243, 255, 258, 266, 269, 275, 282, 284, 291, 294, 306, 314, 315, 316, 323, 331, 333, 346, 355, 363, 364, 370, 380, 387, 388, 406.
 On the present declined state of the Society of, particularly in England, 380, 387.
 Remarks on the testimony of, against hat honor, 17.
 Testimonies to the Truth by some of the early, 25, 53, 58, 100, 109, 117, 123, 133.
 On the duty of, to bring up their children in the fear of the Lord, 34.
 A declaration of the Most High respecting, 51.
 On the reasons for the disuse of singing by, 59, 282.
 On the views of, in relation to set times for vocal prayer, 63.
 The testimony of, against music, 65, 266, 282, 331.
 On the danger to, of an undue pursuit of intellectual knowledge and of riches, 71, 115.
 Reasons for the non-conformity to the customs of the world by, in wearing mourning apparel, &c., 79.
 Incentive to faithfulness on the part of younger members among, 87.
 Remarks on the dangers of First-day schools among, 89, 106.
 of Exeter and Muncy and Catwissa Monthly Meetings, &c., Notes of travel among, &c., 97, 103, 113, 121, 129, 137, 145, 161, 169.
 Letter of a person recently convinced of the principles of, on modern departures from the views and practices of the early, 103.
 Notice of sufferings of, in Pennsylvania, during the Revolutionary war, 105, 113.
 On the error of certain doctrines preached among, 116, 223, 388.
 Testimony of Mildred Ratcliff that the doctrines and testimonies of, would never be suffered to disappear, 119.
 On the steps which have led to the modified doctrines introduced among, and the means of recovery from them, 122.
 Observations on the use of the term "missions" among, 128.
 Notice of false doctrine preached by some under the name of, 143, 390.
 On the views of, in regard to the exercise of the ministry, 145, 231, 255, 282, 355, 406.
 On the spirit which actuated the early, and on modern innovations upon the doctrines and practices of, 150, 156, 165, 346, 354.
 The doctrine of the light of Christ as believed by, 157, 165.
 On endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit among, 166.
 Remarks to, on bearing one another's burdens, 170.
 On the departure from the principles of, in "Home Mission" work in London, 182, 198, 216, 269, 295, 327, 375.
 Religions concern of R. Deewees for the maintenance of our testimonies to plainness of dress, and attendance of mid-week meetings by, 185.
 The cross must be borne by, 186, 406.
 On the danger to, of forsaking the leadings of the Holy Spirit, 187.
 Account of the banishment of seven, in England, in 1664, 189.
 On the rise and progress of Beaconism among, 195.
 Friends. On superfluities in the houses of, 202.
 Notice of departures from the practices and principles of, in the West, 205, 390.
 Heathenish names of the days and months disapproved of by, 206.
 On the doctrines of, respecting the Holy Scriptures, 211.
 On engaging in hazardous or speculative business by, 213.
 Remarks to, on dealing with offenders, 226.
 Notice of a body of people resembling, in Scotland, 238.
 Concessions of, in London, in 1691, against worldly compliance, 254.
 Remarks on obtaining a new meeting-house for, in Philadelphia, 258.
 Remarks on building up the Society of, 267.
 Address to young, on the approach of the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, 277.
 in the West Indies. Notice of the former existence of, 293.
 Testimony of Jas. N. Richardson, in 1847, respecting a true future revival amongst, 306.
 Prophecy of Francis Howgill, in 1662, respecting, and comments, 306.
 of Philadelphia. Notice of a remarkable visitation to, in 1728, 316.
 On the proverbial uprightness of the early, in business, 325.
 On the new phase of faith sought to be introduced among, 346, 354.
 Address to young, 364.
 Observations of the N. Y. Christian Advocate upon, and comments, 373.
 Account of separations, &c., which have taken place among, in America within the last 40 years, 389.
 Chas. Shieldstream's address to, 397.
 Comments on the inconsistency of Free Masonry, &c., with the practices of, 405, 407.
 On the testimony of, against the observance of public fasts, and so-called "Holy-days," 415.
 Fruit. The drying of, by artificial evaporation and bleaching a large business, 55.
 Fruit growers. Acts useful to, 369.
 Fruit-jelly. Notice of imitation of, made from seaweed, 22.
 Gambling. On the fascination of, 403.
 Garfield Lucretia. Extract from a letter of, to her husband, 84.
 Garfield President. Anecdote showing the character of, 12.
 Remarks on the death of, 55.
 Gas well in Washington Co., Pa. Notice of a remarkable, 383.
 Gesi Pasha. Account of, 44.
 Germany. On the present religious aspect of, 254.
 Gibbons James, of Westtown township, Pa. Brief notice of, 195, 222.
 Gleanings from Quaker Annals, 21, 26, 34.
 Glucose. On the manufacture and use, 302.
 Gold mining in Tibet at high elevations, 350.
 Gold and silver. On the personal wearing of, in large quantities by Orientals, &c., 116, 126.
 Gold may be bought too dear, 163.
 Good work no more. Incident entitled, 372.
 Gospel of the grace of God. On the, 369.
 Government to be upon Christ's shoulders. Essay entitled, The, 219.
 Gray George. Certificate of Friends in Barbadoes concerning, in 1691-2, 399.
 Grubb Saml. L. J. Extract from, on the departures in doctrine and practice among Friends, and comments, 186.
 Remarks on the religious character and services of, 350, 380, 387.
 Hall Richard, of Wigton, England. Notice of the recent death and exemplary character of, 124.
 Hard to please. Extract entitled, 18.
 Hat-honor in the court-room in Cincinnati. Account by a Friend of, 17.
 A college student in Glasgow excused from, 268.
 Hay Hider, of, 17.
 Hazardous or speculative enterprises. Essay upon the duties of Friends respecting, 213.
 "Hazing." Remarks on the practice of, 215.
 Healy Christopher. Notice of some of the religious exercises of 182, 186, 194, 203.
 The last days of, 242, 250.
 Comments on the above, and on the character and services of, 285.
 Account of a religious visit of, to New England, 345, 353, 361, 369, 377, 385.

14. Notice of sickness caused by insects in beans, 14.
- On purchasable, 29.
- On the preventives of the wool sorter's disease, 30.
- Cistern water, without care, may become injurious to, 33.
- Ozoniferous plants conducive to, 39.
- Notice of a recent discovery respecting vaccination of animals, 60.
- On the serious danger to, from close and crowded sleeping rooms, 78.
- On the effect of vitiated air in producing consumption, 86.
- Advice on the preservation of, 87.
- On the necessity of free ventilation to, 94, 147.
- On the effect of unrestrained passions upon the, 99.
- Pure air, conducive to longevity, 103.
- On the dangers to, accompanying winter, 114.
- What is to be done for the, in emergencies, 142.
- On the value of bicarbonate of soda as an application to burns, 151.
- Hints on the preservation of the sight, 167, 206.
- Extract entitled, "How an old pasture cured consumption," 174.
- The injury of alcohol to the, in stimulating the circulation, 175.
- On the treatment of snake bites, 191.
- On avoiding dyspepsia, 222.
- On the influence of the mind upon hunger and thirst, 225.
- On coughing and its remedies, 238.
- Of children. On caring for the, 246, 279.
- On the importance to, of keeping the mouth shut in cold air, 247.
- On the danger to, from unwholesome wells, 255.
- Of the skin, hair, &c. On the injury done to, by cosmetics, &c., 263.
- On cause and treatment of colds, 297.
- On religious epidemics, 281, 289, 297, 305, 373.
- A large proportion of diseases due to the undermining of the, by alcohol, 287.
- On the necessity of ventilating closets, 302.
- On wooing sleep, 311.
- On the danger to, from sewage, &c., at sea side resorts, 318.
- On the danger to the, of citizens, temporarily living in the country, 334.
- On the importance of thorough chewing of food to the, 335.
- Remarks on education, in connection with, 340.
- Dreams caused by overwork, a sign of impaired, 365.
- Statement by Dr. B. W. Richardson of the injurious effects of tobacco upon the, 367.
- On the dangers to, from violent athletic exercises, 367.
- The occurrence of yellow fever, &c., believed to be limited by temperature, 385.
- Cellars of houses believed to be frequently injurious to, 390.
- On the dangers to the, of business men returning daily to country homes, 391.
- On the injurious effects of the indulgence of the passions upon the, 398.
- On preventing the spread of scarlet fever, 399.
- On the unwisdom of the remedy for a low state of the church, 27.
- fearing a recitation not teaching, 333.
- Hebrew. On the present faith of the, 11, 18.
- Help in the time of need. Incident on resisting temptation, entitled, 181.
- Heroes. On short, 60.
- Hidden, faithful ones. Encouragement to the, 82.
- Holland. Testimony in reference to unhappy results of infidelity in, 179.
- Holy Ghost a witness to us. Essay entitled, The, 187.
- Holy Scriptures. Notice of the dissemination of the, in Asia, 6.
- Illustrations of passages in the, from oriental customs, 28, 54, 116, 126, 295, 313, 349, 357, 366.
- On the increasing circulation of the, in Japan, 30.
- Remarks on the duty of instructing children in a knowledge of the, 39.
- Notice of the oldest translation of the, 47.
- Notice of voluminous lectures upon portions of the, 86.
- On the canonical books of the, 149.
- On the doctrines of Friends respecting the authenticity and value of the, 212.
- Notice of the recent discovery of very ancient manuscripts of the, 215.
- Holy Scriptures. Notice of the publication of the, in London, where they were formerly burnt by Romish priests, 238.
- On the supposed conflict of science with truths of the, 308.
- Historical statements of, confirmed by Babylonian inscriptions, 322.
- Account of recent extensive distribution of the, in Siberia, 379, 398.
- Hookes Ellis. Letter of, to Margaret Fell, and comments, 199.
- Honesty one of the first of the Christian graces, 297.
- Hop-pickers in England. On the, 173.
- Holy Spirit. On the necessity of faithful obedience to the, 378.
- Household perils from benzine, &c. Notice of, 103.
- Howell Francis. A prophecy of respecting Friends, 51.
- Humble. Words of encouragement to the, 363.
- Ice. Movements of stones in ponds, &c., caused by, 6.
- On the manufacture of artificial, 14.
- Rye observed to germinate in, 39.
- Impressions and Reflections. Remarks on practices of certain societies, "Friend," entitled, 205.
- "In all things give thanks," Essay entitled, 394.
- India. On the generally earnest character of the converts from Hinduism in, 86.
- On snake worship in, 254.
- India rubber. Notice of the collection of, in Nicaragua, 390.
- Indian Treaty and Protective Association of Philadelphia. Notice of the, 152.
- child of the Carlisle school. Brief essay of an, on snow, 252.
- Indians. Brief notice of the Moquis, 22.
- Notice of a recent conference with Ute, 57.
- Remarks on the honorable spirit exhibited by the Sioux, towards the Poncas, 71.
- Nobleness of character of the Flat Head, 78.
- On the feelings of warm attachment between, and William Penn, 91.
- Notice of the second Annual Report of the Carlisle school for the children of, 122.
- Statement of the prosperous condition of the Cherokee Nation of, 172.
- Anecdote of the heroism of Big Chief, one of the, Osage, 197.
- On the reasons why the, are more justly treated in Canada than in the U. States, 271.
- Account of the Zuni, 314.
- On the condition of the civilized, of the Indian Territory, 323.
- On the origin of the recent outbreak of the, in Arizona, 326.
- Reply of a council of, in 1805, to a missionary, 337.
- Indigo. On the manufacture of, 30.
- Individual faithfulness. On the absolute necessity for, 27.
- Infallibility. Observations on the assumption of, by the pope of Rome, 222.
- Infidel convict. Account of a young, 36.
- Anecdote of a converted, 100, 110.
- Infidelity. Notice of the large proportion of crimes traced to, 94.
- Statement of a converted infidel in reference to, 390.
- Remarks on publishers of books advocating or tending to, 108.
- A consistent Christian example, an insuperable argument against, 173.
- On the practical results of, in Holland, 179.
- Arguments against, 198.
- An advocate of, vanquished by a humble opponent, 295.
- Intemperance. A caviller at totalism silenced, 37.
- Testimony of the wife of Sir John MacDonal on the wine drinking is not a necessity in social life, 45.
- A man saved from, after breaking away from old associates, 62.
- Testimony of an extensive traveller to the universal value of water as a drink instead of wine, 74.
- Incident of, entitled, "A thing to cry over," 101.
- What a sixpence per day for beer for sixty years costs, 109.
- Notice of the Temperance Lesson Book by Dr. B. W. Richardson, 118.
- promotes falsehood, 127.
- Notice of the enforcement of the prohibitory law against, in Kansas, 167.
- On the nature of the injury to the health, caused by the mildest forms of, 175.
- Intemperance. Observations on the effects of moderate drinking, 199.
- A strong temperance sermon, 207.
- Dealing in, or using intoxicants prohibited by Methodists, 238.
- a great cause of Ireland's miseries, 271.
- Anecdote of, entitled, "The work done inside," 282.
- A large proportion of diseases due to the undermining of health, 287.
- In Ireland, a large cause of its present distress, 294.
- The cost of, to Great Britain, 306.
- Notice of the Pond Liquor Law against, in Ohio, 318.
- Notice of the violation of laws by liquor dealers in California, 326.
- Experience of a convict in abandoning, by the help of the Holy Spirit, 357.
- The manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors prohibited in Madagascar, 407.
- Remarks on the misery caused by, in Philadelphia, 398.
- Insanity. Remarks on, as not connected with religion, 197.
- Insufficiency of human learning. Essay entitled, 402.
- Instinct vs. Reason in animals, 412.
- Involuntary. Remarks on the blessings which, may be of to others, 391.
- Is this life all? Essay entitled, 138.
- Ireland. On the present unhappy condition of, 327.
- Iron slag. On the increased use of, in the U. States, 330.
- Italy. On the recent successful labors of Protestants in, 356.
- Ivory. On the annual consumption of, 206.
- On the late increased supply of fossil, 256.
- Jaffrey Alexander. Account of the triumphant close of, 21.
- James. Anecdote of Bishop, 260.
- Japan. Notice of a society to resist the spread of Christianity in, 47.
- Remarks of a native girl in, on preaching Christianity by example, 116.
- Notice of proceedings of Buddhists in, to check the spread of Christianity, 334.
- Jay John. On the character of, 70.
- Jerks. Notice of the nervous affection called the, 289, 378.
- Jerusalem. Notice of a recent visit to, 257, 265.
- Jews. Notice of efforts of a Roman Catholic bishop for the relief of, 5.
- On the present faith of the, 11, 18.
- Satisfactions of the circulation of the New Testament in Hebrew among, 47.
- Notice of an effort to introduce the observance of the First day of the week among, 47.
- Notice of a religious awakening among, in Persia, 55.
- Notice of a proposed organization of Christian, in New York, 111.
- Explanation of the immunity of, from pestilential diseases, 111.
- Notice of an effort, to found a colony in Palestine, 151.
- Historical facts relating to the return of, to England in 1655, 286.
- Notice of the great physical vitality of the, 415.
- Justification. On the doctrine of Friends in regard to, as stated by William Penn, 227.
- Kindness. Anecdote of genuine, 110.
- Kingdom of heaven. The path to, is through suffering, 102.
- Kirkwood William. Notice of the silent religious experience of, in public meetings, 227.
- Remarks on the above, 247, 266.
- Tribute to the character of, 266.
- Kite Nathan. Letter of, 108.
- Knight Alice. Notice of some of the religious exercises of, 155, 194.
- Observations of M. L. Lovett on the death of, 274.
- Knowledge. On the preciousness of Divine, as compared with human, 83.
- Land William. Address by, to the members of Brigham Monthly Meeting, 150, 156, 165.
- Land-slips in Switzerland. Notice of recent destructive, 191.
- Landlords. Extract from a liturgy by Edward VI. containing a prayer for, 110.
- Lanlon Chloë. Brief notice and letter of, 46.
- "Learn of Me." Essay entitled, 178.
- Learning. A learned man's note of the frequently injurious effects of human, 42.

Learning. Due moderation in the pursuit of, fortified by Christian humility. On, 10.
On the dangers of the pursuit of, 115.
The insufficiency of human, to promote true happiness, 402.
Leather. How scraps of, are utilized, 295.
Leads. On the breeding of, the 6.
Lesson from the Tekokos. Essay entitled, A, 267.
Letter of George Fox, and comments, 34.
Letter of Ellen Evans, 35, 43.
An ancient love, from Joseph Storr, 45.
Of Daniel Wheeler, 67.
John Evans, 73.
Nathan Kite, 108.
John G. Whittier, 126.
Joseph Elkinton, 161.
David Heston, 175, 207.
Ellis Hookes and comments, 189.
R. W. Extracts from, 284.
James McNish, 293.
Liberality in giving. On, 28.
Library and Reading Room of the British Museum. Account of, the 321.
Learies. On the pernicious effects of fiction in public, 56.
Life of Christ. Keep to, the 174.
Life. On faithfully performing the drudgery of, 150.
"Light." Essay on spiritual progress entitled, 378.
Lion. An encounter with, a 67.
Method of killing the, by bushmen, 127.
Literature. On the wide-spread injury caused by vicious, 294.
Notice of a high license fee imposed upon selling impure, in Texas, 358.
On the extensive injury done to children by vicious, 406.
Lily. The bulbs of, used for food in Japan, 215.
Log. Description of a ship's, 111.
Look on the bright side, 370.
Love better than fiction. Extract entitled, 99.
now, 148.
Remarks of I. Penington concerning Divine, 236.
Lovett Nathan L. Notice of religious exercises of, 194, 274.
Lush Robert. Perseverance illustrated in the life of, 276.
McCarthy Ellen. Testimony of Muncy Monthly Meeting concerning, 174.
Madagascar. The planting of the poppy forbidden in, 174.
The manufacture or importation of alcoholic liquors prohibited in, 407.
Marriage. Remarks on the solemnity often accompanying the accomplishment of, in religious meetings, 135.
Marriages.—William Webster to Catharine S. Scarlett, 8; Walter S. Reeve to Adelaide Dwyer, 32; Henry M. Jones to Lydia L. Roberts, 43; Joseph Sentgood to Mary Ann Cope, 56; Edward L. South to Lydia H. Smith, 72; Thomas A. Crawford to Annie Thompson, 136; Thomas A. Fowler to Sarah Brantingham, 192; Ellwood Cooper to Rachel P. Wills, 200; Joshua C. Smith to Edith Mason, 232; Isaac Evans, Jr., to Rebecca Fell, 296; Joseph G. Evans to Sarah F. Wills, 336; William Y. Warren to Mary Jenkins, 390; Joseph F. Smedley to Anna N. Keever, 392; John S. Fowler to Esther Heustis, 400; Joseph Rhoads, Jr., to Harriet E. Masters, 408.
Masonic symbols. Remarks on worshipping, 404, 407.
Meekness. The spirit of, necessary in dealing with offenders, 226.
Memory of the just is blessed. Notice of Mercy Ellis entitled, The, 227.
Mennonites. Notice of the emigration of Russian, 71.
Resolutions of a recent conference of, against circensess, &c., 155.
Messengers of grace. Essay entitled, 338.
Meteor showers. On the occurrence of, 151.
Methodism opposed in Germany, 62.
Methodist bodies in the world. Statistics of, the 5.
Methodists. Notice of the assembling and advice of an eccumenical conference of, 94, 127.
Observations on the history of, in England, 290.
Notice of the action of, in the United States regarding marriage with divorced persons, &c., 374.
Disapproval of attendance of agricultural fairs by, 71.
Dealing in or using intoxicants prohibited by, 228.
Dancing condemned by, 246.
Michigan forest fires. A vivid picture of, the 154.
Money sent by convicts to sufferers by the, 174.
Notice of prehistoric mining operations in, 398.

Microscope. The circulation of the human blood rendered visible by, the 103.
Mildred Daniel. Extract from a letter of, to John Pemberton, 4.
Ministerial training. Incident entitled, 338.
Ministry. A dependence upon a stated, a cause of weakness in many Christian professors, 23.
Travels the, not to be taken in the will of man, 145.
Remarks on the exercise and proper encouragement of, the 151.
Comments on the above, 170.
On the efforts of Satan to transform himself into an angel of light, the 197.
Remarks on the example of silence in William Kirkwood in an appointed meeting and the exercise of true, 227, 247.
On the doctrines of Friends in regard to, 231, 256, 406.
Remarks on the proper oversight of, the 259.
Remarks of I. Penington on the early, in the Society of Friends, 255.
On the necessity of those in the, to exercise great care in ministering to the dying, 268.
Remarks on the proper exercise of, the 285.
True Christian love to be paramount in the exercise of, the 358.
The secret of true power in the, 350.
Estimated cost of a hiring, in the Trinity church building, N. Y., 350.
Observations on strengthening the hands of those engaged in the, 394.
A Christian, is anointed of God, 408.
Modern and Primitive teaching. Essay entitled, 227.
Morality. Observations on the danger to, from a familiarity with indelicate representations, 38.
Moravians. Notice of the transfer of a congregation of, to another denomination, 102.
Mothers. On the influence of, 102.
Mount Washington. Account of a great storm in 1881, at the top of, 38.
Modified Quakerism—The signs of the times. Essay entitled, 122.
Moonshine religion. Essay entitled, 114.
Moral courage. Anecdote of, a 246.
Mother. Wise answers of, a 245.
Mott James E. Some account of the last sayings and peaceful death of, 292.
Muir Joseph—the naturalist. Brief account of, 134.
Music. Remarks on the disease of, by Friends, 39, 65.
no part of worship, 232, 321, 407.
Testimony of Adam Clarke and John Wesley against, in places of worship, 407.
206.
Muslimans. Statistics of the number of, 151.
Natural History.—The leech, 6; Cochineal, 4; A water-carrying tortoise, 14; Ants as fruit growers' friends, 39; The honey bird, 51; Trees attractive to butterflies, 55; The Blue-jay, 55; The Lion, 67; The Tsetse, 75; The Australian crow, 86; The screw-worm, 87; 111; Sagacity of a pony, 85; Display of kindness in a rook, 111; Sagacity of a monkey, 118; The Mountain Nestor or Kea of New Zealand, 119; The Woodcock, 127.
Courage of the Humming-bird, 131; Black-headed gulls, 162; The Winkie, 174; Crow black birds, 254; Showers of spider-webs, 262; A conscience stricken animal, 270; Sea-weed mistaken for sea serpents, 270; Mosquitoes, 279; Pet herons, 279; Australian snakes, 283; Capturing hornets of the Woodcock, 287; The English Jackdaw, 295; Sagacity of two goats, 302; Effects of the telegraph upon wild animals, 302; Sponges, 310; Coral-eating worm, 311; On the migration of birds, 330; Sardines, 334; Remedies against injurious insects, 342; On the flight of birds, 350; Insects, 354; Leaf-cutting ants, 358; Foraging ants of Nicaragua, 374; The Mongoose, 383; The Chromis fish, 390; Anecdotes of sagacity in animals, 412.
Naturalist. The home of, a 318.
Needle's eye. Notice of, the 394.
Remarks on the above, 357.
New England. Observations on the character of the Puritan settlers of, 120, 220, 228.
New phase of Quaker faith. Essay entitled, The, 346, 354.
New York. Notice of some of the provisions against profanity, &c., in the new criminal code of, 218.
New Zealand. Notice of the decline of the native population of, 411.
Niagara Falls. Notice of the gradual recession of, and fall of Table Rock at, 118.
Nigra. Notice of a religious frenzy in, 103.
Nicholas of Basle. Account of religious interviews of, with John Tauber, 1.

Nile. Notice of the "sudd" of the, the 44, 310.
Norfolk Island. Account of a recent visit to, 411.
Norway. Notice of the present state of religious toleration in, 358.
Nostrums. Analysis of certain, 415.
Not too late to do good. Essay entitled, 258.
Nothing finished. Remarks on the necessity of perseverance, entitled, 182.
Notes of travel among Friends of Exeter and Muncy meetings, &c., 97, 105, 113, 121, 137, 145, 161, 169.
Novels. On the danger to purity of mind from the reading of, 13.
Oaths. On the deterioration of public morals by judicial, 58.
On different forms of judicial, 367.
Ocean. Notice of the preparation of daily weather charts of the North Atlantic, 350.
Ocean waves. Illustration of the power of, 159.
Old Aunt Sally. Account of a pious colored woman entitled, 161.
Our floating home. Account of an excursion by canal from Philadelphia, entitled, 2, 9.
Our obvious need. Essay entitled, 380, 387.
Over the desert to Elim. Extract entitled, 357, 356.
Overmuch learning. Essay entitled, 115.
"Ozone Preservative." On the composition of, an, 20.
Paint. Notice of luminous, 302.
Palestine. Account of a recent visit to by G. Pitt, 25, 265, 273.
Papyrus. Observations on the, 319.
Patterson Dorothy (Sister Dora). Brief account of, 336.
Peaceable conduct the best defence, 130, 138.
Peabody Fann. Notice of the beneficial work done by, in London, 334.
Pemberton John. Notice of the first appearance of, in the ministry, and letter of E. Evans to, 35.
Phineas. Notice of the first acquaintance of, with his wife, 129.
Penn William. Letter of the Trustees of Jordan's burial ground refusing permission to disintegrate the remains of, and comments, 5.
Description of Pennsbury, the residence of, in Pennsylvania, 81, 91.
Advice of, to his children on beginning the daily article, 290.
Remarks of, on the character of the early Friends, 347.
Pennington Isaac. On Divine love by, 236.
Remarks of, on disputations in religion, 322.
Perfection. The doctrine of, preached by the apostles, 25.
Perseverance as illustrated in the life of Robert Lush, 276.
Phillips Catharine. Remarks of, on the restraints of the cross in intellectual pursuits, 83.
Remarks of, on acceptable prayer, 171.
Pike Joseph. Account of, of the exercise of Friends in Ireland, regarding superstities, 203.
Pioneer life. On, 133, 140.
Pitfield Elizabeth. Notice of some of the religious exercises of, 235.
Comments on the above, 268.
Plants.—The laurel tree, 15; Rapid growth of trees, &c., in California, 185; The fallow tree, 215; The shoe-black plant, 230; The Tughin-bean of Madagascar, 319; The wild tea plant, 326; Notice of some plants found in the Pine barrens of New Jersey, 362; Notice of some plants found near Hammon, N. J., 401.
The Drosers, 409; Venus fly-trap, 404; The bladder-worms, 408; Remarks on insectivorous plants, 409.
Gigantic trees in Australia, 411.
Plain language. Conviction of Ann Freeman, a Methodist, in regard to the necessity of using the, 271.
Plough. On the origin of the, 342.
Poetry—Original.—"He doeth all things well," 12; "Am I my brother's keeper?" 68; Reflections at midnight, 180; On the death of Robert Smith, 204; On the death of Thomas B. Gould, 204; Under the shadow of thy wings, 212; Lines by Nathaniel Kite, 212; Lines on seeing a letter reading his marriage certificate, 247; Christ cleanseth the leper, 300; Earthly Treasures, 332; Lines by Elizabeth Pierson on the death of Mary Evans, 412.
Poetry—Selected.—An Allegory, 4; All your need, 84; Autumn wood, 100; Aspiration, 116; After the battle, 124; Another Year, 164; Afflictions, 180; At Last, 252; "An Apology for my twilight ramblings and comments, 364; The Better Land, 60; The Burial of Moses, 188; Be not faithless but believing, 228; Baby has gone to school, 240; The Best that I can, 252; Cherish kindly feelings, 60; The Cham-

- red antilios, 244; Children's joys, 204; The charm over the gate, 236; Cumbered about much serving, 0; Children, 316; The Children we keep, 388; vine order, 41; Dead Egypt, 31; Do it now 28; The eye of sunshine, 536; The Day is done, 360; Evening Hymn, 28; Every Day, 92; Eventide, 332; Example, 372; For love's sake, 140; The Golden phabet, 10; Gullit, 149; God knows, 221; Granted sighs, 268; Helping papa and mamma, 4; Heart compassing, 21; The Heavenly sculptor, 300; He is the land of the living, 116; Hymn for the New Year, 172; Hide and seek, 195; Heaven, 316; The happy Farmer, 348; The Ivy in a dungeon, 180; I was there, 268; I'll should die to-night, 234; The ng's ships, 292; Lost, 12; Learning to walk, 37; Lines, 37; Lobster, 108; Living waters, 116; The Land of the living, 116; Little foxes, 256; Leaf-trees, 245; Lines in remembrance of Margaret Hutchinson, 260; The Little brother, 292; The Linc, 0; The Lord is in his temple, 340; My neighbor's joy, 32; To my dog "Blanco," 225; To the Mark, 340; My home, 340; A midnight hymn, 348; The morning Psalm, 372; The Master's reply, 381; The master's daughter, 396; The Nation's Suspense, 44; ow, 76; November, 108; A New Year's eve vision, 14; The old clock, 132; The old farm, 284; The old clock on the stairs, 324; The other man, 356; On the moonshine, 114; The Pluman, 28; Preise, 52; the planting of the apple tree, 68; O Painter of je fruits and flowers, 149; Parable of the lost piece of silver, 263; Prety is that pretty does, 284; The poet, and the children, 316; The Poet's fountain, 351; Peter's tears, 388; A Psalm of night, 404; A Quiet mind, 340; The Reager, 108; Rec for the cause, 28; The Request, 299; The Round of life, 292; Robins have come again, 309; Reconciled, 356; Ready to depart, 344; The setting sun, 37; Sweet Tunes, 44; The Solitary places shall be glad, 70; The stranger on the Hill, 84; The song of the brook, 92; reaver, 190; Sparrows, 108; St. Martin's festival, 50; Spring promises, 324; Starting work, 345; The signs of the Seasons, 364; Thy will, 32; Trust and distrust, 60; Two pictures, 132; Thanksgiving, 140; The Three Biddes, 172; Three requisites of a teacher, 182; The useful little girl, 188; Valuation, 188; Via, 149, 309, 344; Victorious faith, 324; Watch, and watch, watch, 108; What of that? 149; Weak things of God, 119; Wedded life, 180; Worries, 183; Waiting, 276; What the Burdock was good for, 372; Young again, 221; What makes the grasses grow, 112.
- A. A microscopic test for, 39.
- A. Innocence true, springs from refinement of mind, 111.
- A. Ities. On the part which a Christian should not be in, 67.
- A. mpeil. Notice of recent discoveries in, 216.
- A. or. On the duty of self-sacrifice in helping the, 143.
- A. Remarks on neglect of the, 193.
- A. re of piety in silencing an infidel, 295.
- A. ctical religion unto salvation. Essay entitled, 131.
- A. rayer. On the unprofitableness of formal, 15.
- A. Instances of long continued and availing, 29.
- A. heard, 46.
- A. On the doctrine of Friends in reference to vocal, 68.
- A. Observations on being kept under the spirit of wisdom in respect to, 171.
- A. answer to, in the deliverance of a Scotch Covenantan, 349.
- A. The of a boy answered, 382.
- A. Notice of the evil effects of, 99.
- A. occlusion versus practice, 39.
- A. vidental deliverances of John Wesley and John Fletcher, 10.
- A. occurrences often little regarded. Remarks on, 35.
- A. relied to a poor pious man. Account of, 181.
- A. interposition for the relief of a poor family, 309.
- A. deliverance of a Scotch Covenantan in answer to prayer, 349.
- A. preparing the way in the East. Illustration of Scripture entitled, 513.
- A. ctytesian. Notice of the reunion of separate congregations of, 142.
- A. On the views of, on marriage with a deceased wife's sister, 206.
- A. Dancing brooked by, 238.
- A. Notice of a vote by, in reference to instrumental music, 318.
- A. Notice of overtures towards reconciling the Northern and Southern, in the U. States, 358.
- A. presumptuous wicked. On the hardened state of the, 147.
- A. rofanity. Notice of a law against, in New York, 319.
- P. Pure and undefiled religion. Essay entitled, 140.
- P. Puritans vs. Quakers, by H. L. Southwick, and comments, 210, 220, 228.
- P. Purity. On individual, 355.
- Quakerism. On popular, 106.
- Q. On modified, and the steps which have led to it, 122.
- Quintessence. Notice of the production of, in India, and its medicinal value, 23.
- Quinine. Notice of new source of, 367.
- R. Railroad. The upright trunks of trees used to support a, in California, 35.
- R. Railroad. Statistics of the injury to life by, in different countries, 142.
- R. Raine Jonathan. Concern of, on his death-bed for a young wife, 173.
- R. Rascall Midred. Brief notice of the concern of, for the Truth, 119.
- R. Rats. Notice of the value of the mongoose in killing, 383.
- R. Reading matter for hospitals and prisons. On the responsibility of selecting, &c., 234.
- R. On the wide-spread injury done by vicious, 294, 330.
- R. Reform. Episcopal Church. Notice of some of the Scriptural doctrines of, 118.
- R. Regeneration. On the necessity of, 90.
- R. Relaxation and amusement. On the nature of, consistent with the true Christian character, 41.
- R. Religion. On the descending effect of the thirst for riches upon, 54.
- R. Remarks on impurity of heart in, as exemplified by Balsam, 76.
- R. On the necessity of a change of heart in, 169.
- R. On the scare there is in unprofitable speculation respecting, 114.
- R. On moonshine, 114.
- R. On practical, unto salvation, 131.
- R. On pure and undefiled, 140.
- R. leads to morality, 156.
- R. in the family. Remarks on, 237.
- R. On the fashionable world, 10, 243.
- R. stands upon two pillars, 251.
- R. On the dangers of speculative inquiries into the mysteries of, 267.
- R. An objector to, answered, 269.
- R. Remarks on searching into hidden mysteries of, 295.
- R. leads to entire honesty, 297.
- R. True, forbids fashionable dressing, &c., 299.
- R. On worldly, 299.
- R. Remarks on disputations in, and on hearing wisdom's voice, 322.
- R. On practically exemplifying, in every day life, 322.
- R. True, not to be promoted by a reliance upon human learning, 402.
- R. never fails, 497.
- R. Religious epidemics. Notice of, 281, 289, 297, 305, 373.
- R. Religious items, &c. 5, 13, 22, 30, 39, 47, 54, 62, 71, 86, 94, 102, 111, 118, 127, 135, 142, 151, 158, 167, 174, 190, 206, 214, 222, 230, 238, 246, 251, 262, 270, 278, 286, 318, 326, 332, 342, 356, 358, 374, 407, 414.
- R. Religious influences at institutions of learning, 0, 108.
- R. meetings. Notice of a legal decision on the disturbance of, 71.
- R. liberty in Russia. A plea for, 342.
- R. liberty in Sweden. Incident showing the absence of, 350.
- R. fellowship, 0, 410.
- R. Religious views and tenets. Essays entitled, 234, 238.
- R. Remember the poor. Incident entitled, 193.
- R. "Remind me of the king." Anecdote entitled, 47.
- R. Repentance. Instance of death-bed, 166.
- R. necessary for the remission of sins, 338.
- R. Reminiscences of departed worthies. Alice Knight, 155, 194.
- R. Samuel Cooper, 163, 171.
- R. Charles Healy, 186, 194, 203, 242, 256, 285, 315, 325, 361, 369, 377, 385.
- R. M. L. Lovett, 191, 274.
- R. William Kirkwood, 227.
- R. Elizabeth Pittfield, 255.
- R. Elizabeth Evans, 291.
- R. Resurrection. Remarks on the, 234.
- R. Retirement and silent exercise of mind. On the blessed fruits of, 290.
- R. Richard James Nicholson. Testimony of, in 1847 respecting the Society of Friends, 366.
- R. Rich man. Experience of a, on the growing passion for wealth, 13.
- R. Ritualism. Remark on the destroying effect of, on spiritual life, 151.
- R. Notice of sympathy for, in England, 326.
- R. On the origin and effects of, 411.
- R. Robert M. Smith. Brief account of, and his removal to Catwissa, Pa., 113, 121, 129.
- R. Roman Catholicism. On the resemblances between, and Buddhism, 342.
- R. Roman Catholics. Notice of the dependence of, upon saints, and comments, 91.
- R. Remarks of, on the assassination of President Garfield, and comments, 30.
- R. Notice of a book respecting, condemned by the Synod ofquisition, 30.
- R. Notice of the abjuration of a prominent ecclesiastic among, in Rome, 86.
- R. Notice of an effort in Michigan to place the ecclesiastical property of, in lay trustees, 91.
- R. Notice of proposed action of, in Fitchburg respecting public schools, 111.
- R. Notice of a circular on the sale of Masses by, 118.
- R. Remarks on the worship of angels by, 131.
- R. Observations on false doctrines taught by, 190, 222.
- R. Observations of, in reference to Protestants, 44.
- R. Russia. Notice of disputes in, in reference to religion, 6.
- R. Notice of the existence of a sect in, characterized by a corrupt method of doctrine and practice, 65.
- R. A plea for religious liberty in, 342.
- S. Sadness. On rightly profiting by seasons of, 359.
- S. Sacerdotalism. A plea for, 118.
- S. A donkey, 118.
- S. Salt deposit in Western New York. On the, 151.
- S. Salvation of the soul. Nothing can compare in value with the, 25.
- S. Salvation. A few sentiments respecting the way of, 110.
- S. "Salvation Army." Account of the, 189, 191.
- S. Notice of a recent attack upon the, by a mob, 262.
- S. Samaritans. Account of a recent observance by, of the Jewish passover, 415.
- S. Sautarium on Windmill Island, Phila. Appeal on behalf of the, 47.
- S. Satan as an angel of light—The Poor in Zion. Essay entitled, "The, 237.
- S. Saviour's grace sufficient for every time of need." Essay entitled, "The, 237.
- S. Scapegoat. A ceremony of the, practised in India, 28.
- S. Scattergood Thomas. Anecdote of, 281.
- S. Scientific notes, &c.—6, 14, 22, 30, 29, 55, 63, 78, 86, 94, 103, 111, 118, 127, 142, 150, 167, 174, 190, 199, 206, 215, 220, 230, 238, 246, 251, 262, 270, 278, 286, 295, 302, 316, 318, 326, 342, 356, 361, 369, 377, 385, 398, 415.
- S. School. Notice of the Second Annual Report of the Carlisle Indian, 122.
- S. Schools. Remarks on a dependence upon First-day, as a cause of weakness in many Christian professors, 28.
- S. On deleterious literature often circulated by libraries in First-day, 50.
- S. The learning of the, unsanctified by grace, often hurtful, 42.
- S. Observations on the danger of First-day, in displacing parental oversight and responsibility, 89.
- S. Observations on First-day, as connected with Quakerism, 166.
- S. Scott John. Remarks on an essay by, on Salvation by Christ, 311.
- S. Seen. On the foam of the, 263.
- S. Notice of rare animals found at great depths in the, 270.
- S. Seeking a crown. Incident entitled, 106.
- S. Seldon John. Remarks of, respecting the inability of learning to afford consolation, and comments, 402.
- S. Self-denial. Remarks on the effects of, upon the worldly minded, 262.
- S. Self-sacrifice. On the necessity of, 127.
- S. Sermon. Definition of a good, 52.
- S. Selling cream. Remarks on honesty in business, entitled, 254.
- S. Comments on the above, 376.
- S. Shakers. Correction of an error in enfolding Quakers with, 61.
- S. Shieldstream Chas. Address of, to Friends, 397.
- S. Siberia. Account of a recent visit by Henry Lansdale to, 379.
- S. Notice of the wandering tribes of, 393.
- S. "Silent yet effective influences for good." Essay entitled, 363.
- S. Singing and music are contrary to the nature and spirit of true worship, 331.
- S. Skin. Notice of the identification of human, after several centuries, 191.
- S. Slavery. Grateful address of colored people in London to Friends in 1785, for their efforts against, 4.
- S. Notice of the abolition of, by Egypt, 260.
- S. Sleigh bells. On the method of making, 276.
- S. Small-pox and vaccination. Observations on, 157.
- S. Snake. On the method of treating patients bitten by the rattie, 191.
- S. On the motion of a, 295.
- S. Spare moments. On improving, 361.
- S. Spider-webs. Notice of spiders, &c., 262.
- S. Spiritual growth. Remarks on, 140.
- S. knowledge. On the source of true, 286.
- S. Sponges. On the collection of, in the Bahamas, 310.
- S. Spontaneous combustion caused by nitric acid, 14.
- S. Spriguel Carl. Account of the saving of a passenger train by, 179.
- S. Steel. On a new method of tempering, 335.
- S. Straw. On the cultivation of Tuscan, for hats 263.

Street-car scene. Anecdote of genuine kindness entitled, A, 110.
 Statistics of the value of vaccination in preventing small-pox, 294.
 Stripes among laborers. Remarks on the necessity of the application of Christian principles in the settlement of, 331.
 Suffering. The endurance of, qualifies to sympathize with others, 150.
 Suggestive hints from California. Remarks on the ministry edited, 145.
 Summary of Events.—7, 15, 23, 31, 39, 47, 55, 64, 72, 79, 87, 95, 104, 112, 120, 128, 136, 143, 152, 160, 168, 176, 183, 192, 200, 208, 216, 224, 231, 239, 247, 255, 263, 272, 280, 287, 296, 303, 312, 320, 327, 336, 344, 352, 359, 368, 376, 384, 392, 400, 408, 416.
 Sun. Illustrations of the heat, &c., of the, 233.
 On the effect upon man of the midnight, 239.
 Superstitions of our houses. Essay entitled, 292.
 Superstitions. Curious, 19.
 Surgery operations. Notice of the successful transplanting of bone in a, 10.
 Swear. Notice of the imprisonment of a girl in Canada for refusing to, 318.
 Sweden. Dissenters from the established religion of, liable to imprisonment in, 159, 350.
 Sweet pillow thoughts. Extract entitled, 258.
 Talking paper. Extract entitled, 213.
 Tauter John. Account of the life and religious experience of, 1, 10.
 Tear bottles. Notice of the use of, in Oriental countries, 54.
 Telegraph wire. Notice of the longest span of, in the world, 22.
 cables. On submarine, 367.
 Telescope. Notice of the largest ever designed, 399.
 Temperature. Notice of high, in parts of California, &c., 226.
 Testimony of the Truth by Francis Canfield, A, 25, by John Voughton, A, 53, 58, by John Bowater, A, 100, 109, 117, 125, 133.
 Testimony of Muncy Monthly Meeting concerning Mercy Ellis, 153.
 Theatre. Remarks of John B. Gough on the dangers of the, 110.
 "Thou afflicted and tossed with tempest." Essay entitled, 284.
 "Thou God, seek me." Essay entitled, 355.
 Thoughts. On the necessity of restraining them, from evil, 259.
 Tholnek. Extract from, on quietly resting in God, 367.
 Tourist. On quenching, by the outward application of water, 111.
 Thrift. John Ploughman on, 301.
 Thumb. The markings on the, peculiar to each individual, 127.
 Tithes. Notice of an increasing agitation in England respecting, 232.
 Tobacco. Resolution of two pious men to quit using, 13.
 A father discontinues using, for the sake of example, 34.
 A house built with the money saved from, 150.
 Statement of Dr. B. W. Richardson of the injurious effects of, 367.
 Too late to do good. Incident entitled, 166.
 Comments on the above, 235.
 Tracts. Suggestions on the distribution of, 235.
 "Trinity." The word, not to be found in Scripture, 234.
 "Truthful singing." Essay entitled, 59.
 Try again. Incident entitled, 324, 367.
 Try and trust. Remarks on, 371.
 Tucson. Account of a recent visit to, 252.
 Tucker Sarah. Brief notice of, 377.
 Turn your face to the light. Incident entitled, 348.
 Turquoise. On the occurrence of the, in New Mexico, 230.
 Uncertain Riches." Essay entitled, "The, 54.
 "Undraped paintings and statuary. The fine arts." A plea for modesty and purity entitled, 38.
 United States. The Government of the, regarded by a covenantor as not a Christian one, 334.
 Utilization of worn out horses. On the, 31.
 Vaccination against chicken cholera, &c. Notice of Pastier's discovery respecting, 60.

Vaccination against small-pox. Statistics of the value of, 294.
 "Vain faith." Notice of immoral dealings entitled, 156.
 Vaasa Gustavus, a former slave. Brief account of, 4.
 Vaughan John. A testimony to the Truth by, 53, 58.
 Gustafson. Observations and recommendations in reference to, 147.
 Vindication of the Truth, A, 130.
 Remarks on the above, 155.
 Visitation of Divine grace to Friends of Phila. Notice of a remarkable, 316.
 Volcano of Kilauaea. Account of a remarkable change in the molten lake of the, 415.
 Waiting on the Lord. On the Scripture authority for, 259.
 Advice respecting, 268.
 "Wandering South and East." Extracts from, 405, 411.
 War. On the folly of the recent, in the Transvaal, 45.
 On the inconsistencies of professed Christians in reference to, 55.
 The carrying of concealed deadly weapons more frequent in Philadelphia since the late, 59.
 Experience of Divine protection by a widow during the late civil, 66.
 On the injury done by historians in commending military desperadoes, 199.
 A Jewish sermon to Christians respecting, 246.
 On the proposed congress for the settlement of international disputes without, 247.
 A public protest against, in Belgium, 270.
 The standing armies of Europe shown to be a cause of high price of breadstuffs, 358.
 declared immoral by the King of Bavaria, 374.
 Observations of Thomas Carlyle on the folly of, 382.
 On the use of poisoned bullets in the Franco-German, 383.
 The late civil, believed not to have taken place, if ministers had everywhere opposed it, 407.
 a stumbling block to the heathen, 414.
 Watchful abiding in Christ. Essay entitled, 306.
 Water. Notice of impurities contained in cistern, in Cincinnati, 39.
 On the cause of color in sea, 215.
 "Water-proof cloth." On Reimann's process for making, 247.
 "Walking honestly." Essay entitled, 297.
 Wealth. On the experience of a rich man on the passion for, 13.
 On the excessive struggle for, 163.
 Weights and measures. On the antiquity of, 207.
 Wesley John. Providential deliverance of, when a boy, 19.
 Western Friends in Court. Account of a late suit at Indianapolis, 69, 77, 85, 93.
 Westminster Abbey. On the cost of placing memorials in, 31.
 Westtown Boarding School. Observations on, during a late visit, 50.
 Remarks on the great importance of maintaining it in accordance with the principles of Friends, 139.
 Account of the establishment of, 171, 195, 202, 211, 221, 234, 245, 250, 261, 274, 283, 298, 307, 325, 339, 347, 353, 370, 378, 394.
 Notice of the establishment of a normal class at, 245.
 Observations on moral and religious training at, 214.
 "What have they seen." Extract entitled, 141.
 Whately. Anecdote of Bishop, 365, &c., of, 207.
 Wheat. Statistics of the production, &c., of, 207.
 Notice of large fields of, in California, 226.
 Wheeler Daniel. Letter of, 67.
 Rejoiced on the proximity of constant renewals of spiritual strength, 319.
 Whirlpool of worldliness." Essay entitled, "The, 275.
 Whittier John G. Letter of, 126.
 Where is the good way? Essay entitled, 364.
 Who cares for me. Incident in the life of a poor woman, entitled, 55.
 Widow of Shiloh. Extract entitled, The, 66.
 Wilberforce William. On the Christian character of under pennyless losses, 201.
 Wilkinson Elizabeth. Brief notice and extract from a letter of, 366.

Williams Roger. The banishment of, from Massachusetts, attributed to his sense of justice to the Indian, 415.
 Winter and its dangers to health. On, 114.
 Wool distinguished by the beetles frequenting it, 39.
 Woman's Hospital. Appeal on behalf of The, 348.
 Woman's work. Remarks of Lucretia Garfield on, 84.
 Worldly spirit. "Essay entitled, A, 3. spirit. On the dangers of a, 140.
 conduct. Parents sometimes led into, by children, 151.
 Worm at the root. Extract entitled, The, 61.
 Worship. On the impropriety of contracting heavy debts in building houses for, 47.
 The expensiveness of houses for, assigned by a poor as a reason for non-attendance of, 86.
 On the blessings of silent meetings for, 143.
 Observation of S. Crisp on the design of Friends in establishing meetings for, 199.
 Statistics of the attendance of places of, in England, 232.
 On the Scripture authority for silent, 259.
 Reasons for the increasing non-attendance of places for public, 275.
 Customary singing and music no part of, 232, 31, 407.
 A feast, at the present day consists in certain forms and rituals devised by man, 383.
 Worshipping God. Essay entitled, 404.
 Comments on the above, 407.
 Wright Hendrick B. Testimony of, against weariness in attending meetings for, 199.
 Wright Thomas—the prisoners' friend. Account of, 128.
 Wrongs we gratuitously suspect in others are those which we are capable, 14.
 Yarnall Thomas. Remarks on the character and general labors of the late, 341.
 Year. The close of the, a suitable time for an investigation into our temporal and spiritual condition, 16.
 Yearly Meeting, Baltimore, 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, and comments, 127.
 Iowa, 1881. Remarks on the remedy for false doctrines advocated in, 119.
 1881. Printed minutes of, (smaller body,) 16.
 London, 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, 31, 1815.
 An exercise of, respecting Friends joining benevolent associations, &c., 198.
 Remarks on the beginning of departures from the doctrines and practices of Friends, 354.
 Ohio. Correction of a mis-statement in reference to, 100.
 Ohio, 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, 79, 118.
 Kansas, (smaller body,) 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, 135.
 (larger body,) 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, 176.
 Philadelphia, 1882. Address to the younger members of, on the approach of, 277.
 1882. Observations on the approach of, 287.
 1882. Notice of the proceedings of, 302.
 1874. Loving counsel of, to the young, 331.
 1795. An account of, 300.
 Remarks on the position of, in reference to this Yearly Meeting, 318, 343.
 Account of the establishment of meetings—"Primitive Friends" in the limits of, 359.
 Selections commended to the careful consideration of the younger members of, 41.
 Western. Notice of a suit at law respecting the, 69, 77, 85, 93.
 (smaller body,) 1881. Notice of the proceedings of, 111.
 Yearly Meeting. On the origin of correspondence between, and on the evidence it affords of fellowship, 9.
 Yosemite Valley. Observations on the, 218.
 "You that are young." Extract from a sketch of the life of Jonathan Lane entitled, 173.
 Young. Loving counsel to the, 331.
 Youth the time for improvement, 351.
 Zeal. Remarks on improving an intemperate, 142.
 Zeyher Zeel. Notice of a rich haul by a fisherman in the, 100.
 Zuni Indians. Account of the, 314.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 13, 1881.

NO. 1.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

John Tauler.

John Tauler was born in Strasburg near the end of the thirteenth century. It was about the time when Dante wrote his celebrated poems in Italy, and a little before the time of Wicliffe and Chaucer in England. It was a period of darkness in the religious world, but of unrest, in which here and there earnest souls were struggling after a higher Christian life. As these overcame the obstacles and resistances to spiritual progress which surrounded them, they attained a proportionate stature and strength, and their holy lives, and words and works were the more conspicuous for contrast with their surroundings.

Tauler was only a boy when the call of God came to him to devote his life to His service. To do this required a separation from the spirit of the world, which the Christian feeling of that age erroneously thought could only be secured by a monastic life. He therefore about the year 1308 left his family and friends, and home of wealth, and entered the convent of the (then young) Dominican Order in his native city. He thought in after years he might have served God better had he kept his wealth and used it for Him. But he regarded his monastic vows and monkish life as a blessing to him, in which he turned enthusiastically from the "hollowness of the world" to the joy of living and working for God.

He was soon sent to the Dominican College in Paris where Eckhardt had recently been teacher, to study theology and kindred sciences. He was a good student, but of such pursuits he was accustomed to say: "Those great masters of Paris do read vast books and turn over the leaves with great diligence, which is a very good thing, but the men enlightened by the Spirit, read the true, living book, wherein all things live."

After his course of study in Paris, he probably returned to his convent in Strasburg, and little is known of him for a number of years. These were doubtless years of preparation for the work before him.

In the year 1322, during a prolonged conflict between the civil and papal powers, the city of Strasburg was laid under the interdict of the Pope, and continued so for nearly twenty years. The state of things produced by such an act, and the suffering occasioned by it are difficult now to conceive. "The churches were closed, there was no public worship, no ministrations of the clergy, no church-bells tolled out their chimes, calling men to labor, to rest, and to prayer; no marriage-services, and the bodies of the dead were buried without religious rite." The Dominican and Franciscan Orders, however, were excepted, and allowed to perform clerical duties during the interdict. Tauler remained in the city when most of the clergy deserted it, and ministered consolation to the people. It was while engaged in this work in Strasburg in those troubled years, that he became distinguished as a Christian minister, and his fame spread abroad. He frequently made long journeys to other cities which were under the same excommunication.

In these journeys he made many friends, especially among those religious circles which Eckhardt had formed some years before in his missionary visits to the Rhineland. The Christian ladies Margaretha and Christine Ebner, were his steadfast friends, sympathizing with him, and cheering him in his laborious work. One of these spoke of him as "the holiest of God's children now living upon this earth," and said that "the spirit of God breathed through him, as sweet music through a lute." This was said before the great change he experienced, which has been called his "conversion."

Tauler's early life had been a tranquil one, without any record of "severe mental struggles with sin, and doubt, and temptation, ending in the victory of the grace of God over the human soul." But a great crisis now awaited him. In the midst of his popularity and prosperity, about the year 1340, it is said that "the great layman" Nicolas of Basle, was warned three times in his sleep that he should go to Strasburg and hear the far famed preacher. He came and heard Tauler five times. He saw that he was "a loving good-hearted man, of good understanding in the Scriptures, but dark as to the light of Grace." He then introduced himself to Tauler, told him he had come thirty leagues to hear him, and now wished to receive the communion at his hand. Tauler, perhaps flattered by such a request, willingly became his confessor. After twelve weeks Nicolas begged him to preach a sermon "Showing how a man may attain to the highest point it is given us to reach in this life."

Tauler answered, "Ah! dear son, what dost thou ask for?" "How shall I tell thee of such high things? For I ween thou wouldst understand but little thereof." Nicolas said—"Ah! dear master, even though I should understand little or nothing thereof, yet I cannot but thirst after it. Multitudes flock to hear you; if there were one among them all who could understand you, your labor were well bestowed."

Tauler consented, and announced when he would preach the sermon. Many people came, and the preacher in twenty-four articles gave the rules of a holy life. Nicolas went to his lodging and wrote from memory the whole sermon, word for word, and took it to Tauler. The latter was astonished by this proof of the superiority of the man whom he had taken to be a simple, ignorant peasant. Nicolas informed him he had not come hither for the good he expected to get out of his preaching, but in order "with God's help to give him some good counsel." He then dealt most faithfully with the sermon, and probed as with a keen lance the preacher's own life. "You are a great clerk," he said, "and have taught us a good lesson in this sermon; but you yourself do not live according to it." For himself, he said, "man's words have in many ways hindered me more than they have helped me. And for this reason, it often happened that when I came away from the sermon, I bought certain false notions away with me, which I hardly got rid of in a long while, with great toil; but if the highest Teacher of all truth shall come to a man, he must be empty and quit of all the things of time. When the same Master cometh to me, he teaches me more in one hour than you, or all the doctors from Adam to the judgment day, will ever do."

The conversations which followed are among the most remarkable on record. The unsparing faithfulness of Nicolas as he laid bare the hidden faults of Tauler before his eyes, and the humility and tenderness with which the latter was brought to submit himself to the treatment and counsel of his true friend, show the grandeur of the two men, and the purity and loftiness of a friendship which could bear such scrutiny and truthfulness.

Tauler besought Nicolas to tell him how he had attained to such a life. Nicolas replied that all the wondrous dealings of God with him a poor sinner, for the last twelve years, would be more than the largest book his hearer possessed would hold. The first thing that helped him was "a sincere and utterly self-surrendering humility." In such a state, he said, "God will not fail to give a man such exercises, by temptations and other trials, as He perceives to be profitable, and such as he is able to bear, if he is only willing."

In the beginning he had read German books about the lives of saints, and he began to exercise himself in the life of the saints, with such severities that he grew sick and was brought to death's door. In his sleep a voice reproved him saying, "Thou foolish man, if thou art bent on killing thyself before time, thou wilt have to bear a heavy punishment; but if thou dost suffer God to exercise thee, He could exercise thee better than thou can by thyself, or with the devil's counsel." At the mention of the devil he awoke in a fright, rose up, and walked to a wood, thinking he had indeed begun those self-imposed exercises without counsel. There he sought an old hermit and told him all that had happened to him. The hermit asked—"By whose counsel hast thou done these things?" He answered—"Of my own will." "Then know," said the hermit, "that it has been the devil's counsel. Thou must not obey him any more as long as thou livest, but utterly give thyself up to God." Thereupon Nicolas ceased from these exercises, and yielded himself and his doings altogether to God.

He did not have the Scriptures, as he was a layman, and the common people did not have the Bible then. He was, however, a quick learner by natural intelligence, and at one time the suggestion came into his mind that by earnest mental effort he might attain to some comprehension of Divine things. But he marked straightway that it was the devil's counsel, and put it from him. After that in his matins (his three o'clock morning devotions) he entreated, "O eternal and merciful God, that it were thy will to give me to discover something that should be above our sensual reasons!" Then he was affrighted that he had presumed to ask so great a favor. Abased with a sense of his unthankfulness and unworthiness, he confessed his sins, and plead for forgiveness. Such was his feeling of vileness and guilt that he threw off his garments and scourged himself until the blood ran down his shoulders. As the words of penitence remained on his heart and his lips till break of day, God had mercy on him so that his mind was filled with a clear understanding. "In that hour," said he, "I was deprived of my natural reason, and saw a supernatural mighty wonder and sign, and received more truth and more illumination in my understanding than all the teachers could ever teach me."

He applied the truth to Tauler so closely; showing him that he was trusting to his learning, and depending on his knowledge of the letter, and that he was seeking his own and not the glory of God; that he was still selfish and a Pharisee, that Tauler felt troubled and angry. This was used as a proof that he had not attained to the perfect life he had been preaching. Tauler was convicted and softened, and acknowledged himself a sinner, and resolved to live a better life, or die for it. He besought Nicolas to become his teacher. Nicolas disclaimed any power of himself to instruct or help any one, only as he should be enabled by the Holy Spirit. As an instance of such power conferred on mortals, he referred to Catharine of Alexandria, who at fourteen years of age was enabled to prevail over fifty of the great masters so that they went willingly to martyrdom. "The same spirit may be speaking to you now," said he to Tauler, "through me a poor sinner and unworthy man." Beginning at the primary lesson he set Tauler an alphabet of rules to learn in five weeks. He allowed him to be his own schoolmaster, and to chastise himself when he felt that he was not perfect in any one of those letters, and thought himself unable to learn it. The substance of this golden alphabet is embodied in the following lines.

(To be concluded.)

Oh, how many precious moments are wasted in softness and self-indulgence, in frivolous pursuits, in idle conversation, in vague and useless revelry, which, if rightly improved, might tell upon the world's destiny and the Redeemer's glory.—Clarke.

For "The Friend."

Our Floating Home.

How shall we at light expense enjoy the much-desired repose from business duties and the tension of American life, with the change of air and scene, which are more clearly perceived from year to year in this great bustling land of ours to be not the mere pleasure of summer so much as the annual tonic reaching farther and deeper and more wholesomely into our lives than medicine? How shall we combine with these—the gentle rest and pleasant change, and life in the open air,—the charm of social converse and congenial unflagging companionship? Such were the questions which presented themselves last winter to a city family, looking forward to the heat and exhaustion of summer; and remembering an account of a pleasant journey made two years before by a party of artists, over the Hudson and the Erie Canal, they concluded to make inquiry into the chance of securing for themselves a canal boat for an excursion up the Delaware and Lehigh rivers to Manch Chunk, and the conditions of necessity and convenience that would attach to it. A visit was accordingly made to the "Michael Uhler," a canal boat then frozen in at Bristol, Pa., superficial measurements made, as no access could be had to the interior, and the refusal had of her owner for her for some time between 6th mo. 15th and a month later.

The terms for the "Michael Uhler" were to be $6 per day for boat, mules and men, these finding themselves, and the towage from Vine St. wharf to Bristol, if required, was to be $3 each way. After due reflection this was required, and a party of twenty-five, ranging, except one younger child, from 15 to 28, with three of maturer years to carry in larger part the burden of prudence and responsibility for all, assembled in twos and threes at Uhler's wharf, between 9 and 10 A. M., 6th mo. 27th, 1881. Gathering had been made at various houses of sundry household furniture, implements and conveniences, with store of provisions of various kinds purchased, and a new oil stove of largest capacity, with head light oil, seemed to fill all anticipations of the light-hearted maidens who had banished by general consent all "domestic help," and asked for no better than to do the work themselves.* Three others boarded the "Michael Uhler" on her arrival at Bristol, bringing up the number of her passengers to twenty-eight; among whom were counted eight who are now or formerly were teachers, with whom sooner or later in the trip were associated three medical students. That evening and night were tests of harmony, patience and good nature, fairly met by all observed by the writer. The adjustments of the home-made hammocks and curtains between the apartments, &c., were new and untried; it was late before all practicable arrangements had been made for the night, and then came up a gentle rain, from which dropping ensued here and there from a deck assuredly not water-tight. Some crowding there was, but great good nature prevailed, and it is not known that any sickness resulted from the exposure.

Soon we moved calmly on towards Morrisville and the Delaware, which was not in sight after leaving Bristol, at a pace of 3 miles to

* A mistake—it would have been to the general relief to have with us a "domestic."

31 per hour; and here was our first surprise. With many of us, accustomed to the railroad near by and the general face of the country, there had been an anticipation that this portion of the route would be dull and monotonous, but it proved far otherwise, the gentle beauty of a populous agricultural district looked in upon us through the ever varying framework of graceful foliage which had grown to full stature along the canal, and seen over the glassy water, mirroring the heaven, own clouds and azure, it presented to us constantly renewed attraction. Farmhouses and bridges contributed from time to time to the picturesqueness of these views, and it was very noticeable that the interest felt in these quietly peaceful scenes had not been paled for our return by the majesty and greatness of mountain scenery. At Morrisville the boat turned northward along the Delaware, and for miles the view embraced a more extended prospect,—the river with the canal, and the adjacent scenery, became more rolling and hilly as we approached Easton. To return,—the night of the 27th was spent above Yardleyville, at which point a young friend who had visited us during the day joined us for the trip. Throughout the excursion our captain, Jacob Smith, exhibited a commendable concern always to select our halting places for the night at secluded points, and especially at a distance from centres of rough population; and the driver, "Alec" [Elkanah] Kiesel and himself, proved alike courteous, attentive and careful in their language.

Third-day, the 28th. With a bright pleasant morning we moved forward about 4.30, we passed New Hope at about 8 to 9,—causing there a half hour and receiving a call from a group of friends living near the town, who seemed much interested in our dwelling, our arrangements and our prospects. At Ulsterstown we found Michael Uhler, owner of the vessel, living in a handsome residence, with pleasant grounds, &c., hard by the canal; his fleet of boats is large, and his monthly dues to the canal are said to reach $5000. In the dusk we passed "the Narrows," a bit of magnificent scenery on the Delaware, whose very name had been unknown to us, and to which we agreed to devote some hours of daylight on the return. Usually on the way up, our boat kept on till 9 or 10 P. M., starting again in the very early morning; on the return, we stopped at different points early in the evening, and allowed ourselves two or three pleasant hours of twilight on the adjacent green sward.

Fourth-day the 29th. At about 9.30 A. M., we rounded the rocks at the mouth of the Lehigh, and entered the Lehigh Canal. From Easton to Bethlehem is a reach of the canal embracing much river scenery of great beauty and variety, with here and there great iron works at intervals, as Glendon, &c., so that natural scenery and some of the most imposing commercial constructions of men combined to give a new and peculiar interest to this lovely section of our route. In the early afternoon we reached Bethlehem, and almost the entire party visited the Bethlehem Steel Works, nearly the largest in the Union, worked on the Bessemer process. Here great reservoirs or basins of melted steel were seen returning to the furnace for the last stage of purification, and their splendid incandescence recoiled to the heat the novices most impatient of it. We were also shown the successive rolling of steel rails from the shapeless of red-hot steel to the finished bar or rail, those simultaneous cutting to regulation length by saws at each end, gives forth a brilliant and copious shower of sparks flying like meteors in every direction.

Fifth-day, the 30th. Passed Allentown about sunrise, and before the multitudinous wheels of business life were fairly stirring, we reached Cataqua in the early morning, and found the Crane Iron Works adjacent to the canal. There we visited in force and saw the usual machinery for casting pig iron, a double steam engine, with fly wheel of 30 feet diameter, vividly recalling in its massive proportions and majestic movement the great brilliant steam engine of the Centennial Exhibition. Here also we climbed to the level of the summit of the blast chimney, and besides enjoying a fine view from that height, we saw a method of delivery into the chimney itself of the ore and the ingredients needed to extract the metal from it. The nominal production of these works is 75,000 tons of pig iron per year—the actual, 45,000, with three blast furnaces. As the works originated with the elder Thomas of the neighboring Thomas Iron Works, they embrace one of the oldest furnaces in the country, with appliances of the oldest style, while on the other hand an immense new furnace is in construction now, with the most advanced of modern methods and contrivances.

During this day we passed through the beautiful and picturesque Lehigh Gap, too little known perhaps to justify description, but passing anew to those of us most familiar with it.

As evening drew nigh, the fertile, rolling and often hilly country which lies north of the Lehigh Gap, gave place to wooded mountains fertile and seemingly of no monied value except for the prospect of value in the young trees, whose predecessors have long ago yielded to the axe the accumulated stores of centuries; and by sun-down a secluded bay in the canal was reached just below the iron bridge of the Lehigh Valley R. R., which crosses both river and canal in successive spans. This little bay, a widening to receive the rapid and large feeder of the canal falling into it in a pretty cascade, had on its right the untrodden mountain side covered with foliage and rocky masses with their debris, to the foot, and on its left the width of the canal and tow path, making a beautiful and secluded home or abiding place, three-fourths of a mile below Mauch Chunk, and out of sight from the town, while hemmed in all around by the silent majesty of "the everlasting hills," and this was our delightful home during the three days of our stay, well-chosen, and as it proved, altogether exempt from intrusion.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

A Worldly Spirit.

Christian professors who are yet in league with the spirit of the world, allow so much of the fullness of their hearts to escape at their lips and to be demonstrated in their lives, that those around them, especially tenderly visited minds, are oftentimes greatly discouraged and stumbled. These, instead of finding that every one who names the name of Christ has departed from iniquity and that they are able and willing to lend a helping hand to those just commencing the journey to Zion, find, on the contrary, with a few exceptions, that such have either never entered the straight gate and the narrow way, or else, like "Pliable" in Pilgrim's Progress, they have been so warped aside as to take up with a rest short of the true rest and which is not of the Lord's preparing. In effect —"Drifting with the current, living to themselves alone."

These awakened ones see so much of a worldly spirit among such professors of the religion of Jesus, that they are almost persuaded to give up all they have felt and seen to be required of them as void of reality or but an empty name. If, say they, one can glide along in a worldly-wise religion that involves no sacrifice of self, no meekness and lowliness of heart, no subjugation of the will, no taking Christ's yoke upon us, no crucifixion unto death of the natural man, no mortifying cross, no thoroughly cleansing baptism; in short that a way has been found to reconcile the commands of God and the approbation of the world, the amusements of time with the interests of eternity, the expectation of every thing hereafter while giving up nothing here; then what is the use of a life of self-denial or of swimming against the current of the world and its spirit? If such see or hear but little more from many professors of the name of Christ, than what shall we eat or drink; where-withal shall we be clothed; what is the state of stocks and trade; is there any thing new in business circles; or at what fashionable resort is there the most room for display, and the most pleasure to be found? how are they to reconcile it with the demands of a crucified yet risen and glorified Lord Jesus, that the government of ourselves must be wholly upon his shoulders, and that nothing less than the heart and affections will be accepted as a living sacrifice and whole burnt-offering upon his altar!

While it is not only allowable but our duty, to provide for our temporal needs—"provide things honest in the sight of all men"—at the same time these must be kept subordinate to the great business. The cares as well as the riches and pleasures of this life are, by our blessed Lawgiver, compared to thorns; which are not only wholly fruitless, but they choke, and tear, and wound. The love of them manifests a worldly spirit. They are, when immoderately pursued, inconsistent with a work of grace, and destructive to a growth in it. As no man can serve two masters, and as there will never be a shorter or smoother pathway to heaven than that which was opened by the Saviour to Nicodemus, John iii. 3, an indulgence in them will proportionally retard and abate the light and comfort of our souls. It will prevent the great truths of redeeming love from being duly perceived, much less appreciated. The eye-sight of spiritual discovery becoming more and more dimmed as respects the giving way to a worldly spirit, individuals, perhaps, insensibly yet increasingly become stumbling blocks, instead of way-marks to others.

A form of godliness without the power (2 Tim. iii. 5), we apprehend is very prevalent in the present day. When this is accompanied with an amiable benevolent disposition, with warm natural affections and engaging manners, it may, without close self-inspection and watchfulness unto prayer, deceive alike the influencer and the influenced. It has been suggestively said, that "we are called to a much more holy state than is generally considered by high professors a safe one." When secret prayer is neglected; when the life and power of Christ in the inner man is overlooked; when knowledge in the head is more cultivated than grace in the heart; when we are ignorant of that new birth without which no man can see God; we cannot be other, notwithstanding all our profession and reputation among men, than as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal in the sight of an omniscient, infallible Judge. How responsible such mere professors—"having the form of godliness without the power"—become for that talent of influence so steadily operating and so calculated to deceive others! How vigilant should these and all be to have their treasure laid up in heaven; to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness; and then would their hearts, their conversation, their attractiveness, be there and thereunto also. But is it not painfully manifest, that too much out of the abundance of an unrenewed heart and a worldly spirit the mouth speaketh and the tongue uttereth; while the fruit indicates the tree. Too many speak as though their tongues were their own; and as though no account would have to be rendered to Him who "created the fruit of the lips." How many, moreover, seem to forget that life is most uncertain; that a judgment awaits where errors are irrevocable; and that eternity is never ending.

The gifted Hannah More in an "Allegory" entitled "The Pilgrims," vividly portrays what a fast hold the things of time and sense, in other words, the worldly spirit, have gotten of the beguiled citizens of earth; and no less how it strikes a stranger to see the general infatuation that prevails! She says: "I observed that these pilgrims, instead of being upon the watch, lest they should be ordered off unprepared; instead of laying up any provisions, or even making memorandums of what they would be likely to want at the end of their journey, spent most of their time in crowds, either in the way of traffic or diversion. At first, when I saw them so much engaged in conversing with each other, I thought it a good sign, and listened attentively to their talk, not doubting but the chief turn of it would be about the climate, or treasures, or society, they should probably meet with in the far country. I supposed they might be also discussing about the best and safest road to it, and that each was availing himself of the knowledge of his neighbor, on a subject of equal importance to all. I listened to every party, but in scarcely any did I hear one word about the land to which they were bound, though it was their home, the place where their whole interest, expectation and inheritance lay; to which also great part of their friends were gone before, and whither they were sure all the rest would follow. Instead of this, their whole talk was about the business, or the pleasures, or the fashions of the strange but bewitching country which they were merely passing through, and in which they had not one foot of land which they were sure of calling their own for the next quarter of an hour. What little estate they had was personal, and not real, and that was a mortgaged, life-hold tenement of clay, not properly their own, but only lent them on a short uncertain lease, of which three-score years and ten was considered as the longest period, and very few indeed lived in it to the end of the term; for this was always at the will of the lord, part of whose prerogative it was, that he could take away the lease at pleasure, knock down the stoutest tenant at a single blow, and turn out the poor shivering, helpless inhabitant naked, to that far country for which he had made no provision."

For "The Friend."

It is at all times encouraging to find efforts for the amelioration of the condition of the oppressed in any situation in life are appreciated by those for whose benefit they are designed. Finding among the papers and letters of John Pemberton, that have been copied for preservation, the following statement by the colored people of London, it was thought it would be interesting to the readers of "The Friend."

Extract from a letter of Daniel Mildred to John Pemberton, dated London, 10th mo. 28th, 1785.

A number of blacks, eight or ten, came to our last Meeting for Sufferings, and three Friends were deputed to go down to them, to whom they gave a paper testifying their grateful acknowledgments for the kindness and diligence of the Society on their behalf. They said they were deputed to wait on the Society in behalf of the whole.

"To the truly worthy society of gentlemen called Friends:

"Gentlemen,—By reading your book entitled Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies, concerning the calamitous state of the enslaved negroes: We, the poor oppressed and much degraded Africans, who are here met, desire to approach you with this address of thanks, with our inmost love and warmest acknowledgment, and with the deepest sense of your benevolence, unwearied labor, kind interposition and laudable attempts which, under God, you have made towards breaking the yoke of slavery, and to administer a little comfort and ease to thousands and tens of thousands of very grievously afflicted and too heavily burdened negroes.

"Gentlemen, could you by perseverance at last be enabled, upler God, to lighten in any degree the heavy burden of the afflicted, no doubt it will in some measure be the possible means of saving the souls of many of the oppressors; and if so, sure we are, that the God whose eyes are ever upon all his creatures, and always rewards every true act of virtue and regards the prayers of the oppressed, will give you and yours those blessings which are not in the power of us mortals to express or conceive, which we as a part of those captivated, oppressed and afflicted people most devoutly wish and pray. Presented by Gustavus Vassa, and seven others, the 21st of Oct. 1785."

Gustavus Vassa was a native of "that part of Africa known by the name of Guinea, extending along the coast about 3400 miles from Senegal to Angola, and includes a variety of kingdoms," was born in 1745, consequently at the time of the presentation of the above address was about 40 years of age. He, when about 11 years old, with a young sister, were stolen from his father's family, who was a man of rank, and placed with many others of his poor country people on shipboard, but under deck "in a loathsome horrible place, in which situation he says he wished for death, and sometimes refused to eat, for which we were beaten." After enduring many hardships they arrived at Barbadoes; was afterwards sent to America, purchased by Captain Pascall, and sent on board his ship, called the Industrious Bee; it was on this ship he received the name of Gnastarus Vassa. He says in his account of his life, "Having often seen my master and a lad named Richard Baker, who was very kind to me, reading in books, I had a desire to do so, that I might find out how all things had a beginning. For that purpose I often took a book, talked to it, and then placed it to my ear to hear what it would say; but when I found it remained silent I was much concerned." He afterwards obtained a knowledge of reading; by his own industry and faithfulness acquired the means to purchase his freedom, and made several voyages as a sailor. "It is stated by Gregorie, in his inquiry into the intellectual and moral faculties of the negroes, that after thirty years of a wandering and stormy life, Vassa established himself in London, married, published his memoirs, which have several times been reprinted; in 1789, he presented a petition to Parliament for the suppression of the slave trade." He himself says, "Having been early taught to look for the hand of God in minute circumstances, they have been of consequence to me; and aiming at simple truth in relating the incidents of my life, I hope some of my readers will gain instruction from them."

The foregoing account of G. V. is extracted principally from a volume entitled, "Colored Americans," where a fuller account may be found. W. P. T.

DIVINE ORDER.

'Tis first the true, and then the beautiful,
Not first the beautiful, and then the true;
First the wild moor, with rock and reed and pool,
Then the gay garden, rich in scent and hue.

'Tis first the good, and then the beautiful,
Not first the beautiful and then the good;
First the rough seed, sown in the rougher soil,
Then the flower-blossom, or the branching wood.

Not first the glad, and then the sorrowful,
But first the sorrowful, and then the glad;
Tears for a day—for earth of tears is full—
Then we forget that we were ever sad.

Not first the bright, and after that the dark,
But first the dark, and after that the bright;
First the thick cloud, and then the rainbow's arc,
First the dark grave, then resurrection light.

'Tis first the night—stern night of storm and war,
Long nights of heavy clouds and veiled skies—
Then the far sparkle of the morning star
That bids the saints awake, and dawn arise,

—Bonar.

HELPING PAPA AND MAMMA.

Planting the corn and potatoes,
Helping to scatter the seeds;
Feeding the hens and the chickens,
Freeing the garden from weeds;
Driving the cows to the pasture,
Feeding the horse in the stall;
We little children are busy;
Sure there is work for us all,
Helping papa.

Spreading the hay in the sunshine,
Raking it up when it's dry;
Picking the apples and peaches,
Down in the orchard hard by;
Picking the grapes in the vineyard,
Gathering nuts in the Fall,
We little children are busy;
Yes, there is work for us all,
Helping papa.

Sweeping, and washing the dishes,
Bringing the wood from the shed;
Ironing, sewing and knitting,
Helping to make up the bed;
Taking good care of the baby,
Watching her lest she should fall;
We little children are busy;
Oh, there is work for us all,
Helping mamma.

Work makes us cheerful and happy,
Makes us both active and strong;
Play we enjoy all the better
When we have labored all long.
Gladly we help our kind parents,
Quickly we come at their call;
Children should love to be busy;
There is much work for us all,
Helping papa and mamma.

From the "National Baptist."

AN ALLEGORY.

One lovely autumn day,
I slowly wandered through a garden fair,
The beds were gay with many bright-hued flowers,
And birds were warbling in the shady bowers
Tornad by the rising trees,
While butterflies and bees,
And myriad other winged things
Made the soft air
Hum with the music of their wings.

I gazed around
Entranced with all this beauty, when my eye
Fell on a vine that climbed a trellis high.
Its graceful symmetry
And green, luxuriant foliage thrilled my sense
Of harmony in nature, and methought,
"It now is vintage time; ere I go hence,
I'll taste the luscious fruit." Quick, then, I sought
Beneath the leaves to find the clusters rare,
I knew must hide beneath their grateful shade,
But not a single one was there!

I stood amazed.
"What meaneth this?" I cried. "O lovely vine,
Why on your branches seek I fruit, and find
Not e'en a single grape? Hast thou no root
In this fair soil, and reach strong thy tendrils twine,
And thy green leaves wave wanton in the wind?
Oh, say, hast thou done right,
In making such requite
To him who placed thee here, surrounded thee
With all this beauty, bade thee grow
And blossom and bear fruit?"

Then, methought,
A shudder ran through all the vine,
Low drooped its leaves upon their stems,
Prone on the ground its branches fell,
And trailed themselves in dust. While from their midst
Came ever and anon a mournful wail,
That to my strained and listening ear
At length took form in words.

"Too late, too late,
My fruiting-time is past!
O cruel, cruel fate,
That I must hear, at last,
The awful sound:
'Cut ye it down; why cumberest it the ground?'
Oh, why—but yet the fault is mine,
For all this fair summer have I spent my strength
In adding leaf to leaf, to beautify
Myself; and putting forth
New tendrils, that might twine
On high, and lift above the earth,
With all its low-born, grovelling things,
My haughty head. O foolish, foolish pride!
Alas! it is my pride has brought me low.
Henceforth, there's nought for me but shame and woe."

Then ceased the voice. My dream was past,
And I awoke.
But to my soul it spoke
In warning tones: "Heed thou, that at the last,
The summer ended and the harvest past,
It be not thine to hear the awful sound,
'Cut ye it down; why cumberest it the ground?'"

We are surrounded by an unseen world of spiritual reality, which is opened to us only as we grow into it.

For "The Friend."

William Penn's Remains.

The following letter from the Trustees of burial ground of Friends, known as Jordan's, in the County of Buckinghamshire, England, to George L. Harrison, giving their sons for declining to permit William Penn's remains to be removed to Philadelphia, is an interesting one to members of our religious society, and especially so to those who reside in Philadelphia. The grounds of refusal are quite sufficient; in fact, the proposition was the first savored somewhat of pre-emption, as the descendants of Penn are numerous and most of them living in England. France, would naturally demand at the transfer of their ancestor's ashes to a foreign land. To George L. Harrison, Commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania: The trustees of Jordan's Meeting House and burial ground received the applications made on behalf of the Governor and Legislature of Pennsylvania for permission to remove the remains of William Penn, supposing that they yet stood from their resting place to the city of Philadelphia. The trustees of the said burial ground have carefully considered the application, not only from their own standpoint as members of the Society of Friends, but in a passionate and cosmopolitan spirit, and they have arrived at the conclusion that it is their duty to refuse it. They respectfully submit the following considerations which appear to them to justify the course they are determined to adopt:

"The quiet and retired spot in which the remains of William Penn at present rest were selected by him during the vigor of his life as a burial place of himself and his family. He here surrounded by his two wives and five children, and many of his most intimate friends, the trustees believe that the choice thus made was altogether in accordance with the temple of his mortifications life. They believe, also, that the removal of his remains to transatlantic home, amid the pomp and circumstance of a State ceremonial, accompanied all probability by military honors and parade, would be utterly repugnant to his own character and sentiments. The Society of Friends, to whom the burial ground Jordan's belongs, and for whom the trustees are now called upon to act, have always objected to the use of elaborate monumental monuments.

"For more than a century a rough plan of a graveyard was the only available clue to a spot where the remains of William Penn and his family were laid. Guided by this, about twenty years ago small headstones, bearing the names of the interred and the date of burial, were placed over the existing mounds, but it is more than doubtful whether they indicate in each case the exact spot of interment. It need hardly be said that the memory of William Penn is honored and revered among the Society of Friends in England as sincerely as in America, and the trustees cannot admit that America possesses a priority of claim to the custody of his remains.

"It is true that he became the successful ruler of the State of Pennsylvania, and at the great sagacity and unswerving Christian principle which guided his transactions as a colonist and Governor have gained for him the respect and admiration of the civilized world; but William Penn was born and died in England. In England his religious character was mainly formed. In England he was engaged for many years as a minister of the Gospel, and became conspicuous among the founders of a society the influence of which has been largely exercised for good, both in this country and America, and lastly, it was here that he dared to suffer persecution for his religious profession, and took his part manfully in laying the foundation of that system of religious liberty which we now enjoy.

"The trustees are desirous of fulfilling in all respects the wishes of the Society with whose interests they are intrusted, but with this reservation they consider that they are the sole custodians of Jordan's Burial Ground. They have received communications from many influential members of the Society of Friends, and also from most of the lineal descendants of William Penn on both sides of the Atlantic, earnestly desiring that the proposal made by the Legislature of Pennsylvania may not be acceded to, and they believe that they are supported in the decision that they have arrived at by the opinion of a very large proportion of those who have a right to be consulted in the matter.

"The trustees think that in carrying out the project one link in the chain which unites the two countries would be broken. Their desire is that the bond may be strengthened, and that the only rivalry existing between them may be in the promotion of those things which tend to peace and amity and the extension of the Redeemer's Kingdom. It is, therefore, from no feeling of discourtesy toward those who initiated the movement, but from a strong conviction of the soundness of the objections herein stated that they feel themselves compelled to refuse the application. Signed on behalf of the committee appointed by the Monthly Meeting, and of the trustees of Jordan's estate, by

RICHARD LITTLEBOY, Newport Pagnell.

THEODORE HARRIS, Leighton Buzzard.

HENRY BROWN, Luton.

JOHN E. LITTLEBOY, Watford.

11th of the 7th month, 1881.

Symphony of England with America.

[The English correspondent of the National Baptist thus touchingly refers to the warm interest in our welfare felt by our brethren across the Atlantic. May the Lord hasten the day when from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, it can be said with sincere acceptance of its truth, "All we are brethren."]

Had there been a doubt as to the oneness of the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon family, that doubt would have been entirely dissipated and entirely destroyed by the manner in which all classes everywhere in this country received the announcement of the desperately wicked attack on the life of your President, and the anxiety with which inquiries are made respecting the state of your wounded chief. President Garfield is an object of universal concern. I remember when, on more than one occasion, our Queen was shot at. Even then the people were not more deeply touched than they are by the narrow escape, if it should turn out to be an escape, of President Garfield from assassination. We share your sorrow and are not less solicitous than you. The telegrams are read with eager interest. Favorable bulletins from physicians and surgeons in attendance are read with brightening countenances, while doubtful news cast a gloom on all readers. England and America are no longer twain, but one people, with common interests, united, not only by the cable which flashes messages thither and hither, but also, and still more, by the stronger bands of brotherly love. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on this side of the Atlantic, joins the great Republic, west of the Atlantic, in the earnest and, I trust, "effectual prayer" that the Lord would preserve the life of President Garfield, restore him to strength, and enable him so to act during his presidential term that the Republic shall honor him as the equal in patriotism and service of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

The Methodist Bodies of the World.

1. Methodist Episcopal Church, . . .	1,743,000
2. Methodist Episcopal Church, South, . . .	847,703
3. Wesleyan Methodist Church, . . .	528,382
4. African Methodist Episcopal Church, . . .	215,000
5. Primitive Methodist Church, . . .	138,913
6. African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, . . .	191,000
7. United Brethren in Christ, . . .	157,800
8. Methodist Church of Canada, . . .	122,955
9. Methodist Protestant Church, . . .	113,400
10. Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, . . .	112,300
11. Evangelical Association, . . .	112,200
12. United Free Methodists, . . .	79,477
13. Australasian Wesleyan Methodists, . . .	69,297
14. Bible Christians, . . .	38,405
15. New Connection Methodists, . . .	30,853
16. Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada, . . .	28,070
17. American Wesleyan Connection, . . .	25,000
18. Free Methodist Church, . . .	12,600
19. Congregational Methodist Church, . . .	10,000
20. Wesleyan Reform Union, . . .	7,728
21. African Union Methodist Protestant, . . .	2,500
22. Independent Methodist Churches, . . .	2,500
23. British Methodist Episcopal Church, . . .	2,100
24. Union American Meth. Epis. Church, . . .	2,000
25. United Free Gospel Churches, . . .	2,000

4,650,183

In one hundred years the Methodists have increased from about 55,000 members in 1780, to 4,630,780.—Richmond Chris. Advocate.

In England and Wales there are 170 denominations, with 45,000 places of worship, and upward of 14,000,000 sittings. There are 36,000 stated ministers, of whom 23,000 are clergy in the Church of England. The communicants number about 3,000,000, and the average First-day attendance at church is 10,000,000.

The Catholic Bishop of Warsaw is making strenuous efforts to induce his people to take an interest in the poor Jews, who are now being so persecuted in southern Russia. He acknowledges that the Jews, like other people, have their sins, but declares that the punishment of them belongs to God and not to man, and pleads with his people not to usurp divine prerogatives and offend deity. He calls the attention of his flock to the fact that in the past the Church took the Jews under its protection, though they were unfaithful to the Church, and that Popes took measures against their aggressors. These statements do not altogether accord with history, for many of the past persecutions of the Jewish race occurred in the most Catholic countries. But this kindness is certainly in place while the southern Russians are so barbarous toward the poor Jews, and the latter appreciate it, for after the issue of this pastoral letter the representatives of the Jewish community waited on the apostolic delegate and expressed to him their gratitude for his interest and intervention on their behalf.—Ch. Advocate.

Not satisfied with the Nihilistic agitations, the Russian peasants are commencing religious disputations. The Russians received their Christianity from the Greeks, who have a genius for hair-splitting in these matters, and thus the various Russian sects display a great inclination for dogmatic distinctions. In a certain district not less than 1,500 lately left the National Church in one body, and went over to a sect having no priests. This is contrary to law, but when the disaffection carries off so large a body, the Government can do little else than close its eyes to the performance. Some few of the local governments have not the wisdom to do this, and in their efforts to retain their people in the State Church against their will, stir up a species of rebellion that is more difficult to meet than political discontent. When these conflicts occur the peasants turn out in large masses to listen to disputations from the opposing teachers, and all else is forgotten in this strife. This is now increasing greatly in southern Russia, and bids fair to make trouble for the State, especially as the National priests are meeting it in a harsh way, and are thus far beaten in the strife.—Chr. Adv.

Scriptures in Asia.—An agent of the American Bible Society says: "At Teheran I had the pleasure of meeting a British military officer who has spent twenty years in the India service, and is familiar with affairs in the Punjab district. He has recently been traveling in Northeastern Persia, visiting Meshed and penetrating to the Afghan and Turkistan borders. There he found copies of the Scriptures in Persian and Tikki-Turkoman. There a man had called upon him who represented himself as a Mussulman in name, but really a Jew, who like his brethren had been compelled to profess Mohammedanism, or suffer death or banishment. He said that, through the colporteurs of the American priests in Teheran (the Presbyterian missionaries), a New Testament had found its way into his hands; that his eyes had been opened, and he had come to believe in Christianity as the only true religion. He said that he was selling the Scriptures on his own account; that he had bought up a number from the colporteurs sent from Teheran, and was selling them at an advance. This is certainly very interesting and encouraging, and it comes from an unlooked-for quarter."—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Travelling Stones.—A correspondent sends us the following explanation of this phenomenon. The movement appears to take place only where the shore or shores have a gradual slope, with shallow water for some distance out, and when the surface has continued frozen all across for some weeks. The stones or boulders are found in the shallow water, or on the nearly level shore. The movement is always away from the middle of the pond or lake, as shown by the mud or soil being pushed before them in that direction; also by the grooves they leave behind. The intense cold, at zero or below, for days together, causes the ice to contract, and being anchored at the shores, it must give way between, and the water running in and freezing, would close the cracks so formed. As the season advances and the sun has more effect, the ice expands in the day time, causing a motion shorewards, and contracts during the night, renewing the cracking and freezing. Any loose stones or rocks projecting above the soil, so as to be frozen to the ice, if not too heavy, would move with it. The alternate action described above, might move them a considerable distance during the season, and leave them there when the ice melted. If the nature of the soil was suitable, the marks would remain for some time.

It will be noticed the "travelling" only occurs after a continuance of steady cold weather, allowing the ice to become thick and solid enough to withstand the side pressure. But when the ice is thin enough to yield, or where the nature of the shore prevents the movement of the ice there, changes of temperature, &c., produce a different effect. The expansion of the ice causes it to bulge and crack, and the filling in with new ice prevents the surface becoming level again, which, combined with the cracking and filling produced by the periods of contraction, eventually form ridges, which cause much trouble to travellers in the far North while crossing the frozen rivers and lakes.

Leeches.—In 1841 H. Witte established a small leech farm in Kent Avenue, Williamsburg, L. I. In the course of time this small establishment was abandoned, and one of thirteen acres was established near Newtown, L. I. The breeding ponds consist of oblong squares of one and a half acres each. The bottoms of these ponds are of clay, the margins of peat. In June the leeches begin forming their cocoons on the peat margins of the ponds.

The greatest enemies to the young leeches are musk-rats, water-rats, and water-shrews, who dig the cocoons out of the soft peat breeding margins. Next to rats and shrews is over-heating of the peat or the water of the pond. In fact, nothing is so fatal to leeches as a too high temperature. H. Witte says he has had leeches frozen in solid ice, but by slowly dissolving the ice and gradually increasing the temperature of the water the leeches sustained no injury. The depth of the water in the ponds during the summer is three feet; in winter time the depth of the water is increased to avoid freezing.

The leeches are fed every six months on fresh blood placed in thin linen bags, which are suspended in the water. The leeches, as soon as they smell the blood, assemble from all parts of the pond, and attaching themselves to the outside of the bag, suck the dissolving coagulated blood through the linen. Digestion proceeds very slowly with the leech, during which time the blood remaining undigested in the stomach of the leech is in a fluid state as if just taken in. The excremental deposits are of a grass-green color. The best substance for packing leeches in is the peat of their natural ponds made into a stiff mud. Water containing tannin, tannic acid, lime, salt, or brackish water must be guarded against always; iron is not objectionable, but is an advantage in small quantities.

The demand for leeches in the last few years has somewhat fallen off in the Eastern and Southern States. The Western States and California are now the heaviest buyers. H. Witte's sales alone average a thousand a day.

The number of leeches imported to this country amounts to about thirty thousand yearly.

The custom of stripping and salting leeches to cause them to disgorge after having been applied, has passed away, as many well established cases have occurred of infection diseases having been communicated on the application of the same leech to a second party. A very popular error exists that leech, when applied, takes only the bad blood (whatever that may be) and rejects the good (this is a mistake). With a leech blood is blood, be it the cold blood of a fish or the warm blood of a human being, no matter how diseased that human may be. So long as blood is not tainted or putrid the leech will thrive on it. The proprietor of a large leech-breeding establishment at the foot of the Har mountains, when wishing to feed his leeches was in the habit of hiring poor laborers, at six cents per day, to stand in the water for half an hour nearly up to their thighs till the leeches might obtain a full gorging of human blood. In the marshy lands of Romania the wild leeches are captured by means of men entering the water and allowing the wild leeches to fasten on to their naked bodies. The leech fishers then strip them off after reaching the shore.—Scientific American.

The History of Cochineal.—Cochineal (Spanish coccinilla, originally the name of the coccin insect, used in dyeing,) is a substance used in dyeing crimson and scarlet, and is employed in the preparation of the colors carmine and lake. It consists of the bodies of insects of the Coccus cacti, which feed on plants of the cactus family, particularly on the cochineal plants, nearly allied to the prickly pear.

The cochineal plant is a native of the warm parts of America, and is cultivated for the sake of the valuable insect which feeds on it. This cultivation was practised by the Mexicans long before the country was known to Europeans. It is now carried on also in part of the West Indies and Peru, and in the Canary Islands, where it forms a very important article of commerce with Europe and the United States. The cochineal insect is very small, a pound of cochineal being estimated to contain not less than 70,000 in a dried state. The male is of a deep red color, and has white wings. The female is wingless, and of a deep brown color, covered with a white powdery fat underneath, convex above. The cultivator procures branches laden with the insect and keeping the branches till the mother insects have laid their eggs, he places the bodies, with the eggs, in little nests formed, some cottony substance upon the cochineal plants, and the young insects, when hatched spread themselves over them.

The gathering of the cochineal is very tedious, and is accomplished by brushing it from branches with some soft brush, such as that of a squirrel. The insects are killed by boiling water, by heating in ovens, or by exposure to the sun. They must be quickly killed, to prevent them from laying the eggs, which diminishes their value. When killed and dried, they may be kept for almost any length of time without injury.

Cochineal is used for dyeing wool and silk scarlet and crimson. The colors are very brilliant, but not durable. They are easily spotted by water and alkalis. The mordant used are alum, cream of tartar, and tin salt.

Use temporal things but desire eternal.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 13, 1881.

The commencement of a new volume naturally reminds those who conduct this journal, the objects at which it aims, and the ends to be pursued in obtaining them.

The promotion of the kingdom of God in the world is the most noble object that can be before any one, and the more fully we brought into that kingdom ourselves, and it established in our hearts, the more earnest will be our concern that others also may know the government of their lives to be on the shoulders of the blessed Redeemer, that they may acknowledge Him in all their ways—so that the kingdoms of this world may be truth become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and the poetic vision realized—

Rivers of gladness water all the earth,
And clothe all climes with beauty;
One song employs all nations; and all cry,
"Worthy the Lamb, for He was slain for us!"
The dwellers in the vales and on the rocks
Shout to each other, and the mountain tops
From distant mountains catch the flying joy;
'Till, nation after nation, through the strain,
Earth rolls the rapturous Hosanna round.

Therefore we gladly welcome those contributions to our pages which call the attention of the reader to the necessity of personal piety; which turn him to the light of Christ's heart, to which all his deeds and thoughts should be submitted, and which reprove the evil; which impress the need of communion with God in the secret of the heart, where that which may be known of Him is manifested, and where a saving acquaintance with Him may be obtained,—as Saviour himself declared, "This is life now to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent;" and which in him from being ensnared by the spirit of the world that draws the affections to its worldly pleasures, "The lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life." Such contributions, when they spring from a living concern in the writers, are calculated to stir up the pure mind by way of embracement, and are often blessed by the Lord of all good.

Because we believe the pure, spiritual views of religion advocated by George Fox and the members of our Society, are true, and calculated to promote the present and national happiness of mankind, therefore we never to be found among those who obey injunction of the apostle, to "contentedly rest for the faith once delivered to the saints."

We cannot look with approval on those agencies which many are endeavoring to induce in our manner of holding meetings; worship; and which are manifested by adoption of what are called "revival" methods, and by the inevitable departure from principles of Friends which is sooner or later developed in those who enter on this service. Yet we desire to be preserved from anything like a feeling of personal animosity towards those who are travelling in this way; for we believe they have often been seduced by a desire to promote spiritual circles where it was greatly wanting, thus have been led to enter on labors and methods into which the Lord did not lead them, and so being deceived themselves have gradually become instruments in leading others astray. It has been said, that there is to be found in Babylon the likeness of everything that is in Zion. How much then are they to be pitied, who have partaken of the wine of Babylon's cup, persuading themselves that it was the wine of the Kingdom of Heaven!

It cannot be expected that any journal which manifests decided convictions on important subjects in which there is a living interest, should escape censure from those whose sentiments are different. It has not therefore been especially discouraging, though a source of regret, to meet with a share of obloquy. Some months ago, one in the station of a minister, in a public Quarterly Meeting, openly denounced "The Friend," warning his hearers against receiving or reading it, and making charges which we believe it would be impossible for him to sustain. We addressed to him a respectful letter, asking for the grounds of his uneasiness; for, as we did not wish him to remain under mistaken impressions, so we were desirous of being instructed ourselves if we had inadvertently gone astray in any particular. To this letter no reply has been received; so that it remains a mere matter of conjecture with us, as to the motives which have impelled this person to go up and down speaking evil of others.

On the other hand, we have been cheered by many evidences both oral and written, that the course of "The Friend" has been satisfactory, and its contents comforting to sincere seekers after the Truth. One of these writing from Kansas says:—"I have been about four years since I commenced reading 'The Friend,' and I have often secretly wished that I could say something that might be of strength and comfort to those who have the care and management of that journal, so that in the midst of all the tide of drifting influences there should be some who might continue to be stayed upon the unchanging and immutable doctrines and principles of the Gospel." He adds that he had been a reader of "some other" journals of Friends for many years, and that "when the wave-tide of change which has made such shatters in the meetings of different localities began to be seen," there was "no voice of warning raised to caution the unwary."

We desire to bear in mind that "The Friend" is designed to be a family paper, which shall contain matter of interest and instruction for those of different ages; so that it may be a useful assistant in the education of the young, and furnish general information of scientific discoveries and other matters which may tend to develop the mental powers and furnish a supply of useful knowledge. It is encouraging to know that its circulation for several years past has been gradually increasing; and from the belief we entertain that its weekly visits are calculated to be useful to the families in which it enters, we would encourage our friends to aid in extending its circulation by commending it to the notice of some of our members who are not on its list of subscribers.

We have received a communication from a concerned Friend, who has been examining the New Revision of the Testament, and laments some of the changes from the old version. He mentions in particular the omission from the prayer taught by our Lord to his disciples, of the concluding expressions—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever." These words are so true and appropriate, that most persons we believe share in the regret felt by our correspondent. Yet the evidence seems strong, that these words were not in the narrative as written by Matthew, but were subsequently added by some copyist; and therefore ought not to be retained.

Our regret at their loss however is softened by the reflection, that the Scriptures abound in declarations of the truths contained in them. The truths themselves are not stricken out of the Bible doctrines; we are merely compelled to look to other parts of the Scriptures for their enunciation. Nor do we think anyone could be censured for using them, or for making other appropriate additions, to this model prayer, if the petitions contained therein were at the time really raised in their hearts by the Spirit of the Lord, without whose assistance we cannot offer true prayer.

A similar observation may be made as to the omission in the Revised Version of the passage in 1 John v. 7:—"There are three that bear record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one." If we agree with the Revisers, that these words were not in the Epistle as written by John, but were added by some commentator, and therefore ought not to be ascribed to John as their author; it does not follow that they are untrue in themselves. The same apostle declares elsewhere that the Word, which was in the beginning, was God, and that this Word was made flesh and dwelt among us; and our Saviour says, "I and my Father are one."

The doctrines taught in the two passages referred to by our correspondent are very important ones, yet our belief in their truth is not destroyed by the omissions of the New Revision; and would not be, even if we were prepared fully to accept it in place of that formerly in use.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An operation was performed on President Garfield on the morning of the 8th inst., for the relief of another suppurating abscess. The incision previously made was lengthened, and from its lower point a new opening was made into the track of the wound, below the twelfth rib. This, it is thought, will prevent any future complication from the healing of the superficial parts of the wound. The President was partially paralyzed during the operation, and bore it well. He has not been able to walk.

Fifth-day, the 4th instant, was "the hottest day ever known" in many localities of the West and Northwest. Sunstrokes were numerous, and outdoor work was largely suspended. Among the temperatures reported are the following: Sandwich, Illinois, 103 degrees; Fairburg, Illinois, 106; Danville, Illinois, 105; McGregor, Iowa, 105; Michigan City, Indiana, 100; Pontiac, 101; Bloomington, Illinois, 102; La Salle, Illinois, 106; St. Joseph, Missouri, 100; South Haven, Michigan, 95; Chatsworth, Illinois, 106; Racine, Wisconsin, 102.

The Indian chief Spotted Tail was shot dead on Sixth-day, the 5th instant, by Crow Dog, captain of police at the Rosebud Agency, in Nebraska. There had been ill feeling between them for some time.

Forest fires are raging around Bay City, Michigan, and are especially fierce along the Mackinaw division of the Michigan Central Railroad. For a distance of one hundred miles, fences and farm buildings, as well as vast quantities of pine timber, are burning, and trains find it almost impossible to run. Bay City is shrouded in smoke, and its atmosphere is filled with ashes and burned leaves.

The first bale of new South Carolina cotton has been received in Charleston from Edgehill county, six days earlier than the first bale last season.

The horses at Clinton, Iowa, are suffering from an epitroze, and only half of the street cars are running there.

It returns from seventeen counties of North Carolina show a majority of 21,748 against prohibition, and the other counties are expected to increase the figures to nearly 70,000. The whites divided on the question, while the negroes voted solidly against prohibition.

The San Francisco Journal of Commerce, as the result of a extensive survey throughout the State, presents a series of county estimates showing the probable crop of wheat in California to be 27,182,000 cents. Allowing 7,000,000 cents for consumption and seed, it concludes that the State will have 20,182,000 cents, or 33,630,000 bushels for export. Adding to this 30,000,000 bushels as representing the surplus of this year's Oregon crop, and the surplus carried over from last year's crop in the Pacific States, and we have a total of over 63,000,000 bushels of wheat available for export from the Pacific coast.

The catch of fur bearing animals in Alaska has been moderate during the season. Seal killing was being pursued at the Prybyloff Islands with vigor, and the Dora brought down 15,000 skins as part of her cargo. A strike took place during the Sixth month among the Aleuts on the Seal Islands, owing to the Government agent limiting their allowance of sugar. Depriving them of this article, and refused to work, the company's agent utilized the labor of some Omalaska natives to kill the seals. Seeing this step, the Aleuts turned to once more and resumed their usual grove.

The assessment of Boston shows an increase in valuation of property in that city of $25,000,000 during the last year. The city is estimated to have paid from $15.20 per $1000 to $18.90 for the coming year.

The National Board of Health is advised that yellow fever and small pox both prevail in Vera Cruz, "in a most malignant form."

A rich vein of anthracite coal is reported to have been discovered within five miles of Victoria, British Columbia.

The number of deaths in the city for the week ending 8th mo. 6th was 398, as compared with 446 for the previous week, and 302 for the corresponding week of last year: 174 were adults and 224 minors—75 died of cholera, 5 of diphtheria, 1 of scarlet fever, 22 inflammation of the intestines, and 11 of small pox.

Markets.—U. S. 8 1/4, 112 1/2; 10 1/2; 4 1/2, registered, 102; coupon, 114 1/4; 114; currency 6 1/2, 132.

Petroleum continues inactive and nominal at 73 cts. for refined in barrels, and 107 cts. for in cases.

Cotton is quiet and nominal. Sales of middlings, at 12 cts. for uplands, and 12 1/2 cts. for Gulf.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was firm and in moderate demand. Sales of 1500 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $5.87 a $6.15 for clear, and at $6.25 a $6.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $5.75 a $5.87; western do. do. at $6 a $6.75, and patents at $6.75 a $7.75. Rye flour is steady at $4.50 a $5 per barrel.

Grain.—The wheat market is unsettled, and 1 cent higher. Sales of 7000 bushels new red at $1.17 1/2 a $1.29, according to quality and location. At the open board 5000 bushels Ninth crop, at $1.29; 5000 bushels do. at $1.29; 15,000 bushels do. at $1.29. Corn is fairly active, but options are irregular. Sales of 14,000 bushels, including yellow, at 60 a 60 1/2 cts.; mixed at 59 1/2 a 60 cts.; steamer at 54 a 55 cts. No. 3 at 51 a 53 cts., and rejected at 47 a 51 cts. Oats are in fair request. Sales of 800 bushels of white, at 41 a 42 cts., and rejected and mixed at 39 a 40 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 8th mo. 6th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 244; loads of straw, 47. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, 95 cts. to $1.05 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 30 to 35 cents per pound.

Best cattle were dull and 1 cent low; 3500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 43 a 63 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and 2 cent lower; 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 51 cts., and lambs at 3 a 73 cts. according to condition.

Hogs were quiet; 3000 head sold at the different yards at 81 a 91 cts. per pound.

FOREIGN.—The Morning Post says: "A public company, with a capital of £4,000,000, is about to be formed, with the aid of large city financiers, for the purpose of purchasing and cultivating waste lands in Ireland and for other purposes connected with agriculture in Ireland."

An official return gives the number of agrarian outrages committed in Ireland during the Seventh month as 239, including 4 killings at persons, 11 assaults, 20 persons, 10 cattle, 151 intimidations, and 23 cases of injury to property.

John Dillon has been released from Kilmainham jail. It was expected that he will make his appearance at a meeting of the League, then proceeding to London, and resume his seat in the House of Commons, to participate in the final discussion on the Land bill.

In the House of Commons, Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, replying to various questions, stated that John Dillon had been released because a report had been received at the other conference would endanger his life. This report, upon investigation, was confirmed by other physicians. Under the circumstances, it was not thought necessary to ask Dillon to sign any condition.

The Daily News says: We have reason to believe that the Government will advise the House of Commons to disagree with all the important amendments to the Land bill in the House of Lords, accepting only a few which do not affect the principle of the measure. It is not believed that the House of Lords will stand out against the action of the House of Commons in re-legislating the bill. It is known that the Conservative benches a strong pressure will be brought to bear upon Lord Salisbury, with the object of preventing the opposition from being carried too far. It is desired to make the best possible bargain for the landlords, but it is conceded that, even from their point of view, nothing but the best of their efforts will be the result.

Paris, 8th mo. 31.—The Saïda correspondent of the Temps confirms the statement that Chief Bou Amia has disintegrated, and says his forces are considerably diminished, and that he does not intend taking the offensive. The inhabitants of Sasa desire French occupation of that place, in order to be released by marauders. The deserters from the Tunisian army who were brought back to Tunis have asked for a pardon, and have promised to serve the Bey faithfully.

A Berlin despatch to the Daily News says: The harvest prospects in Schleswig-Holstein have never been better than at this time. The weather has been favorable, and getting quit of their cattle and horses, owing to the scarcity of fodder.

The Journal de St. Petersburg, replying to newspaper criticisms accusing Russia of paying too much deference to the susceptibilities of England concerning Central Asia, says: "The Russian Government has no objection in regard for England, has fallen back in Central Asia. She, in this respect, was guided by the same rational motives as those which dictated the judicious policy of Gladstone relative to Afghanistan."

A Vienna despatch says: "The Porte will deliver a note immediately to the Powers, announcing the removal of all ground or cause for misunderstanding with France in regard to Tripoli. The despatch of Turkish troops to Tripoli is defended on the ground of the necessity of securing the safety of the Tripolitans."

RECEIPTS.

Received from Richard C. Shoemaker, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; for Joseph K. Evans and Amos Evans, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Robert P. Gifford, R. I., $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary Anna Matlack, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Caroline E. Smith, Pa., per J. M. P., $2.10, vol. 55; from George M. Nichols, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Mary M. Kelch, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin W. Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Lippincott, Lydia Lippincott, and Mary Nicholson, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Richard J. Allen, City, $2, vol. 55, and for Rowland D. Allen, City, and Rowland J. Dutton, N. J., $2 each, vol. 55; from George M. Haversick, N. J., $2, vol. 55, and for George M. Haversick, N. J., $2, vol. 55; for Joseph R. Whitacre, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Rebecca Kauf, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin H. Lightfoot, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from George Abbott, Jr., City, $2, vol. 55; from Isaac Hall, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from George I. Kashner, Jr., City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin B. Satterton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin W. Passmore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, 3 copies, and for Sarah W. Passmore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elizabeth Adair, Ireland, £1, vol. 54 and 55; from George Bartley, Mich., $2.10, to No. 22, vol. 55; from John A. Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Dr. George Thomas, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, 2 copies, and for J. Preston Thomas, $2.10, to No. 23, vol. 55, Charles T. Thomas, $2.10, vol. 55, and Jonah Ogelsby, W. Phila., $2, vol. 55; from Thomas C. Garrett, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel P. Leeds, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph W. Canada, $2.10, to No. 23, vol. 55; from Joseph W. Canada, $2.10, to No. 23, vol. 55; from John C. Sullivan, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Cornell, David C. Henderson, and John Moore, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Samuel M. Wickersham, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jacob Elge, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Edward Marshall, City, $2, vol. 55, and for Sarah E. Haines and J. Haines, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Abigail C. Furman, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Josiah

A. Roberts, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Jacob Roberts, $2.10, vol. 55; from Ann H. Bacon, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from E. B. Smith, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Robert H. Smith, O., and Morris S. Cope, and Elizabeth Hughes, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John W. Burby, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Elanator Roberts, $2.10, vol. 55; from Hannah Mickle, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John W. Warner, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from J. C. Thomson, Gtn., $2, vol. 55; from Sarah B. De Cou, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Dorcas B. Robinson, B. I., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Vail, City, $2, vol. 55, and for John Vail and Martin B. Holloway, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Lewis Passmore, $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary N. Griffith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jacob P. Jones, City, $2, vol. 55; from Benjamin Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for W. Walte Hoopes, City, $2, vol. 55; from Mary B. Willis, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from E. S. Deats, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; for John Wistar, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Daniel B. Smith, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from William C. M. Irving, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for L. Toft, $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry Wood, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from J. P. Palmer, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry Trimble, City, $2, vol. 55; from Deborah Hopkins, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Edward Marks, M. D., City, $2, vol. 55, and for Margaret Brandt, M. D., and Hannah M. Stokes, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John W. Warner, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from John M. Roberts, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Amos Roberts, $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary Ann Hester, Pa., $2.10, to No. 14, vol. 56; from Rebecca W. Smith, City, $2, vol. 55; from Ambrose Smith, for copy to M. D., vol. 55; from Rebecca K. Masters, W. Phila., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel W. May, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Alfred King, Agent, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Gilbert Weaver, William R. Hazard, Pers. E. Hatlock, Samuel G. Cook, George Hoag, Lydia C. Hoag, Mary Ann Simkin, Nicholas D. Tripp, and William R. Taber, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from E. H. White, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John W. Warner, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Passmore, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Rebecca W. Bur City, $2, vol. 55; from Charles Stokes, Agent, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John W. Warner, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph H. Haines, Clayton Haines, Rachel L. Atkin son, Martha H. Allen, Josiah Allen, George Haines, John C. Stokes, and Elizabeth T. Engle, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from M. and R. M. Black, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Seth Shaw, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Joseph Taylor, Job Huestis, Barak Ashton, Levi Boutwell, Milfill Caldwell, Nathan M. Blackburn, Benjamin Harrison and Jonathan Blackburn, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Sarah S. Kenyon, R. I., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Benjamin P. Hoopes, $2.10, vol. 55; from Rufus Churchill, N. S., $4, vol. 55, 2 copies; from Joel Wilson, Agent, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Isaac C. Stokes and Ruth A. Harned, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Daniel J. Morrell, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph Scattergood, Agent, Pa., for Elizabeth S. Thomas, Rachel E. Woodward, Sarah Pennell, Charles S. Carter and Susan Dono, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Ann C. Hodge, $3.15, to No. 8, vol. 56; for Thomas Llewellyn, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and from Alice I. Carter, City, $2, vol. 55.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning, will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOL.

A well qualified woman Friend is wanted to teach in the Boys' school, to enter upon her duties at the opening of the term in the Ninth month.

Application may be made to either of the undersigned,

Richard J. Allen, 119 Arch St.

Edward Maris, 1106 Pine St.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.
Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia
Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED. at Friends' Meeting-house, West Chester Chester Co., Pa., 8th mo. 4th, 1881, WILLIAM WEBSTER of Middletown, Delaware Co., Pa., to CATHERINE SCARLETT, of the former place

DIED, at the residence of his son-in-law, Richa Patens, the 11th of 2nd month, 1881, WILLIAM PIERCE, in the eightieth year of his age, a member Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa.

WILLIAM H. PALE, PRINTER.

No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 20, 1881.

NO. 2.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
No. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
No. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Our Floating Home.

(Concluded from page 3.)

Sixth-day, 7th mo. 1st. The entire party flocked up to Mauch Chunk in the early morning, and with the accession of another, a student at the Female Medical College, proceeded through the irregular, picturesque, up, up a sharp, winding ascent to the itchback depot. Here we had an open car ourselves, and the agreement was made to await our pleasure for the return, the round trip of eighteen miles, at a reduced price, to wit 75 cts. apiece. To most of us the locality is entirely new, and the few who had traversed this remarkable and interesting route, and pleasure in repeating the experience, were exalted by that of the new comer. The trip of 664 feet, drawn up by the stationary engine on Mt. Pisgah, is made very quickly, and a sharp ascent, and such are the precautions for safety in a ratchet work traversed by a cogged arm from a truck behind the car, that accident seems almost impossible. The dizzy height so suddenly made the clear, pure, and magnificent wide-spread view, embracing mountain beyond mountain, and through the Lehigh Gap, itself miles away, a far-removed of Schooley's Mountain in N. Jersey, and to be sixty miles distant, and the town nestled and jumbled at our feet, odd and quaint as if gathered up in Switzerland and enabled here, combine to make this sudden transition to exhilarating upper air one of the most pleasing memories of the trip.

Having reached the summit of Mt. Pisgah, I given us a pause of many minutes to enjoy on each side of the mountain crest the magnificent views both north and south of this point, the former quite the more wild and rugged, the car proceeded by gravity to the top of the plane at Summit Hill. We were drawn up here by another stationary engine, and found a dingy village of frame dwellings, the residences of a mining population, among whom not a few propose to live in part by the services as guides, &c., to the visitors. The attraction to the town, beside the delightful, dizzy ride by gravity to the foot of the plane, the burning mine in the near vicinity. Here we found vast openings from the surface as if abandoned quarries, open to the sky, and covering acres over which the coal once lying so close to the surface, in veins consisting of the best of coal, with but slight layers of slate between them, and aggregating a depth of over forty feet in a "breast," had been long removed. In one deep corner is a hole not over six to eight feet across, as estimated from the bank above, and running down into deep recesses below, from which poured forth a steady stream of heated air, suddenly flaring up with greater volume and heat as the venturous among us threw stones into the lower depths. The mine below is said to have been burning over 35 years. As the approaches consist of crumbling sand, loose dirt and spalls, to stand upon their slant seemed an unnecessary "tempting of Providence." On the immense piles of waste thrown out from these open mines, many pieces of slate were found containing when freshly cleaved, impressions of the ferns, &c., of the primeval vegetation preceding the coal formation. Young boys and girls hung around to obtrude their services and get some hold for ample payment. We afterwards learned that we had been traversing here, unconsciously and in peace, one of the worst nests of the "Molly Maguires," that close at hand had occurred some of the most unprovoked murders of that wicked band of conspirators, and that even yet the managers of the Switchback Railroad feel the necessity of keeping up constant watch, to be sure that no obstructions shall have been laid upon their track.

Our return from Summit Hill by a lower route, the veritable switchback of the road, and entirely by gravity, although presenting less of the grand and distant views, had in its rapid, breezy motion, so grateful in summer heat, and in the woodland course traversed, much of pleasure for us, and it was unanimously agreed that this day had been thus far the finest of the trip.

Seventh-day, 7th mo. 2d. A bright and beautiful morning promised well for one of the most anxiously expected days of the excursion, the visit to Onoko Glen, which is close by the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and about two miles above Mauch Chunk. An early start was made, and we were soon at the mouth of the glen, where it was expected we could lunch at the refreshment rooms beside the railway. These were found, however, but scantily supplied for such a party, but as we had brought some provision with us, a piecing out was had which at least prevented suffering through this lovely, busy, stirring day. We found the glen itself, which was new to most of us, a wild and picturesque ravine, with but little of the artificial obtruded on the sight, the walks and the rural stair-ways, kept in good order by direction of the will of Asa Packer, and open from end to end without bar, gate or charge to the public—a happy contrast to the grasping spirit which fences in great natural spectacles, and doles out the sight of them at a "quarter" here and a "half dollar" there. In the wild, wild beauty of rocky pinacles, lichen-clad, and clear sparkling amber pools, gathering at the feet of bright cascades, with the grass of perfect and various foliage, from the blooming rhododendron to the majestic oak, in the abundant ferns and mosses which cluster in the recesses and upon the spray-beaten rocks, and in the more majestic falls, the Onoko, 90 feet in height, this attractive spot offers unusual charms of cool, invigorating shade; the very "opacum frigidum" of the observant Augustan poet, to the tired, overheated denizen of the great cities so near at hand. We were reminded here of the eloquent description of a Highland glen by the Rugby Poet,—

"Beautiful there for the color derived from green rocks under;

Beautiful, most of all, where beads of foam uprising
Mingle their clouds of white with the delicate hue of the stillness.

Cliff over cliff for its sides, with rowan and pendent birch boughs,

Here it lies, unthought of above at the bridge and pathway,

Still more concealed from below by wood and rocky projection,

You are shut in, left alone with yourself and perfection of water!"

—Arthur Hugh Clough.

In many respects this beautiful resort was thought by those of us who had visited Watkins Glen to be superior to it, as in the volume of water and the height of the waterfalls, in the less artificial character of the most frequented parts of it, and in the magnificent view from Packer's Point, scarcely surpassed to the writer by that from the Catskill Mountain House or the top of Mt. Holyoke. In the rocky buttresses of Watkins, imposing masses of great height, and in the shape, size and depth of its water-worn pools, perhaps it has advantage. But to citizens of Philadelphia, Trenton and New York, who have not time or money for the distance of Watkins Glen, and who look for the charms of nature herself at her wildest, and are satisfied away from the paths of fashion, there is comparatively at their door, much to delight and console, when weary of the city din and the heated, reverberating walls, in the wild beauty of Onoko Glen.

This day was saddened for the happy party by the felon-stroke at the capitol, which still endangers the life of President Garfield, so lately elected head of the nation, thus interrupting the useful career of one of our foremost and most valued citizens at the moment in which he was unostentatiously performing his duty as a public servant, with such skill and conscience as perhaps no predecessor has surpassed.

First-day, the 3d. Another beautiful bright day,—which was spent in part upon the boat, while some few from time to time took walks upon the adjacent mountains. This day passed not without a prevalent regard on the part of our company generally to the character and customary observance of it. Reading from the Holy Scriptures, was as usual with us throughout the excursion, had at the morning meal and again before retiring in the

On Second-day we drew in our bawser about 9 A. M., and proceeded on the homeward cruise. At Easton some of our party visited Lafayette College. We found an elevated plateau close upon the northern side of the town, and at good height above it, on which stand the numerous buildings appertaining to the college—Pardee Hall, recently re-erected since its destruction by fire, the Observatory, &c. These are placed at short intervals upon a beautiful, well-kept lawn, with handsome shrubbery and trees at advantageous points, and, chiefly to the east, they are flanked by a considerable number of pleasing cottages and mansions, the residences of President Cattell and the Professors. In Pardee Hall we found very fine mineralogical and other scientific collections, with the most complete and modern apparatus in electricity, chemistry, natural philosophy, &c. The appointments of the class-rooms were very complete,—and all appliances for teaching, the library, &c., indicated care to keep level with the times in the most improved facilities for instruction. From the summit of Pardee Hall we had undoubtedly one of the finest and most interesting prospects which our excursion furnished. The near Delaware emerging to the north, from a local gap of fine proportions, and at a lower point spanned by great bridges, the immense railroad constructions grouped along the Lehigh, bridge crossing bridge, the picturesque town seated upon its hills, its near verge clustering at our feet, the view of Phillipsburg to the east of the Delaware, and of South Easton beyond the Lehigh, backed by an elevated horizon consisting on the one hand of far reaches of productive farm-lands, glittering with the gold of harvest, and on the other of stately mountain ranges, wooded to their summits, all contributed to the beauty and majesty of a picture seldom exceeded in its combination of the worthiest works of man and the massive handiwork of our loving Father.

Fourth-day, the 6th. At "the Narrows" of the Delaware we spent several hours, some fishing and boating, but most of us walking in groups here and there to the points promising the finest views, where all was picturesque. On the western side, the Delaware was here skirted, for perhaps two miles, by lofty rocks, suggesting in their height the Palisades which border the Hudson for many miles, but more bold, irregular and castellated in their structure: great masses standing out in some places from the general line like natural citadels, while an abundant foliage crowns them and thrusts itself forward to sun and air from between them. Seen from the western side there are not only grace and beauty, but imposing grandeur in the general view. To most of us, this attractive spot was a discovery, as we had never heard of its existence before our approach to it.

We arrived at Bristol early in the morning of Sixth-day, the 8th, and there were photographed in a body on the deck of the "Michael Uhler"—before the arrival of the "Bristol" which was to tow us down the river. On the way down a vendue on board disposed to individuals the surplus property, the oil stove, steamer, &c., bought by the company, very satisfactorily, and to the great amusement of all,—in the lively and successful manner in which our extemporized auctioneer performed his duty.

Finally, about 3 P. M., we again touched the pier below Vine St., where friends who had been of the company awaited us, and this cruise of the "Michael Uhler," a delightful summer holiday unsurpassed of its kind within the experience of all who shared in it, was ended; without a regret expressed except that it could not be prolonged.

The cost "per head" of this unique trip was per day about 70 cents, including the photograph view—a copy for each—and the Switch-back and Onoko Glen trips, which cost $1.00 apiece for the two to all participants. Thus the maximum expense for any of the party was slightly above $8.00.

It may here be said that the risks originally conceived to attach to this voyage, were the possibility of malaria and accident from the frequent passage beneath the bridges with a vessel not nearly so low in the water as if loaded with coal or grain. The former it was thought was reduced to a minimum by selecting a time of year earlier than the greatest heats and droughts, and while all waters were high; and the rapid current in these canals, the Delaware and Lehigh, with their constant use by the passing boats, was felt to be in our favor. The latter was so obvious a danger that to the minds of all it was generally present, and the lower section of deck, fore and aft, a few feet square, gave sitting room in open air where but little bending was necessary to clear the most of the bridges, and for many it was possible to sit erect. No malarial trouble is thus far known to have occurred to any of the party.

Saved for Great Purposes.—One night, in a small town in the north of England, a clergyman's house caught fire. The fire burned so fiercely that there was only time for the family to run for their lives. Some of them were scorched and burnt as they escaped. But one child, not quite six years old, was left in the house. The light from the fire woke the little fellow up. He jumped out of bed and ran to the door, but the flames drove him back. Then he cried for help. His father heard and tried to get up the stairs to him, but he could not force his way through the fire. The father thought his poor son was lost; he must be burned to death. But he knelt down and prayed to God for him. The little boy ran to the window, mounted a chest that stood under it, and called to the people below. Somebody saw him and shouted, "Fetch a ladder." But there was no time for that; the flames had seized the roof, and it was plainly about to fall in. So one man leaned against the wall, and another stood on his shoulders to reach the boy down. The boy now leaped into his arms and was saved. "A brand plucked from the burning." I dare say most of you know who that little boy was. It was John Wesley. God had a great work for John Wesley to do, and he kept him alive to do it.

Two boys were fencing—that is—pretending to fight with swords as though they were soldiers. They had real swords with a button at the point of each, to prevent their hurting each other. One of the buttons broke, and the sharp sword ran through the side of one of the boys and nearly killed him. But it just missed the most dangerous place, and the wounded lad by-and-by got better. Another time the same boy was swimming in deep water; the ribbon which tied up his hair got loose, and caught his leg. He struggled to free himself, but could not. He was about to sink, when the ribbon loosened itself, and he was saved. Another time, when he had grown up to be a young man, he was swimming in the river Rhine which is a very broad and rapid river. He did not notice where he was going, and soon got into the midst of its strong current. He said, "The water there was extremely rough, and poured along like a galloping horse." It carried him on till it struck against the strong timbers upon which a mill was built. The stream forced him right under the mill, and he became quite insensible. When he woke up he found himself in a piece of smooth water, the other side of the mill. Some men helped him on shore. He had been carried five miles from where he plunged into the water. Yet he was not hurt in the least. The person I have just told you about was John Fletcher, afterward one of the holiest men that ever lived. God had work for John Fletcher to do, so He would not let him die.—Sol.

For "The Friend."

John Tauler.

(Concluded from page 2.)

THE GOLDEN ALPHABET.

After a thorough manly sort, a holy life begin,
Bad ways eschew, and practise good, forsaking ev-sin;

Carefully keep the middle path, from all extreme apart.

Devour thyself with humbleness, from holiness of heart
Entirely yield up thy will, thyself into God's hands.
Forward and ready be to do whatever He commands.
Give heed to exercise good works for body and for mine.
Have no backslings towards the world, or creature left behind;

Knighly withstand o'er the past in penitence and tears,
Inwardly withstand the world, the flesh, and all the Devil's snares.

Learn to overcome long cherished sloth, nor thro' thy weakness swerve,

Make thy abode in God, with faith; the Golden Rule observe;

No other man's good things desire, of body or of soul.
Order all things to make the best, not worst by thy control.

Penance, or suffering for sin, thou shalt take willingly.
Quittance, remission give to all who have done wrong to thee;

Receive with meekness what befalls, and draw improvement thence,

Soul, body, name, estate keep pure, with care and diligence;
Soul, body, name, estate keep pure, with care and diligence;

Truthful and upright be to all, with honest guileless mind;

Wantonness and excess avoid of whatsoever kind,
"Xt follow in his life and death, of whatsoever kind."

Yea, evermore beseech for help to learn these lesser truths;

Zealously keep a heavenly rein over thy will and sense & with God's creatures be at peace, and with His Providence.

At the end of three weeks Tauler said he had received more stripes than ever before but had not yet mastered the first line. After three weeks more he said to Nicolas, "Dear son, rejoice with me, for I think with God's help I could say the first line, and if thou art willing, I will repeat the whole lesson to thee."

As he progressed in a holy life, Nicolas assured him he must sell all, and yield up to God all that he possessed in carnal pride ether through the Scriptures or without, whatsoever it might be whereby he wasaping honor in this world, in which he hadretine taken pleasure or delight. He mustit all go, and falling at Christ's feet, earnest-strive to enter on a new course, that he might be purified as gold in the fire. To attain more complete union with God and submission to his will, he charged Tauler that he must for many months neither study, nor teach, nor hear confessions.

* Christ. Sometimes written thus.

"You must take up your cross," he said, "and follow our Lord Jesus Christ and his example, in utter sincerity, humility and patience, and must let go all your proud ingenious reason, which you have through your learning in the Scripture. You shall for a time neither study nor preach, and demean yourself with great simplicity towards your penitents; for when they have ended their confessions you shall give them no further counsel than to say to them, 'I will learn how to counsel myself, and when I can do that, I will also counsel you.'"

Tauler said, "I will willingly do so, but how can I occupy myself?"

Nicolas advised him to enter into his cell, and attend to his daily devotions and duties; and "what time is left," he said, "you shall be before you the sufferings of our Lord, and contemplate your own life in the mirror of His, and meditate on your wasted time in which you have been living for yourself, and how small has been your love compared to His. In all lowliness you shall study these things, whereby in some measure you may be brought to true humility, and to wear yourself out of old habits, and cease from them. And then when our Lord sees that the time come He will make of you a new man, so that you shall be born again of God."

He forewarned him that in doing this his whole life would come to be despised and turned to naught in the eyes of the people, and that his spiritual children would forsake him. He charged him not to be faint-hearted, and with entire, hearty, humble self-surrender in all things, sweet or bitter, painful or pleasant, to persevere in patience to the end.

It seemed a hard thing to Tauler to follow his counsel, but after eleven days consideration he announced that "through great agony and struggle and fighting day and night with himself, he had come with good courage to set himself steadfastly to this work, come weal, come woe!" Before a year was out he came to be despised of all his familiar friends, and all his spiritual children forsook him, and he was reduced and ill in body. He sent for Nicolas, who encouraged him to persevere, and advised him to take nourishing food. Tauler said, "But thou didst tell me before, that I must shun good eating and drinking." Nicolas answered, "Yes, that was in the first beginning, when flesh was yet wanton; but now it is tamed and obedient to the Spirit, we may come to its help with remedies, else we should tempt God."

Then Nicolas told him he must now leave him; bade him go forward with a cheerful mind, referred him to the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, and departed, leaving Tauler in tears.

After two years suffering from sore assaults and temptations of the devil, and contempt of friends, and poverty, he was brought one night into great conflict, when in his weakness, without help or consolation from any creature, as he lay pondering the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ, and his love; and considered his own poor life, he was overwhelmed with contrition, and cried out with heart and tongue, "O merciful God! have mercy upon me, a poor sinner, for thy boundless mercy's sake, for I am not worthy that the earth should bear me!" Then he heard a voice saying, "Stand fast in thy peace, and trust God." Presently he felt "a new strength and might in all powers outward and inward, and had also a clear understanding in those things which aforetime were dark to him."

He sent again for Nicolas and told him all. Nicolas was rejoiced, and assured him that now he had received the mighty gift of God's Grace, and been touched by the Most High. He said, "Your doctrine will now come from the Holy Ghost. You have received the light of the Holy Spirit, and will have a clearer insight into the Scriptures than you had before. You ought to begin to preach again; good books will now be profitable to you, and the words that you now say will have a pure and simple savor. Now it is no longer for me to speak to you as a teacher, as I have done hitherto. You now have the right and true Master, whose instrument I have been. To Him give ear and obey his commands,—this is my most faithful counsel."

Tauler gave notice that he would preach three days after, and a great crowd gathered to hear him. But he was so filled with weeping before the multitude that he could not preach. After they had waited a good while and he could do nothing but weep, he had to dismiss them; accepting it as an evidence that the Lord judged it needful for him to be put yet more to shame. The people dispersed and told of his failure, so that he became a public laughing stock, despised by all. And even his brethren of the convent forbade him to preach any more, because he did the convent injury, and disgraced the Order.

Once more he sent for Nicolas and told him about it. Nicolas said, "Dear master, be of good cheer, be not dismayed at these things. The Bridegroom is wroth to behave so to all his best and dearest friends. It is a certain sign that God is your friend. Without a doubt He has seen a speck of pride concealed in you, that you have not been conscious of yourself, and therefore it is that you have been put to shame." He suggested to him that some great gift might come to him by means of the patience with which he had endured the assault, and bade him be of good cheer, joyful and humble. He said he had seen many such instances in other people, and added, "You shall not despise the pressure of the cross, which God has sent you, but count it a great blessing and favor from Him."

He advised Tauler to remain alone for five days, and then to ask his prior permission to read at least a lecture to the brethren. "He did so, and read such an excellent lecture as they had never heard before in their lives, so grand and deep and godly was his doctrine." He now obtained permission to preach again. He took for his text, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him." His sermon produced a marvelous effect upon the hearers. One cried out from the crowd, when the impression upon the hearers became intense, "Master, leave off, or this man will die on our hands!" The sermon was concluded, and some forty remained sitting a long time, and some lay prostrate as if dead.

"Now," said Nicolas to him, "I wrot you see what wonders God works with good tools."

Tauler "made progress in the Divine life, and received such wisdom by the grace of the Holy Spirit, that he preached to both clergy and laity, and came to be held in esteem and honor, in his native city of Strasburg, and throughout the land." It is said that "whatever he counselled the people was right in their eyes, and they hearkened to him gladly." For eight years he led this life of usefulness and honor, and then the Master took his servant to Himself.

J. B.

2nd mo, 1881.

The foregoing account is derived from a little volume of the "Wisdom Series," an abridgment of "The History and Life of Doctor John Tauler," translated from the German by Susanna Winkworth; and an article in "The Sunday Magazine," by T. M. Lindsay. The quotation marks generally indicate sentences copied from these writings.

For "The Friend."

The Present Faith of the Hebrew.

In the course of frequent absences from home, it has been the lot of the writer within the last year, to be thrown at times into intercourse and some acquaintance with prominent members of the ancient race who alone can claim, among the nations of the earth, to have once enjoyed the peculiar dignity and prerogatives of "the chosen People of God." Invited repeatedly to their homes, he has there met socially with some probably of the best representatives of the race in America. The opportunity thus afforded has been embraced by him at suitable occasions to ascertain for himself, more than is perhaps popularly known in regard to their present feelings, hopes and practices, and it has occurred to him that a few details in regard to these might be of interest to the readers of "The Friend."

At Baltimore, in the home of one of the most prominent Jewish merchants, he was introduced to his father-in-law, a retired merchant, advanced in years, of great intelligence and a happy faculty of expression. Premising the desire that any question he might ask which should be painful to his hearers should be frankly met with the admission that they would rather not reply to it, the writer proceeded to ask the following questions in substance, being courteously assured that they would take pleasure in making answer, so far as in their power, to any which he might present.

Do you people any where in the world, so far as you know, still offer sacrifices as of old, the burning of lambs, bullocks, &c., upon altars in the Divine service? It was replied, No,—that the practice was everywhere discontinued. Inquiry was then made, since what period it had ceased; and the reply was, "Since the destruction of Jerusalem." Why is this so? "Because, as you know, the Jews are no where a governing people with a land of their own, and a right to legislate as they please in it." Then, do I understand that if you were restored to your original country and to the government of it, you would think it your duty to re-build the temple and to renew the sacrifices as of old? "Most assuredly!" It was then asked, are your Rabbis of the line of Priests? "No,—not generally." Can you identify the descendants of Aaron?

"Yes, abundantly,—there are many under various names, and especially the family under the name of Kohn, Cohen, Coane, &c., however spelt, who are descendants of Aaron." Yet you do not, as I understand, maintain the written genealogies of your people. "No, they are not kept up as formerly." Have you knowledge of the family of David as at present existing? "No." You have altogether lost the identity of that family? "Yes, we have lost it." There lay upon the table a large family Bible, the English version accepted by the Rabbis, and of course a distinct translation from the King James' version. With their consent, the writer opened this and proceeded to read, at times to himself, at times orally, passages in Isaiah and elsewhere, of which it can only be now remembered that in the most distinct allusions, as in chapter liii., to the character and coming of the Messiah, and his sufferings; the specific words employed were different from ours, more vague and indistinct in their application. These passages therefore might be repeatedly read by the modern Jew without intruding upon his attention the identity of Jesus of Nazareth with his long anticipated Messiah. It was found in conversation that there was not nearly the familiarity with their own version that a thoughtful Friend or Methodist frequently exhibits now with the Old Testament alone. In part to account for this, attention was directed by the courteous hosts to the immense number of small precepts and directions, outside of the Pentateuch, (the "traditions" referred to by our Saviour,) which the orthodox Jew is required to observe, and the distinct statement was made that these were so multitudinous that years were required to learn them all, and that they were a heavy burden for any one to remember and observe. How forcibly does this statement remind us of the language of our gracious Lord, "They bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders;" and of the language of Peter at the council of the apostles and the elders, "a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear!"

Inquiry being made in regard to their synagogues in Baltimore, the answer developed the fact that there were different congregations, not altogether in harmony in their practices, the more modern approaching somewhat closely, both in the system of seating the worshippers and in the ceremonial of service, the responses, the music, &c., to the more fashionable Christian congregations, and it was evident that these innovations were looked upon by this family with disfavor.

On another occasion, in that city, the writer spent an hour or more in company with a retired Jewish merchant, Jacob H., in which the conversation so nearly covered the same ground as not to suggest its reproduction here; but in this instance especially, he was deeply impressed with the reverent weight and thoughtfulness of his entertainer's spirit, and he left him with the conviction that so far as he had light he was sincerely endeavoring to follow its leadings.

About a week ago in Philadelphia, some business brought the writer into contact with the head of a large mercantile house, Daniel —, a Hebrew of middle age. When this had been transacted, he was surprised to have the inquiry made, without his utterance of a word leading towards it, "Friend —, are there not two kinds of Quakers, and does not the old kind closely resemble the Jews in their way of thinking?" In respect to what? "In regard to Jesus Christ!" Answer was made that there are indeed two societies claiming to be Friends or Quakers, and that one of them in a degree approaches the Jews on that question, but that the elder, often called the Orthodox, are evangelical Christians, believing that Jesus Christ was the Messiah, and the speaker was one of these. Instantly and earnestly came the question, "Do you believe that Jesus Christ was the Son of God?" With, it is hoped, a reverent thoughtfulness, reply was made: "I do." To the utter astonishment of the writer, this driving man of business said, "I don't know what to think. We have been accustomed to call ourselves 'the chosen people of God,' but when I consider our situation all over the world for centuries, and our sufferings through persecutions, I think we might call ourselves 'the forsaken people of God'!" I think a great deal about it. We are living without prospect, without hope, almost without faith. There are many others like me who are thinking of these things and speaking to one another about them." It was answered, "If your people centuries ago saw and rejected the Messiah, it does not follow that you should go on from generation to generation, continuing that rejection." The Messiah was to be of the family of David: "Have you any knowledge now who are the living descendants of that family?" "None whatever." "How then should you be able to identify as the 'son of David' any man who might now claim to be the Messiah?" This question seemed to strike him very forcibly; and he afterwards frankly admitted that they had now no expectation of the earthly coming of the Messiah.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend." "HE DOETH ALL THINGS WELL."

My heart was sad, when news fell on my ear
That that which makes the spirit glad, was gone—
Not here! the friend I loved had come and gone.
Why ordered thus? The gospel message flown?
I knew not—nor could I dwell upon
His mission; and make his feelings all mine own!
'Twas thus that sad regrets applied their sting,
And positive meanings to my nation fell;
Until a sweet relief was found in this—
God knoweth best—"He doeth all things well!"
Return, repining heart, unto thy rest—
Return to thankfulness and prayer!
He ruleth all, and knoweth what is best,
Directs the work—and when, and where!
'Tis thus Divine regard is in it all;
Though disappointment have her transient spell:
He casteth down—bears up to ease the fall—
Sees our great need, and ordereth all things well!

Marshallton, 7th mo. 28th, 1881.

LOST.

The sun was falling toward the west
In clouds of angry red,
When Mary Mack, the collier's wife,
To little Jacky said:

"'Tis almost time for supper, boy,
And father's coming back;
Put on your comforter and cap,
And meet him on the track."

"Go up along the coaling road,
You'll meet him right away;
And make him hurry, for the wind
Is sharp and cold to-day."

She smiled to see her little boy,
A curly-head of three,
Go shouting up the mountain-side,
All rosy with his glee.

The wood-fire crackled on the hearth,
The kettle purred beside,
And shrill and sad a cricket's chirp
To fire and kit replied.

But when the darkening night drew on,
And home came collier Jack,
Without the baby at his hand,
She cried, "How came you back?"

"And where is Jacky? Why, he went To meet you up the side!"
"And I came down across the lots,"
The weary man replied.

A sudden fear across them fell;
His weariness was done;
He followed fast the rugged path
Where little Jack had gone.

And Mary, with her woollen shawl
About her dizzy head,
Right after him; as fast as feet
Could carry her, she sped.

But all in vain they hunted him,
The night fell dark and still,
They could not find their little boy
By wood, or path, or hill.

They called their neighbors to their aid;
The friendly neighbors came,
And all night long the lonely rocks
Re-echoed Jacky's name.

The mountain-side their torches lit,
Like stars that slide and fall;
But never Jacky saw the blaze,
Or heard them about and call.

When morning on the mountain rose,
To light up crag and steep,
They found him lying on a rock,
Like one who lies asleep.

His shoes and stockings by his side,
Laid off to go to rest;
His face as peaceful as a flower,
His hands across his breast.

Yes, while the winds blew cold and loud,
And darkness gathered near,
The weary child had lost his way,
And stopped to rest him here.

Bewildered with the lonesome night,
His time to go to bed,
He half undressed, and half asleep,
Laid down his pretty head.

And while they called and hunted him,
And wandered all abroad,
He fell asleep to dream of home,
And waked at home with God.

Among the anecdotes related of President Garfield, which serve to illustrate his character, is one especially deserving of notice. I relate to the period when the Chicago Convention adjourned over a First-day without making choice of a Presidential candidate Garfield dined with some friends at the house of Marshall Field, and in the course of conversation it was remarked that pressure had been brought to bear upon Judge Hoar, Chairman of the Convention, to ignore the approach of the First-day, and allow the work of balloting to be begun, with the hope that the work of the Convention might be completed that night. Judge Hoar replied, "Never. This is a Sabbath-keeping nation and I cannot preside over this convention on minute over twelve o'clock." Judge Hoar's conduct was freely criticised. All except Garfield said something, and when all were done he remarked quietly, but with earnestness to one sitting beside him: "Yes, this is a day of suspense, but it is also a day of prayer, and I have more faith in the prayer that will go up from Christian hearts to-day than I have in all the political tactics that will prevail at this convention."

Selected.

The Books We Read.

For "The Friend."

is matter of great importance, particularly to junior readers, to watch closely

"as their years proceed at friends they sort with, and what books they read."

if, as the Scriptures represent, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," should not zealously guard—parents for children, young persons for themselves—against corrupting influences, from whatever source they may set in upon us or have their origin? There is no more likely way, in which young and inexperienced of the present generation, will be contaminated and led into the mire of misery saddened by the bitterness of than by improper association with evil persons, and, particularly, by the perusal of corrupting and licentious literature, now spawned forth by the press and spread abroad over the land.

The vile trash or novels in miniature, as each of the reading matter of the day is, instead of inducing in children a taste for healthy, suitable reading, is, on the contrary, aptly adapted to vitiate and corrupt, not only the eye but the heart. Hence, will not the legitimate effect be, to pave the way and to lead to the full-blown novel-devourer with its corruptive tendencies and results? These corrupting works of fiction, wherein crimes are glossed over, and faults presented in the light of follies rather than of vices; whereality, if inculcated at all, is inculcated on false principles; are calculated to, and do actually impair the vigor of the mind and the purity of the heart; and fail not to render us an easy prey to the more degrading and pernicious tendencies of our fallen and corrupt natures.

We know of no more effectual way by which this inundation of novel tales or exciting marvellous narrative, so calculated to lead and betray, can be stayed, than by parents ceasing to read them themselves, and watching over their children in this respect. We remember of a worthy, pious father who, upon one of his children being given a work of this kind, instead of allowing his child's mind to be poisoned by its perusal, returned it at once to the lender with conscientious objections against such reading-matter. Another instance of note-worthy denial is that of a young woman of wealth and refinement, who, being tempted to read a work of fiction, made a beginning thereto, and a little progress in the perusal convinced her that it was not a safe book for her to do, neither one she could modestly confess having read, if questioned. Her moral courage and discretion overcame her curiosity; she sent the book away unread; and thus, she promoted her own growth in piety and virtue, at the same time set a noble example to all those who are similarly exposed to temptation.

The increased and increasing indulgence in the same and mischievous reading, is having its due and near-leavening effect upon the many; and is especially detrimental to that femininity of life and conduct which used to characterize "The grave matrons of yore." In truth—a matter which the writer would justly glory in this connexion—are there not plain indications, that the manners in our country of the masses in general, are becoming more relaxed? This not only as respects indulgence in the truly damaging evil of demoralizing literature, but, as an outgrowth thereof, the too prevalent unhealthy, if not unchaste familiarity with undraped paintings and statuary? and this by women and men, perhaps, who would shrink at the slightest imputation on the delicacy of their minds or morals. But can custom, or fashion, or familiarity with a lower grade of usages in other lands, alter the immutable principle of right? either make void the example of the holy women of old who trusted in God? or the injunction of the apostle: "let no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way?"

The Passion for Wealth.—The following statement, no doubt, expresses the experience of not a few who are forever grasping after wealth, and shows how, instead of possessing it, they are rather possessed by it as by a very demon. An old merchant, who is to-day immensely wealthy, and whose gold was won by unceasing struggle and many sore privations, said some time since to a friend, "I cannot deny that the older I get the more I love money, and the less I enjoy it. I am never satisfied unless I have ten or twenty thousand by me, ready for any profitable investment that may offer. And when I count the cost of what I have, and think of the enjoyment I might have had, had I spent more and been content with less, I feel that I have made my life a dreary waste. But for all that, the love of money-getting grows stronger every day, and will no doubt become more intense until life shall end, and I be compelled to give up, to be squandered by others, what it has cost me so much labor, anxiety, and positive unhappiness to amass."

What a lesson on the folly of selfishness; on the growing power of an evil habit; on the happiness that comes from giving rather than hoarding; on the wisdom of being one's own executor in doing good while life continues, rather than leaving wealth so hardly earned to be squandered by others, it may be, in folly and vice. How does it impress the injunction of the Saviour, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through and steal: for where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." What folly what madness, so to live for that which makes life itself but "a dreary waste," and that soon must be left for ever, and which, if held and used only for self, will but bring upon the soul everlasting condemnation.—Prim. Chr.

An Original Anecdote for Students.—My father, whose name is Donald Fraser, and his neighbor, William Fraser, were very intimate, and as much together as was consistent with their occupation, they being both industrious farmers. My father was nearly seventy years of age, and his friend William was several years his senior. Both were Highland Scotchmen from Invernesshire, and as is the case with so many of their countrymen, both were devotees of the pipe and the tobacco-quad from their youth up. A quarter of a century before, they had both, from conscientious motives, given up their dram, as they called it, my father leading in that movement, and persuading his friend to follow. They never were what would be called intemperate; but from that time forth they were total abstainers from all intoxicants. They were both godly men, and most of their conversation was on topics of religious experience.

One night, at my father's house, during their chatting they commenced filling their pipes, and William Fraser, turning thoughtfully to my father and tapping the bowl of his pipe with the handle of his tobacco-knife, exclaimed, "Donald, what do you think of this smoking and chewing business?"

My father shrewdly answered by asking another question, and said, "What do you think of it yourself, William?"

William replied, "Donald, we say we are Christians; and if we are Christians, we are 'free men in Christ Jesus.' Now, Donald, when we are doing this thing, and we can nae quit it, are we free?"

"Do you think yourself we are?" replied my father.

"I am nae sure o' it," said William, who retained much more of the Scotch dialect than my father.

"And see here," said my father: "what we spit around and burn into smoke, of this nasty stuff, costs us nearly as much money as we give to the Master's cause. Is this right?"

"Do you think, Donald," says William, "that if we should quit it, we could do more for Christ?"

Both then with one impulse, suiting the action to the words, said, "Let us put the things up, then," and both, rising to their feet, laid the pipes and the tobacco on the mantelpiece, where they lay for many a long day.

These two men of God never smoked nor chewed again. William Fraser has gone to his rest; my father still lives, in his eighty-sixth year, a free man.—Monthly Record.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

German Baptists.—At a District Meeting held in Virginia in the Fifth month last, as reported in The Primitive Christian, among the questions considered was that of a lay brother who had appointed meetings and preached therein. This was evidently considered to be out of order and tending to confusion. In discussing the question, whether a brother ought to serve as an administrator to a will, which would involve them in litigation and thus contravene their ancient testimony against going to law; there seemed a disposition to relax the former strictness, one of the speakers affirming, that "if people would not pay their debts when they could, they should be made to do it." There seemed to be a kindly feeling towards the poor members, and in reply to a query, "What shall be done with a brother who will not provide for his family?" it was said, "we should not deal harshly with the poor and indigent." The use of tobacco and spirits was condemned, and it was agreed to memorialize Congress in behalf of a national liquor law.

Papal Dependence.—The Presbyterian Journal contains the following item.

The Pope closes his recent Encyclical with this paragraph:

"In order that our hope may be firmer, let us call to our aid the prayers and protection of the Virgin Mary, the great Mother of God, the help of Christians, and guardian of the human race; of Saint Joseph, her most chaste spouse, in whose patronage the Universal Church confides; of Peter and Paul, the Princes of the Apostles, the guardians and champions of the Christian name."

How different from the words with which Peter closed his Encyclical:—"Grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To Him be the glory both now and forever." To Him forever, not Joseph or Mary.

[It is a pity that any professing the name of Christ should look to any created beings as "guardians of the human race," or confide in their patronage of the Church. However highly we may esteem the holy men and women who have passed away from this state of being, or who still live on the earth, we ought to remember that they were men and women of like passions with ourselves, and that it was only through submission to the Grace of God,—the Spirit of our holy Redeemer,—they obtained salvation; and that the same Divine Grace is freely offered unto us individually in order to work the same blessed fruits in us. It is to the Power of God, and not to any lower agency, the Church must look for protection and strength.]

A Liberal Freeman.—A letter to the Presbyterian Journal of this city, from Louisville, Ky., speaks of a congregation of colored people in that city who met for worship in a rented hall. They had long desired a house of their own but the prospect seemed discouraging. The letter says:

In this congregation was a quiet, unpretending Christian man by the name of Andrew Ferguson, who was once the slave of Dr. Andrew Todd, of Kentucky. After his freedom he was employed as janitor in the Hamilton Building, in the city of Louisville, where he worked faithfully for years, winning the confidence of his employers, and where he still works to-day. He holds no official position in the church, but rather seeks retirement, being naturally modest and rather diffident. He is a consistent Christian man and an earnest worker in the church in his own quiet way.

"Hearing that a German congregation had a very good house of worship on Madison street which they wished to sell, he asked his pastor to go and see what they would take for it. The pastor had no idea what was in the mind of his quiet parishioner, but went and saw the owners of the building, and reported that they would take $4,880 for it. Ferguson then requested the pastor to arrange a meeting with the trustees of the German congregation and themselves. The meeting was held and the matter talked over, and at its close the pastor was astonished to hear Ferguson say to the trustees, 'I will take that house,' and, drawing from his pocket $500, said, 'This will seal the bargain; call to-morrow at the Hamilton Building and I will pay you the remaining $4,380.' They called as directed, the deed was made to the Presbyterian Church, and the sum of $4,380 was paid over. 'There,' said the quiet member to his astonished pastor, 'is a house of worship for our congregation, take it,' and handed him the deed.

"It was a noble gift and nobly given. There was no show or parade about it. Comparatively few to this day know of the generous deed of Andrew Ferguson. It was the gift of a faithful and loving heart, for the glory of God and the elevation of his race. This gift is the more remarkable when it is known that the sum paid out was the savings of years of honest toil and economy. I learned that he had never in his life spent five cents for a cigar or a glass of liquor, or for any thing else needlessly. Faithfulness, industry and economy enabled him to lay up about $7,000, from which he took $4,880 to give to the Lord. After all, the true test of giving is not so much the amount we give, as what we have left after giving."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Buggy Booms.—In investigating some cases of sickness that occurred at Kingston, N. Y., and were supposed to be caused by eating diseased pork, it was found that the beams which were cooked with the pork were infected with small black insects. No trace of trichina could be found in the pork. On the surface of the infested beam is a faint black spot under which one or more of the insects may be found. Persons who have partaken freely of such beams have been taken violently sick with vomiting.

Bursting of Fly-wheels.—An article in the Scientific American shows that in addition to the centrifugal force generated by rotation at a high velocity, a source of danger arises from the side strain upon the wheels caused by play in the axle or weak and yielding supports to the journals.

Poison from Cosmetics.—A young married woman was brought to the hospital of the University of Michigan, partly paralyzed and suffering from pain and convulsions. It was found to be a case of lead-poisoning, produced by the use of white powder sold as "flake white," which she had been in the habit of applying to her cheeks to beautify her complexion. The "flake white" proved, on analysis, to be carbonate of lead, a deadly poison.

A Water-carrying Tortoise.—At a meeting of the California Academy of Sciences, a fine specimen of the desert land tortoise from San Bernardino Co. was received. It was as large as an ordinary bucket. The tortoise is native of the arid regions of California and Arizona. Prof. Cox, who was present, said, that he found on dissecting one of them, that it carried on each side a membrane attached to the inner portion of the shell, in which was about a pint of clear water, the whole amount being about a quart. He was of opinion that this water was derived from the giant barrel cactus, on which the tortoise feeds, and which contains a great deal of water.

In the regions frequented by the tortoise there is no water, and no vegetation but the cactus. A traveller suffering from thirst might supply himself by killing a tortoise.

Spontaneous Combustion of Nitric Acid.—In consequence of the burning of a freight car during the fall of 1879, on one of the railways in Baden, which was suspected to have been caused by nitric acid, Professor R. Haas, of Karlsruhe, was called upon by the government to report whether that acid could produce combustion or not. In the experiments made to solve this question the conditions which might be supposed to exist in freight cars containing nitric acid were imitated as far as possible. Small boxes of a capacity of 10 to 16 quarts were charged with variable proportions of hay, straw, tow, and blotting paper—all of which substances are used in packing—and placed within larger boxes, while the space between them was filled with hay or tow, to prevent too rapid a radiation of heat, because the experiments were to be conducted in the open air, and the outer box at the same time represented the walls of a railway car. The material contained in the inner box was now saturated with acid, and rather tightly compressed, so that when the cover was put on it was pretty well filled. At first reddish and afterward whitish vapors were given off, finally a distinct smoke.

lifting up the cover strongly glowing patches could be seen, which rapidly increased all through the contents, and which broke out in bright flames on access of free air or gentle fanning.—Scienc. Am.

Artificial Ice.—Ice manufactories are now in successful operation in nearly all the leading Southern cities. At Atlanta, at Jacksonville, Fla., and probably other places, the manufactured ice is made and sold by wholesale at a cost of $5 per ton, or 25 cents per 100 lbs. The process of making the ice, divested of technicalities, consists of first vaporizing ammonia, means of heat and then reducing the vapor to liquid under powerful pressure, when it is forced into a suitable receptacle ready to begin the actual process of freezing. Connected with this receptacle of pure ammonia are pipes that are emptied of air by a suitable pump, after which communication is opened between them and the ammonia. The instant this communication is established the ammonia is suddenly volatilized of its own accord and expands in vapor through these coils of gas pipe, and naturally absorbs immense quantities of calorific power from whatever is in contact with the pipes.

There are two methods for obtaining ice in use respectively. One is to stand these pipes on end in rows like candle moulds in a chamber built with double walls, and to throw spray of water from a revolving sprinkler upon them, when the water is immediately frozen into a solid mass that afterward is cut off for delivery to customers; the other is to run this coil of pipe through vats of brine that does not readily freeze, and into the salt baths immerse moulds filled with putty water that in time become frozen solid. It takes necessarily some time to get these different devices into complete operation, but when once this is done the production of ice goes on with great rapidity, and the manufacture and delivery proceed simultaneously and almost without interruption throughout the season.

The wrongs we gratuitously suspect in the motives and acts of others, are exactly those which we ourselves are capable of. Conscience holds up the mirror to our judgment, and A sees in B precisely the form of evil which exists in himself. The uncharitable man suspects the chastity of others. The untruthful man, doubts the veracity of his neighbor, and the man who could do a mean act, himself finds no difficulty in laying it to the charge of another.

A person converted in youth is like a sun rising on a summer's morning to shroud through the long bright day. But a person converted later in life is like the evening star, a lovely object of Christian contemplation but not appearing till the day is closing, or then but for a little while.

List of Agents.

We append herewith a list of Agents to whom applications may be made, and who are authorized to receive payment for "The Friend."

PENNSYLVANIA.

Trimbale, Concordville, Delaware Co.
hua Ballinger, West Chester.
omas M. Harvey, West Grove, Chester Co.
George Sharpless, London Grove, Chester Co.
jamin Gilbert, Yohoghan, Westmoreland Co.
ben Battin, Shunk P. O., Sullivan Co.
NEW JERSEY.
Charles Stokes, Medford, Burlington Co. d Wilson, Rahway.
liam Carpenter, Salem.

NEW YORK.

bert Knowles, Smyrna, Chenango Co.
red King, Aurora, Cayuga Co.
hua Haight, Somerset, Niagara Co.

MASSACHUSETTS.

liam B. Oliver, Lynde.

OHIO.

orge Blackburn, Salem, Columbiana Co.
niel Williams, Flushing, Belmont Co.
a Garretson, Barnesville, Belmont Co.
hua Brantingham, Winona, Columbiana Co. nes R. Kite, Pennsville, Morgan Co.
Isaac Huestis, Chester Hill, Morgan Co.
ker Hall, Harrisville, Harrison Co.
L. Kite, Damascusville.
liam H. Blackburn, East Carmel, Columbiana Co.
mund Fowler, Bartlett, Washington Co.
h Shaw, East Fairfield, Columbiana Co.

INDIANA.

nes Woody, Thornton, Boone Co.
en Furnas, Danville, Hendricks Co.

IOWA.

eph Hall, Springdale, Cedar Co.
omas Emmons, Coal Creek, Keokuk Co.
en Eldridge, Muscatine. hard Mott, Viola, Linn Co.

CALIFORNIA.

in Bell, San José, Santa Clara Co.

GREAT BRITAIN.

eph Armfield, South Place Hotel, Finsbury, E. C. London. hard Hall, Waverton, Wigton, Cumberland, England.

Agents and others sending the names of or subscribers will please be careful to state fact distinctly in their communications; in all cases of change of address, friends greatly oblige by giving the name of the ee to which the paper has been sent, as well as that to which it is now to be forwarded.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 20, 1881.

In a biographical sketch recently published, a Friend who had stood in the station of minister, after an allusion to the death of his wife, the following passage occurs: "His rigorous character ripened under this great sorrow, and from the time of his wife's illness, daily prayer in the family was his inalienable custom. He had made up his mind for all that it was right, and waited for further call. We were to wait each morning for some remarkably definite special call, said, 'I might wait in vain.'"

If a journal, professedly published in the interests of the Society of Friends, were to print in its columns a biographical notice of one of our members which contained such a sentiment, and its conductors really retained their attachment to the doctrines of Friends, we might reasonably expect to find some expression of dissent accompanying it—some caution to its readers against imitating a practice which is inconsistent with our principles.

We might suppose they would state, that it is the duty of all true Friends, and all true Christians of whatever denomination, to live in the fear of the Lord, and daily and hourly to wait upon Him in true reverence of soul, seeking to feel his presence about them calming their minds and bringing them into that condition in which they are prepared to receive instruction from their Heavenly Teacher, and enabled to offer to Him those aspirations of the heart which He himself has begotten. But we would expect them also to declare that he who presumes vocally to address the Supreme Being at regular stated times, without waiting to feel a "definite special call" to that service, must often offer a sacrifice which is not of the Lord's preparing.

We would reasonably expect this, because such a practice strikes at the root of the whole system of worship of the Society of Friends, and is directly opposed to the doctrines which it has advocated for more than 200 years, and to the constant succession of testimonies and advices it has issued.

Those who think it is right to engage in vocal prayer at stated times without waiting for a special call, can have little or nothing to object to a similar formal exercise of ministry at stated times. They will almost certainly become prepared to depart from our testimony to silent waiting on God and dependence on Him for ability to preach the word; and will gradually adopt the formal ways of other religious denominations.

One of Isaac Pennington's letters (No. 72 of the series), is addressed to a person who had been stumbled, because he did not regularly pray in his family "according to the custom of professors." In it he says:—"I did formerly apply myself to pray to the Lord, morning and evening, (besides other times, believing in my heart that it was the will of the Lord I should so do." "Since that time, the Lord hath shown me, that prayer is his gift to the child which He begets; and that it stands not in the will or time, or understanding, or affectionate part of the creature, but in his own begetting, which He first breathes upon, and then it breathes again towards Him; and that He worketh this in his own pleasure, and no time can be set Him when He shall breathe, or when He shall not breathe; and that when He breathes, then is the time of prayer."

In another letter, he cautions the one to whom he was writing to "take heed of putting up requests in thy own wisdom, and according to thy own will; for these are the prayers of the false-formed; or, counterfeit birth, and not of the right seed; and the Father knows not, nor regards this voice." We are more strongly impressed with a sense of the need of attention being called to this subject, because we have heard ministers pressing upon parents the duty of vocal family prayer with so much zeal, that they left out of view the essential pre-requisite of knowing the mind to be furnished with a fresh anointing of Divine grace. Many can bear witness to the seasoning and preserving effect upon them of the religious exercise of godly parents, even of some whose mouths were rarely opened in this service in their families, but whose secret cries for their own preservation and for the salvation of their beloved offspring went up as sweet incense to the Lord. We desire not to discourage a vocal offering, when rightly called for, for it is a solemn and impressive service when attended by the Lord's power; while prayers attempted in the will and wisdom of man are correspondingly lifeless and unprofitable.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A very serious change for the worse took place in President Garfield's condition during First-day night, and there was no amelioration of the symptoms on Second-day. His stomach refused to perform its functions, and he was unable to retain any food, even a drink of cold water being rejected. Repeated vomitings increased the patient's prostration, and at the time of making this Summary, although some relief was reported, grave apprehensions were entertained of the result.

The extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States has been approved by the Congress at Bogota.

Fifth-day of last week was the hottest day in fourteen years at Quincy, Illinois, the thermometer reaching 108 degrees in the shade. At Winnipeg, Manitoba, during the last two weeks, the temperature has ranged from 73 to 91 degrees in the shade—a fact without parallel, so far as known, in the history of that region.

The first party of twenty-five Chinese students who left Hartford for their home arrived at Chicago last week. They said they had finished the studies for which they were sent to this country. One reason given by them for being summoned home is that the military and naval academies in this country are closed to them. As Germany allows them to enter her institutions, they are probably to be sent to that country or to England. Nine of their party have changed their faith in America.

Official returns from 73 counties in North Carolina show a majority of 98,965 against Prohibition; 23 counties are to be heard from. The only place yet known to have voted for Prohibition is Haywood, which gives it 21 majority.

The horses at La Salle, Illinois, are being prostrated by a strange epidemic. About four hundred animals have been attacked.

The assessed valuation of the Territory of Dakota, not including railroad property, is 30,000,000, an increase of 50 per cent. in one year.

The discoveries of carbonate nine miles from Deadwood, Dakota, have resulted in the springing up of a new town, dubbed West Virginia, "which is well represented in all branches of trade, and supports a daily newspaper."

For the week ending 8th mo. 13th there were 450 deaths in Philadelphia, as compared with 398 the previous week, and 332 for the corresponding week of last year: 182 of these were two years of age or under—62 died of cholera infantum; 37 of consumption; 32 of measles, mumps, and 29 of pneumonia.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3 1/2's, 102 1/2; 4's, registered, 112 1/2; coupon, 114 1/2; 4's, 1907, 116 1/2; currency 6's, 131.

Petroleum is quiet and steady at 7 1/2 cts. for refined in barrels, and 10 1/2 cts. for do. in cases.

Cotton, lard and unchanged. Sales at 12 1/2 cts. for middling uplands and Gulf.

Flour and Meal.—Flour is in fair request and firm. Sales of 1400 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at a $6 25 for clear, and $6.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $5.75 a $6; western do. do. at $6 a $6.75, and patents at $7 a $7.50. Rye flour is quiet at $4.50 a $5 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is excited and higher. Sales of 7000 bushels new red at $1.18 a $1.24, according to quality and location; 125,000 bushels sold at old board, closing at $1.33. Rye is nominal at 70 a 75 cts. Corn is active and a little higher. Sales of 7000 bushels, including soft yellow, at 66 cts.; do. mixed at 65 1/2 cts.; steamer at 63 a 64 1/2 cts.; No. 3 at 63 cts., and rejected at 58 a 61 cts. Oats are in better request and lie higher. Sales of 9000 bushels, including white, at 44 a 47 cts., and rejected and mixed at 43 a 44 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 8th mo.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, EIGHTH MONTH 27, 1881.

NO. 3.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance, $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend,"

at-honor in the Court-room in Cincinnati,
Second month, 1881.

A Friend says, I have been convinced for some time that Modern Quakerism would persecute on those who stand firm in the practical testimony and examples of silent Friends. There was a case in Cincinnati that might make any person think of the days of George Fox. A Friend stepped to the court-room with his hat on, a person came towards him and motioned his pencil said, "Take off your hat." The Friend said, "I have had liberty of conscience, and belonged to the Society of Friends. The officer took his hat off and handed it to him, he put on and said he had nowhere else to keep it, he took it off again. The Friend said, I want to see the reporter. He said he was in another court-room. The Friend then went to the higher court-room and was met again by a person motioning his pencil to take off his hat. The Friend told him he was a member of the Society of Friends, and no true Friend ever took off his hat to any man. The officer then said, he wanted to see the reporter. The officer said, Go out, and I will find him out. After a little while he came back and said, the reporter was busy but would come out after a little while.

The Friend thought, what a trying situation this would be for a young Friend who was raised in the fashions of the world, with a bell-crown hat on, such as we see on many of our people called ministers under the name of Quakers.

A Friend unacquainted, may think strange when he learns that Monthly Meetings have been held in Cincinnati for more than fifty years, under the name of Quakers or Friends, at such a case should happen there. I suppose the time has not been long since Friends could be seen in these court rooms on the way with their hats on. I have many times seen them in the jury box, elsewhere, with their hats on.

The following is from George Fox's Journal, taken off the hat:

"Moreover, when the Lord sent me into the world, he forbade me 'to put off my hat any high or low; and I was required to respect to all men and women, without respect to rich or poor, great or small,

And as I travelled up and down, I was not to bid people good morrow, or good evening; neither might I bow, or scrape with my leg to any one; this made the seats and professors rage. But the Lord's power carried me over all to his glory, and many came to be turned to God in a little time, for the heavenly day of the Lord spring from on high, and broke forth apace; by the light of which many came to see where they were.

"Oh! the rage that was in the priests, magistrates, professors, and people of all sorts, and especially in priests and professors; for though thou to a single person was according to their accidence and grammar rules and according to the Bible, yet they could not bear to hear it; and because I could not put off my hat to them it set them all in a rage, but the Lord showed me that it was an honor below, which he would lay in the dust and stain; an honor that proud flesh looked for, but sought not the honor which comes from God only. That it was an honor invented by man in the fall, and in the alienation from God, who were offended, if it were not given them yet would be looked upon as saints, church members, and great Christians, but Christ sayeth, 'how can ye believe who receive honor one of another, and seek not that honor that cometh from God only?' and I (saith Christ) receive not honor of men; showing that men have an honor which they will receive and give, but Christ will have none of it. This is the honor which Christ will not receive and which must be laid in the dust. Oh! the scorn, heat, and fury that arose! Oh! the blows, punching, beatings and imprisonments we underwent for not putting off our hats to men! For that soon tried all men's patience and sobriety, what it was. Some had their hats violently plucked off and thrown away, so that they quite lost them. The bad language and evil usage we received on this account is hard to be expressed, besides the danger we were sometimes in of losing our lives for this matter, and that by the professors of Christianity who thereby discovered they were not true believers. And though it was but a small thing in the eye of man, yet a wonderful confusion it brought among all professors and priests; but, blessed be the Lord, many came to see the vanity of that, the custom of putting off the hat to men, and felt the weight of truth's testimony against it." Page 74-75.

"At the first conviction when Friends could not put off their hats to people, nor say you to a single person, but thou and thee, or could not bow nor use flattering words, many Friends, that were tradesmen, lost their customers, for the people were shy of them, and would not trade with them, so that for a time some could hardly get money enough to buy bread." Page 154.

"They got up a great rage among the professors and priests against us. They said, this people thou and thee all men without respect, and would not put off their hats, nor bow the knee to any man; but we shall see when the assize come, whether they will dare to thou and thee the judge, and keep on their hats before him. When we were brought into the court, we stood a pretty while with our hats on, and all was quiet; and I was moved to say, 'Peace be amongst you!' Judge Glyn, a Welshman, then Chief Justice of England, said to the jailor, 'What be these you have brought here in the court?' 'Prisoners, my lord,' said he. 'Why do you not put off your hats,' said the judge to us. We said nothing. 'Put off your hats, said the judge again. 'Still we said nothing. Then said the judge, 'The court commands you to put off your hats.' Then I queried, 'Where did ever any magistrate, king, or judge, from Moses to Daniel, command any to put off their hats, when they came before them in their courts, either amongst the Jews (the people of God), or amongst the heathen?' And if the laws of England doth command any such thing, show me that law, either written or printed.' The judge grew very angry, and said, 'I do not carry my law books on my back.' But, said I, tell me where it is printed in any statute book, that I may read it? Then said the judge, 'Take him away, prevaricator; so they took us away, and put us among the thieves. Presently after he called to the jailor, bring them up again! 'Come,' said he, 'where had they hats from Moses to Daniel? come, answer me, I have you fast now.' I replied, 'thou mayest read in the third of Daniel, that the three children were cast into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar's command, with their coats, their hose, and their hats on.' This plain instance stopped him; so that not having anything else to the point, he cried again, 'Take them away, jailor.' Accordingly we were taken away, and thrust in among the thieves, where we were kept a great while." Page 203-204.

[They had in court a subject about a paper which George Fox wrote.]

"Then they dropped that subject, and the judge fell upon us about our hats again, bidding the jailor take them off; which he did; and giving them to us, we put them on again. We asked the judge and justices, what we had lain in prison for these nine weeks, seeing now they objected nothing to us but about our hats? And as for putting off our hats, I told them, 'that was the honor that God would lay in the dust, though they made so much ado about it; the honor which is of men and which men seek one of another, and is a mark of unbelievers.' 'For how can ye believe,' saith Christ, 'who receive honor one of another, and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?' Christ saith, 'I receive not honor from men' and all true Christians should be of his mind." Page 205-206.

"The judge, finding these snares would not hold, cried, 'Take him away, jailor; and when we were taken away, he fined us twenty marks a piece for not putting off our hats, to be kept in prison till we paid it, and sent us back to jail." Page 208.

"A great deal of hypocrisy, deceit and strife, was got uppermost in the people, so that they were ready to sheathe their swords into one another's bowels. There had been tenderness in many of them formerly when they were low; but when they got up, had been killed and taken possession, they came to be as bad as others; so that we had much to do with them about our hats, and saying thee and thou to them. They turned their profession of patience and moderation into rage and madness, many of them were like distracted men for this hat-honour. For they hardened themselves by persecuting the innocent, and were at this time crucifying the seed, Christ, both in themselves and others." Page 310.

For "The Friend."

The Present Faith of the Hebrew.

(Continued from page 12.)

After some further conversation, finding in this interesting case a real disposition to inquire and consider where might lie the path of duty, the writer asked his Jewish friend if he would like to know more of Friends and their opinions, and if to accomplish this, he would be willing to read the Life of George Fox and a few tracts if furnished him: to which he gave affirmative answer.

Accordingly these were obtained, and two or three evenings later a visit was made to him at his own home, the writer taking with him the volume and tracts referred to. A cordial welcome was extended, introduction made to wife and children, and the book, &c., presented; which were accepted with evident pleasure. Conversation soon reverted to the former topic, and as the girl passed by leading the two youngest children by the hand, it was asked, "You have a Christian servant?" "Oh yes; our people often have,—and our children go with one's to her Sunday school. The old folks (his wife's parents) don't approve of it, but we have no objection to it. I often go myself to a Christian church, the Presbyterian or some other. I tell you, my friend, in fifty years there will be a great change among us. Our young people have lost interest and are losing it in the old ways; they are saying to themselves, 'Where is the use? We have lost heart. Why, my brother and myself were sent for years to a Hebrew teacher, to study Hebrew—so was my wife—but we neither of us care for it or make use of it now, and for our children we see more use in English and German.'"

It was said, "Daniel, if you accept Jesus Christ as your Messiah, and learn to believe and hope in Him, do you cease thereby to belong to your ancient and once favored race? Yes, and your children would not cease to be Hebrews by becoming believers in Christ. Have you in the house a copy of the Old Testament as translated by the Rabbis?" "No; I have one, but it has been loaned." Have you a copy of the Prophet Daniel in the house? "Yes," he said, rather hesitatingly, and immediately rose and beckoned the writer to follow him up stairs. This he did, and the host, lighting the gas in their sitting room, showed him, lying alone on a marble-topped table in the centre of the room, a (Christian) Bible of the largest size, illustrated by Doré! "There," he said, "my wife's father thinks I have no business with that book in the house, but I don't agree with him. The old people are very strict and orthodox, but not one of their children sees with them: we often talk things over together, and I have myself lain awake at night, sometimes an hour or two, thinking and asking myself 'Who was that man?' The writer inquired, 'Are sacrifices of lambs, bullocks and he-goats offered now among the Hebrews?' The answer was, 'they are not, anywhere.' 'When were they discontinued?' 'At the destruction of Jerusalem.'"

Hereupon the writer opened the Bible at the 9th chapter of Daniel, and read aloud the last five verses, pointing out the correspondence of the leading facts in the life of Christ with the exact description laid down there, over 400 years before, by the prophet whose namesake he was,—read and re-read the emphatic declaration that "The Messiah should be cut off, but not for himself,"—stated that this was, according to the belief of the Christian, for the sins of us all, Jew and Gentile alike; and read the prediction that during the years of His earthly abiding He should "cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease." With this passage he was greatly struck, requested it to be marked for him with a pencil, and expressed more than once his surprise that in his own reading it had escaped him. The writer then turned to Isaiah liii. and read the entire chapter aloud, pointing out the absolute correspondence of this remarkable prediction with the entire life on earth of our Lord, showing how he had in the Christian Church "seen his seed and prolonged his days"—lo for 1800 years,—so that thousands and tens of thousands still believe and trust and hope in Him, with whatever of human imperfections they do it,—and how in the striking facts of His condemnation, death and burial, exact accord with all this prophetic description, given hundreds of years before, had been realized. Then closing the Bible, he said, "Daniel, no other man in all history would meet this description. You as a people, nineteen centuries ago, were steadily looking for the Messiah. This man appeared, ostensibly the son of a carpenter, by many believed illegitimate, of the known family of David. Brought up with no advantages of Jewish learning; not at the feet of any of your Rabbis, this man lived a blameless life, and his teachings were such as still to affect the world after the lapse of eighteen centuries. He was accompanied by men who afterwards gave themselves to violent death rather than deny Him, this man would have been spared for the denial. These men with some hundreds of others, declared that after his crucifixion He arose again and was among them on several occasions. Rather than deny this, they and every many others went to their death in the first two centuries of this era. Commenced in an obscure corner of the Roman Empire, in three or four centuries this new religion, in spite of bloody and protracted persecution, began to dominate the entire civilized world.

But, for the man himself, who was He? Consider the facts of his death! In the world's history, no man is known to have lived, not even Abraham or David, who dared address God the Almighty peculiarly as his Father; nor had any man ever been known before His coming to invoke forgiveness for his destroyers. Yet this man cried in the last supreme moment of bodily anguish, 'Father! forgive them! for they know not what they do!'

Here the Hebrew said, "He was something more than man! He was not a man." Remark was made that the Friends make no efforts to proselytize; some description was given him of their views and mode of worship, and he signified that he would be glad at a suitable time to attend one of their meetings. "Friend ———, would not a Hebrew who should become converted be permanently disgraced both among the Jews and Christians?" It was replied: no,—not if sincere; and attention was called to the conspicuous case of Loe Beconsfield, whose father had apostatized from Judaism, but who was considered a Hebrew with pride by the members of that ancient race. It was also said, that the Christian world regarded with respect the sincerity of those Jews who in the terrible Spanish persecutions of the Inquisition, had adhered to their convictions in the very presence of death. Friends, too, in their turn, had undergone heavy persecution by imprisonments in England, and some in this country had been put to death, but they had held firmly to their convictions, being strengthened in their endurance by the sincerity of their belief. To-day neither death nor imprisonment in this country awaits those who from depth of conviction adopt new religious opinions, or views diverse from those held by relatives, associates or friends; and for those minor sorrows that would arise from the alienation of these, the consolations of faith in Jesus Christ would be ample compensation. It was felt to be best, and at this time sufficient, to recommend to him the quiet, serious perusal of the Gospel of Matthew.

At parting, the writer was very warmly invited to repeat his visit at this Jewish home,—and he could not perceive that there was any hesitation on the part of that family as to maintaining social relations with their Gentile neighbors.

And now, in conclusion, the writer would say that the Lord himself announces that this "house," this ancient and remarkable race of which He was himself the crowning glory, shall be "left desolate" until they shall say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord!" If indeed the sons of Jacob shall be led in an early generation to look with sorrow upon Him whom they have pierced, and in "the spirit of grace and supplication" to "mourn for Him as one mourneth for his only son," and to turn with their whole heart to the Lord of grace and glory,—how should it rejoice the sincere believers in Christ among the Gentiles to recognize therein the fulfilment of prophecy, and to extend to them that band of Christian fellowship and brotherhood! P. M. J.

Hard to Please.—Some people are never content with their lot, let what will happen. Clouds and darkness are over their heads, alike whether it rain or shine. To them every incident is an accident, and every accident calamity. Even when they have their own way, they like it no better than your way, and, indeed, consider their most voluntary acts as matters of compulsion. We saw a striking illustration the other day of their firmity we speak of in the conduct of a child about three years old. He was crying because his mother had shut the parlor door. "Poor thing," said a neighborly compassionate; "you have shut the child out." "It is all the same to him," said the mother; "h ld cry if I called him in, and then shut door. It's a peculiarity of that boy, that e is left rather suddenly on either side of oor, he considers himself shut out, and els accordingly."

For "The Friend,"

Thomas Wright.

The life of this true lover of his fellow-men shies an instructive instance of the good t may be effected by faithfully following the path of duty, which will open before y one who is sincerely desirous of walk- therein. The following narrative is con- ded from the account of him given by S. les.

His home was at Manchester, England, and e age of fifteen he was apprenticed to an ounder. "Being a steady, sober, diligent ow, he gradually worked his way up, until, twenty-three, he became foreman of the lders, at a weekly salary of £3 10s. This s his highest income, but the good that e reward did was altogether independent of money wages.

His attention was early awakened to the inal classes, the most hopeless of objects. A convict, when let loose from jail, can very ly get employment in his old place. New ters will not employ him without a charac- which he cannot give. Imprisonment has bably made him worse. It has brought in contact with more vicious persons than self. He is thus thrown back upon his mer associates, and begins his criminal ar as before.

One day a man called at the foundry, and igned employment as a laborer. He was eady, careful, and industrious workman. It oozed out that the man was a dis- rged convict. Thomas Wright was asked ther he was cognizant of the fact. He ot, but he promised to ascertain. In course of the day Wright incidentally ed the man where he had worked last; e been abroad," was the man's reply. At after some further pressing inquiries, the n man, with tears running down his cheeks, itted that he was a returned convict, that was desirous of not relapsing into his old ys, and that he hoped, by perseverance, to e out his evil character.

Wright believed the man. He was on- ced that he was sincere in his intentions, acquainted the employers with his history, offered to place £20 in their hands as a rantee for his future good conduct. The ouse was then given that the convict ould be retained; but on the following morn- the man was missing, the order for his dis- al having, through inadvertence, not been rmanded. A messenger was at once t to the man's lodging to bring him back ork. But the man had already left his ing, taking with him a bundle containing his worldly belongings.

Having ascertained that the man had set in the direction of Bury, T. Wright im- diately followed him on foot. He found g fugitive sitting by the roadside, a few as from Manchester, heart-broken, wretch- and despairing. Wright lifted him up, ok him by the hand, told him that he was ined in his employment, and that every- ing now depended upon himself, whether ould maintain his character as a respect- e workman. They returned together to Manchester, they entered the shop together, and the future conduct of the man amply and nobly justified the guarantee into which the foreman had entered.

This circumstance greatly affected Thomas Wright himself. He saw how much could be done by sympathy and human affection to rescue these poor criminals from the depths of misery into which they had fallen. He felt that they should not abandon all hope of recovery, and that it behoved every Christian man to give them a helping hand toward re- entering industrial life. This subject became the great idea of his soul. It was his mission, and he endeavored to fulfill it. He was as yet without a helper. But he had strong faith, and he persevered until he succeeded.

He, Wright, lived near the Salford prison, and desired to have access to the prisoners. For a long time he failed in his application. At last one of the young men in the foundry, whose father was a turnkey in the jail, obtained for him an introduction to the governor. He was then permitted to attend the First-day afternoon services. He was not permitted, as yet, to see the prisoners individually. But he had the patience to wait.

At length, one First-day afternoon, the chaplain stopped T. Wright on leaving the prison chapel, and asked him if he could procure a situation for a prisoner whose term of office had nearly expired, and who desired to have the chance of proving the reformation of his character. "Yes," said Wright; "I will do my best, I will endeavor to find a situation." He succeeded, and work was found for the discharged prisoner.

The governor now gave him a freer run of the jail. He allowed him to visit the prisoners personally. Wright advised and counseled them. He strengthened their determination to amend. He conveyed messages home to their families, and made himself their friend and benefactor in many ways. He made it a practice to meet the prisoners on their discharge. He took them to their homes, and helped them, out of his scanty means, to subsist, and then he endeavored to find employment for them.

He was in most cases successful. Employers of labor came to believe in Thomas Wright. They knew him to be a good and benevolent man, and that he would not counsel them wrongly. He took the employers into his confidence, and they usually employed the released felons. Where they had doubts, he guaranteed their fidelity by deposits of his own money—gathered together out of his foreman's wages of seventy shillings a week.

He went on quietly and unostentatiously in this way—preferring that no notice should be taken of his name, lest it might interfere with the good that he was doing; until he had succeeded in a few years in finding employment for nearly three hundred discharged prisoners! He even succeeded—the worst task of all—in reclaiming women from drunkenness. He would sometimes go miles into the country to plead with husbands, even on his knees, to take back the wife who was now too drunk, but was penitent and longing for home.

A remarkable case is mentioned by one of his friends.* A man who had been undergoing penal servitude at Portland was discharged, and repaired to Manchester with a ticket of leave and a letter from the chaplain to Thomas Wright. Employment was found for him as a scavenger. T. Wright had him promoted to be a mender of roads; and here also his conduct was approved. He obtained admission for him to the late Canon Stowell's First-day and week-day night schools, in both of which he became a teacher. He showed so much capacity for learning that Canon Stowell felt a great interest in him. The Canon was made acquainted with his antecedents. Nevertheless he made arrangements for 'reading' with him, and in due time the Portland convict was ordained a clergyman.

In another case a young man, engaged in a position of trust in a warehouse, had fallen into bad company, and embezzled his employer's money. The theft was discovered, and he was about to be prosecuted. The young man's father besought the mediation of Thomas Wright. He immediately went to the employer, and succeeded in eliciting a promise not to prosecute, but to give the youth another trial. "Give him another chance," was often Thomas Wright's urgent advice. The young man was taken on again. His behavior was most satisfactory. He gave himself more to business pursuits than before. He was at length taken in as a partner, and eventually became the head of the firm. He never ceased to bless the name of Thomas Wright."

(To be concluded.)

Curious Superstition.

Stopping one afternoon at a Kebrabasa village, a man, who pretended to be able to change himself into a lion, came to salute us. Smelling the gunpowder from a gun which had been discharged, he went on to one side to get out of the wind of the piece, trembling in a most artistic manner, but quite overacting his part. The Makololo explained to us that he was a Pondoro, or a man who can change his form at will, and added that he trembles when he smells gunpowder. "Do you not see how he is trembling now?" We told them to ask him to change himself at once into a lion, and we would give him a cloth for the performance. "Oh no," replied they; "if we will tell him so, he may change himself and come when we are asleep and kill us." Having similar superstitions at home, they readily became as firm believers in the Pondoro as the natives of the village. We were told that he assumes the form of a lion and remains in the woods for days, and is sometimes absent for a whole month. His considerate wife had built him a hut or den, in which she places food and beer for her transformed lord, whose metamorphosis does not impair his human appetite. No one ever enters this hut except the Pondoro and his wife, and no stranger is allowed even to rest his gun against the Baobab-tree beside it: the Mfumo, or petty chief of another small village, wished to fit our men for placing their muskets against an old tumble-down hut, it being that of the Pondoro. At times the Pondoro employs his acquired powers in hunting for the benefit of the village; and, after an absence of a day or two, his wife smells the lion, takes a certain medicine, places it in the forest, and there quickly leaves it, lest the lion should kill even her. This medicine enables the Pondoro to change himself back into a man, return to the village, and say, "Go and get the game that I have killed for you." Advantage is of course taken of what a lion has done, and they go and bring home the buffalo or antelope killed when he was a lion, or rather found when he was patiently pursuing his course of deception in the forest. We saw the Pondoro of another village dressed in a fantastic style, with numerous charms hung round him, and followed by a troop of boys, who were honoring him with rounds of shrill cheering.

* The author of "Lives that Speak."

It is believed also that the souls of departed chiefs enter into lions and render them sacred. On one occasion, when we had shot a buffalo in the path beyond the Kafue, a hungry lion, attracted probably by the smell of the meat, came close to our camp, and roused up all hands by his roaring. Tuba Mokoro, imbued with the popular belief that the beast was a chief in disguise, scolded him roundly during his brief intervals of silence. "You a chief, eh? You call yourself a chief, do you? What kind of a chief are you, to come sneaking about in the dark, trying to steal our buffalo meat? Are you not ashamed of yourself? A pretty chief, truly; you are like the scavenger beetle, and think of yourself only. You have not the heart of a chief; why don't you kill your own beef? You must have a stone in your chest, and no heart at all, indeed." Tuba Mokoro produced no impression on the transformed chief, one of the men, the most sedate of the party, who seldom spoke, took up the matter, and tried the lion in another strain. In his slow, quiet way, he expostulated with him on the impropriety of such conduct to strangers, who had never injured him. "We were travelling peaceably through the country back to our own chief. We never killed people, nor stole anything. The buffalo meat was ours, not his, and it did not become a great chief like him to be prowling round in the dark, trying, like a hyena, to steal the meat of strangers. He might go and hunt for himself, as there was plenty of game in the forest." The Pondoro, being deaf to reason, and only roaring the louder, the men became angry, and threatened to send a ball through him if he did not go away. They snatched up their guns to shoot him, but he prudently kept in the dark, outside of the luminous circle made by our camp-fires, and there they did not like to venture. A little strychnine was put into a piece of meat and thrown to him, when he soon departed, and we heard no more of the majestic sneaker.—D. Livingstone.

For "The Friend."

Ascent of Chimborazo and Cotopaxi.

The Scientific American contains a lecture on the ascent of these celebrated mountains, delivered by Edward Whymper, a noted mountaineer, before the Society of Arts in London.

Among the difficulties to be overcome in climbing these very elevated summits is an affection called Mountain Sickness, which is attributed to the diminution of atmospheric pressure as one goes up. At 20,000 feet the pressure is less than one-half of that at the level of the sea; and it is obvious that the human system is liable to derangement when subjected to a sudden change of pressure to such an extent. The effect is often so severe as to render mountain travellers incapable of enduring it, so that they seek relief by descending into lower regions. In the course of his journey, E. Whymper spent many nights at great elevations (one at 19,000 feet) and found the sufferings from mountain sickness gradually abated as his body became accustomed to the lightness of the atmospheric pressure.

Taking with him two Italian mountaineers as assistants, and about two tons weight of the most portable and condensed provisions, including 2000 tin cans of various articles, he left England on the 3d of 11th mo. 1879; landed at Guayaquil; went from thence by river steamer to Bodegas; and three days' travel brought him to Guaranda, about 15 miles from Chimborazo.

The caravan consisted of 19 persons and 14 mules and the first camping ground was at an elevation of 14,400 feet. The second camping spot was on a ridge near the summit 16,500 feet high. It required two journeys from the first camp to bring to this spot the provisions and fuel that were thought needful. This was only accomplished by the greatest exertions on the part of the people and their beasts. The mules staggered under their burthens, though only half of what they were accustomed to carry, stopped repeatedly, and by their tremblings and falling on their knees and general behavior, showed that they were on the very verge of exhaustion. Whymper says that within an hour of arriving at the camp he found himself lying on his back, incapable of exertion, and experiencing his first attack of mountain sickness. "We were feverish, had intense headaches, and were unable to satisfy our desire for air except by breathing with open mouths. This naturally parched the throat and produced a craving for drink, which we were unable to satisfy. We could only sip, and were obliged to stop for breath, and gasp again till our throats were as dry as ever. Besides having our normal rate of breathing largely accelerated, we found it impossible to get along without every now and then giving a spasmodic gulp, just like fishes when taken out of the water."

In a few days these unfavorable symptoms greatly abated, and a third camping place was selected at the height of 17,400 feet. Hail, snow and thunder-storms, which visited them daily, retarded their movements, but the final climb was undertaken on the 3rd of 1st month, 1880. After ascending about 1000 feet the party was met by a furious and intensely cold wind, which compelled them to abandon the things they were carrying, and fly for refuge to the camp. The next morning was very fine and cloudless, and profiting by the steps they had made the previous day, they crossed a ridge of rocks and reached a height of 18,400 feet by 8 o'clock. The narrative says, "We then bore away towards the west, over a snow-covered glacier, and ascended spirally, so as to break the ascent. There were few crevasses; the snow was in good order, although steps had to be cut in it. I noticed that our steps got shorter and shorter, until at last the toe of one foot touched the heel of the previous one. At 10 A. M., at a height of 19,500 feet, we passed the highest rock, which was nothing but a volcanic cinder. For some distance further, we continued our progress at a reasonable rate, having fine weather and a good deal of sunshine. At about 11 A. M. we fancied we saw through the heavy clouds which covered the whole country to the west, and shortly afterward, being then nearly 20,000 feet high, we arrived at another plateau near the top of the mountain. The summits now seemed within our grasp; we could see both, one on our right, and another a little further away on our left, with a hollow plateau about a third of a mile across between them. We remarked that in about another hour we could get to the top of either; and, not knowing which of the two was the higher, we made for the nearer. But at this point the condition of affairs completely changed, the sky became clouded all over, wind arose, and we entered a large tract of dusty, soft snow, which could not be traversed in the ordinary way. The leading man was up to his neck almost out of sight, and had to be pulled out by those behind. Imagining we had got into a labyrinth of crevasses, we turned about right and left to try and extricate ourselves, and, after discovering it was everywhere alike, we found the only possible way to proceed was to slog every yard of it down, and then crawl over it on all fours; and even then, one or another was frequently submerged, and almost disappeared. Needless to say, the time went rapidly. When we had been at this sort of work three hours, without having accomplished half the remaining distance, I halted the men, pointed out the gravity of the situation, and asked them whether they preferred to turn or go on. After consulting together, Jean Antoine (one of the Swiss mountaineers, who, with his brother, were the only attendants), said, "When you tell me to turn, we will go back; until then we will go on." I said, "Go on," although by no means feeling sure it would not have been best to say "Go back." In another hour and a half we got to the foot of the southern summit, and as the angle steepened, the snow became firmer. We arrived at the top about a quarter to four in the afternoon, and then had the mortification of finding it was the lower of the two. There was no help for it, we had to descend to the plateau, resume flogging the road, and floundering on, to make for the highest point. There again, when we got up to the dome, the snow was reasonably firm and we arrived upon it at last, standing up right like men, instead of groveling, as we had been during the last five hours, like beasts of the field.

"The wind was blowing at the rate of about 50 miles an hour from the northeast. We were getting wretched and hungry, without having the means to satisfy ourselves. With great trouble a mercurial barometer was set up. One man grasped the tripod, another attempted to give it shelter by a poncho from the wind, and I, myself, lay on my stomach in the snow watching the descent of the mercury. It fell till it was 14.1 inches, at temperature of 14° Fahr., which, when compared with an observation made on the same day at Guayaquil, gives for the height of Chimborazo 20,540 feet.

"By the time the barometer was in its place again it was 20 minutes past 5 o'clock, and there was scarcely an hour and a quarter of day-light remaining. We fled across the plateau at the highest possible rate. There is a great difference between descending an ascending soft snow, and, as we had a huge trough or groove already made, we moved down it with comparative facility. Still, took nearly an hour to extricate ourselves from that plateau; we then ran for our lives for our arrival at the camp that night depended on our being able to cross those rocks before darkness fairly set in. We just succeeded in arriving at them in time, although it became pitch dark before we crossed them

we saw our camp fire, and arrived there after 9 p. m., having been out nearly 16 rs.

(To be collected.)

Selected.

DEAD EGYPT.

Isaiah xix. 25.

Are thy pyramids still smiling
To the everlasting day,
Mighty Mizraim of the sand-waste,
As they smiled in ages gone?

Is thy sphinx still grandly gazing
With those melancholy eyes,
Drinking in delicious moonlight
From those silver-showering skies?

Does thy gray Mukattam cliff-range
Yet protect thy level shore?
Is that highway to the desert
Still as lonely as of yore?

Is the bronze on thy brown ripples
Still as brilliant as when she,
Stately queen of spells and splendor,
Gilded o'er her river-reef?

Does that river-sea so royal,
With its soft, slow-swaying tide,
Still do battle single-handed
With the wastes on either side?

Are thy Pharaohs resting yonder,
Filling each his fragrant shroud,
With their own calm stars above them,
As of old, without a cloud?

Do they still claim awful homage,
Oldest peerage of the dead,
In their chiselled shrines unconscious
Of the ages that have sped?

Does the breath of ancient odors
Sweeten still their cheerless room?
Do the robes of princely Pathos
Still adorn them in the tomb?

Is thy Memphis still the Memphis
Of young Mizraim when he came
From his cradle-plain of Shinar,
Here to build a boundless name?

Mystic-realm of magic story,
Never-changing clime and stream,
Shadowy fatherland of science,
Home of fable and of dream.

From thy temples marched the ages
Of our earth's unwritten prime;
These majestic Nubian portals
Are the moulting gates of time.

Buried dark beneath the ruins
Of dead kingdoms thou hast lain;
But thy day of honor dawneth,
Thou shalt rise to youth again.

In his hour of infant exile,
Once the Son of God in thee
Found a refuge from the tyrant,
Underneath thy sheltering tree.

And for this thou art remembered;
This great debt shall be repaid.
In earth's age of promised glory
Israel's God shall lift thy head.

For the voice of seers hath spoken
Words of glorious light and rest;
It has blent thee with the East;
And thou shalt—thou shalt be blest.

—Horatius Bonar.

Selected.

HEART PROMPTINGS.

I wanted to send her some flowers
For 'tis just two years to-day
Since the little ones were taken
From my neighbor over the way.
But John said, "Will that go will it do her?
And why bring up the past?"
He was sure she wouldn't want flowers,
So I gave it up at last.

Men often think me foolish,
To do these "useless" things;
But if they call us "angels,"
They should not clip our wings.

There is something that tells us to do them—

A feeling we can't resist
Perhaps if we gave up doing,
There'd be something lost and missed.

And I can't help feeling the Master
Still speaks for us now, as when
He defended those simple women
Before the wiser men,
And when, all worn and weary,
With hours in field and street,
That woman's tears provided
The water for his feet.

All saw that He was sly; and
Yet the men who loved Him, too,
Might have whispered, "Useless, foolish,"
Had they known what she would do.
But the woman's sudden impulse,
With love's unerring aim,
Went straight to the heart of Jesus,
And her deed to blessed fame.

And again, when His soul was heavy
With the burden of unshared we,
Wounded by those who loved Him,
As well as by open foes,
One heart—a woman's—answered,
With an act that met his need,
And heaven and earth still witness
To the fragrance of her deed.

But by some of his own disciples
It was judged in angry haste:
"The poor might have had the money;
To what purpose all this waste?"
"She hath done what she could," He answered,
"Hath wrought a good work on me;
And this she hath done in my gospel
Her endless memorial shall be."

And then, although sadly "useless,"
One voice—a woman's—rose
For "that just man," forsaken,
Before his bitter foes.
And all the Way of Sorrows
Love's fearless protest came
From that noble band of women
To whom He spake by name.

Around the cross of their Master,
They stood to the very end.
"You can do no good," was whispered,
Doubtless by many a friend.
Yet from his cross He saw them,
And Mary, standing there,
Heard his own voice commit her
To John's protecting care.

Love speaks a simple language,
But speak it man and will,
And our Lord doth set his sanction
On its tender promptings still.
He has gone himself to heaven,
But He lives in his own to-day—
I think I will send those flowers
To my neighbor over the way.

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

The close of Alexander Jaffray's career, who may be considered as having opened the very root and ground of the rise of the Society of Friends in Scotland, took place on the 7th of the 5th month, 1673, at the age of fifty-nine years. He was removed from the warfare of this life, in full assurance of a glorious and immortal inheritance among the blessed of all generations.

During his illness, which lasted twelve days, he gave forth, in the presence of many Friends and others, very substantial attestation to that most excellent dispensation of gospel light and truth, unto which he had of late years been more perfectly and fully brought; in which also, he had given up with all readiness of mind to walk, and in defence of which, resignedly to suffer. Among other expressions, these following abundantly prove the blessed condition of his spirit, up to the awful change.

He remarked, it was his great joy and comfort in that trying hour, that ever he had been counted worthy to bear a testimony to, and suffer for the unspeakable gift of Christ's inward appearance in the hearts of the children of men, visiting all by his light, grace, and good Spirit, which convinceth of sin. And further, that the great judgment and condemnation of many in the nation, especially the religious professors, was and would be, their having so slighted and despised, yea, hated this Divine light, and the witnesses of it.

Being overcome in spirit, he occasionally said, "Now, Lord, let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes spiritually have seen, my heart hath felt, and, feeling, shall for ever feel, thy salvation!"

He also left this prediction among his friends, that a time of great and near trial was shortly coming upon Friends in that corner of the land, wherein hypocrites should be discovered and made manifest, but that a faithful remnant, even the upright, lowly ones, the lowly shrubs, should be preserved and brought through the fiery trial with great comfort, when tall and sturdy oaks should be overthrown. And further, that this winnowing season should be attended with, or followed by, a breaking forth of a greater glory and power, than he or others had ever known in that quarter. This remarkable language was judged to be plainly verified in all its parts, as well by the great accession of sufferings, which, within three years of his decease, was permitted to befall the Friends of Aberdeen, as by the opposite effect these sufferings had upon the dedicated and upon the disobedient.

Sometimes, when very sick, he would bless the Lord, that now fighting with a natural death, he had not an angry God to deal with. "Oh!" said he, "the sting of death is fully gone, and death is mine; being reconciled to me, as a sweet passage, through Him that loved me." And again, he signified, that the Lord had given him the garments of praise, instead of the spirit of heaviness. Another time, seeing a candle in the room almost gone out, he said, "My natural life is near at an end, like that candle, for want of nourishment or matter to entertain it; but in this respect we shall differ, that if it be left alone, that goes out with an offensive odor, but I shall go out with a good savor: praises to my God for ever!"

A little before he ceased to breathe, he declared, He had been with his God, and had seen deep things; about which time, he was filled in a wonderful manner with the power of Christ, which much affected those present; and very shortly after, he gently passed away!

One of the earliest minutes recorded by the Monthly Meeting of Friends at Aberdeen, in the book provided for the purpose of entering the affairs of the Society, has the following simple notice of his death: "It pleased the Lord to remove out of the body our dear and precious Friend, Alexander Jaffray, at his own house at Kingswells, the 7th of the 5th month, 1673, at one in the morning; who was buried in his own burial-ground there, upon the 8th day. He was a sincere, upright-hearted man all his time, and one that had been a seeker of the Lord from his youth up, and had much of the life of Jesus, and spirit of holiness attending his heart all along, as his conversation witnessed; and died with blessed and living testimonies to the honor of Truth, before many professors and profane, who came to see him."

Little more than three months elapsed after the death of Alexander Jaffray, when Sarah his wife was called away, to join him and "the spirits of just men made perfect." Her maiden name was Cant, a daughter of Andrew Cant. On one particular occasion, this helpmeet of our Friend was in some danger of adding, by her unbelief or impatience, to his many sources of trial, rather than of mitigating his sorrows. However this may have actually been, the sequel will prove, that her end was a striking comment on her husband's path, and even as a seal to his dying testimony—so remarkably, oftentimes, are the expectations, endeavors, and prayers of the faithful answered; whether they be permitted or not, to see the travail of their soul accomplished, the ends of their faith fully brought about. The above authentic record, which has just been quoted, furnishes us with this short but interesting document respecting her: "The 2nd of 7th month, 1673:—"The same day Mr. Cant, relict of our late dear Friend, Alexander Jaffray, came into our meeting, and owned the way of Truth publicly, as it is professed by Friends; which was a speaking testimony, considering her parentage and education; she being mightily wrought upon to avow Truth publicly, by her worthy husband's remarkable dying, with such demonstration therein." Her death took place as early after this circumstance, as the 24th of the next month.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Display in Dress.—A paragraph in the Christian Women speaks of the prevailing practice of dressing excessively on going to a place of worship as a hindrance to the spread of the gospel. It thinks it strange that "the daughters of Zion" who are commanded to "adorn themselves with modest apparel," should come to such places "with high heads and nodding plumes, keeping step with the giddy votaries of fashion." This Delilah of worldliness has been robbing the church of her strength while she has been sleeping."

We are glad to see a testimony borne to that plainness and simplicity which ought to characterize Christians of all denominations. It is a testimony that belongs to the whole church, and not to a few only.

The Church Establishment of England.—The editor of the National Baptist, in one of the letters describing a trip to England, says:—

"I have once or twice alluded to the strange anomalies involved in the existence of the Anglican church 'as by law established.' Here is another, which is extracted from London Society:

"Mr. Brown had been in the army, and finding his occupation gone after Waterloo, gladly accepted an offer of a fat living down in Cornwall. 'You needn't reside, you know,' his friend the patron said, 'you can get a curate to do the work for eighty pounds a year or so, and you can live about town on the rest.' There was a little difficulty about procuring ordination, but H. R. H. the Duke of York, overcame that. He gave the candidate a note to take to the Bishop of Cork: 'Dear Cork—Ordain Brown—Yours, York.' In a few days Mr. Brown presented himself before the Commander-in-Chief with a note:

"Dear York—Brown's ordained—Yours, Cork."

"The thing was done. Brown went down to Cornwall, read himself in, and returned to London. He lived some fifty years more, and never visited his benefice again!"

"I hardly think that just such a thing could occur now; and yet I saw a Canon of York, whose duties require him to spend one month in each year in Yorkshire; the other eleven are spent in London."

"And I see it stated that Canon Farrar is a Canon of Westminster, and as such receives either $5,000 or £5,000 (I forget which), and also Rector of St. Margaret's, and as such gets an equal sum."

"And while the Bishops and Deans and Canons are faring thus, the curates and the clergymen who have no influential friends, are living otherwise. The Record speaks of a clergyman 'who has often been obliged to go for days without the food absolutely necessary to give him strength for his duties. A piece of dry bread and a cup of tea in the morning on a Sunday, and the same when he returned in the evening, has often been all the food partaken of; children unable actually to leave the house for half a year from want of suitable clothing.'

"The Liberator very naturally asks:

"What must be the feelings of a poor curate when he hears of such a living as that of Wimbush, Essex; the net income of which is £650 a year, while 'no duty whatever' is required from the holder? It has been a sinecure for more than four hundred years, and for the most part has been bought by ladies for family purposes. It is also a donative; i. e., the right to present is absolute, and any clergyman, whatever his character, can be presented, 'in spite of all the bishops in England.' This living was lately put up to auction, and not being sold, the price is reduced from £620 to £5,500. It is an investment simply—we cannot say pure and simple."

"The Rock (Church of England) says:

"The Duke of Portland has presented Rev. Cavendish Browne to the valuable rectory of Bredon in Worcestershire. The benefice is set down at £2,300 per annum, and is one of the few survivals of the old state of things. There are a few others of equal and even greater value, such as the rectories of Halsall and Winwick, in Lancashire, the former of which is set down in the Clergy List at £3,500, and the latter at £3,200. There are altogether ten of these golden livings, the income of which range from £2,000 to £3,000."

"In this connection, the figures given, as the result of a census taken in the City Churches, on May 1st, are full of instruction. The Rector or Vicar of All-hallows, Great Tower Street, was preaching to 40 people at £2,000 a year; of All-hallows, London Wall, to 25 people at £1,700 a year; of St. Dunstan in the East, to 4 people at £550 a year; of St. Katharine, to 13 people at £1,500; &c., &c."

"Really, I wonder how long all this will be endured by that broad-breasted, long-suffering, heaven-deserving beast of burden, the British tax-payer."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Longest Span of Wire.—The longest span of the Kistnah River in the world is stretched across the Kistnah River from hill to hill, each hill being 1,200 feet high, between Besorah and Seetanagram in India. The span is a little over 6,000 feet in length. The only mechanical contrivance used in stretching the cable across the river was a common windlass.—Scientific American.

Climbing Trees for Fish Bait.—In his search for orchids in the forests along the Rio Negro, in Brazil, Ernest Morris was surprised to see native rovers run his canoe ashore and proceed to climb a low tree covered with bromeliads and large tilandsias. "Those are not orchids," he said. "No matter, patron," replied the Indian, "we want iscal (bait)." Wondering at this, Morris watched the boy as, hand over hand, with knife held between his teeth, he passed from limb to limb. Soon a large tilandsia, several feet square, fell to the ground. "Where is your bait?" said he. "Look," said the Indian, who was cutting the leaves close at the base, where the explorers saw between the leaves a mass of worms resembling our common ground worm.

The Moquis.—In the history of the aboriginal races of this country little is said regarding the Moquis, a branch of the Pueblos, living, where possibly they have lived for a thousand years, in a rocky stronghold in a sandy desert of Arizona. This people number about two thousand five hundred, and occupy six villages, with houses built of stone, cemented with sand and clay. These villages, says Dr. Loew, of Wheeler's surveying expedition, are built on the tops of four sandstone mesas, which are separated from each other about eight miles. They occupy the entire width of the mesas, and, standing immediately before the houses, one may look vertically down a depth of three hundred feet. In many places the sides of the mesas are terraced, being used as sheep corrals. In appearance the Moquis come nearest to the Caucasians than the rest of the race. These Indians are well clad, and the female, especially so. Indian corn is the principal food—the sheep are raised for their wool rather than for the table. From the wool a good blanket is made. The seed corn is planted about one and a half feet from the surface, at which depth sufficient moisture is found to develop and sustain the plant. The Moquis have no place of worship, and the Spanish Jesuits were unable to gain a foothold among them.—Scientific American.

Sawed Jelly.—The seaweed, which is used by the Japanese and Chinese to pack porcelain and other articles for exportation, is said, by the Journal of Applied Science, to be made use of in France for the purpose of making a spurious fruit jelly. When placed in a tumbler of water it absorbs the water in a few minutes; then a number of shoots grow, and constitute a jelly nearly as transparent as the water, from which it is made. The jelly is easily sweetened with glucose, and cochineal or other coloring matters added with equal facility to imitate the color of fruit. The perfume and taste were the only real difficulties that remained to be overcome. After considerable study it was discovered that by using a mixture of certain ethers with certain acids, glycerine, &c., a perfect imitation of the odor of raspberries was produced. By putting a little of this essence to the seaweed, which has been allowed to develop itself in water, a substance is obtained which has the consistency of fruit jelly, though no fruit has been used, which is sweet, though no sugar has been employed, and which has the color and fragrance of raspberries though gether destitute of that fruit.—Scientific erican.

binetum.—Markham in his work on the ixtation of Cinchona in the East Indies as the following information concerning netum, which is the name given to the cure of all the alkaloids extracted from India red bark:

"the manufacturing operations in the Sikkim ory were commenced in 1875. The method mended itself for its economy. No fuel is ted, except what may be required to dry alkaloid obtained; no expensive machinery volved, the only plant needed is some en tubes and calico filters; the ingredients acid and caustic soda, and no skilled labor ecessary.

to the end of 1876 the yield of dry bark C. succirubra had been 321,236 lbs. The d for 1876 alone was 211,931. For 1875 as 344,225 lbs. The crop is taken partly copping and partly by uprooting. The nations are now capable of yielding 366, lbs. of dry bark annually, containing an lbs. of 4 per cent. of total alkaloids. The of growing each pound of bark, including rest on capital, is 5d.

he cost of production of quinetum is $1.40 lb. It is calculated that about 10,000 lbs. be annually issued.

he Sikkim quinetum has been submitted careful trial by the physicians attached he Calcutta hospitals, and has also been d in the Burdwan fever with great suc. The conclusion of the surgeon-general he Indian medical department on 5th mo., 1877, was that in the quinetum "we sss a remedy perfectly suitable in the timent of an enormously large percentage ordinary intermittent fevers met within autumnal season throughout the presicy."

o remarkable surgical operations are ported from Europe. One of them has efore been attempted, and was eved to the Royal Society in London by McEwen. The patient, a child of three s, was afflicted with a sort of gangrene leath of the long bone between the elbow shoulder. When the disease had run its e two-thirds of the shaft was wanting. e nature had made no attempt to supply eficiency. The object aimed at was ing less than the transplantation of bone. ector will readily undertake to transplant, "graft" skin to heal large wounds, and in e case a whole scalp had been supplied. I so, too, not a few surgeons pour blood n vein to vein between man and man. But ransplant bone—a tooth or two being eed—has been deemed impossible. In this e transplantations of bone were made on e occasions, the pieces being taken from e patients who were subjected to opera ons designed to straighten their legs. These egnents of shinbones were divided into y small pieces and inserted into furrows he child's arms. They speedily united h each other, and, with the natural sockets, mately forming a solid rod only half an shorter than the humerus on the other, and "transforming a useless arm into a oughly useful one."

od's time to reward men is in the here, but his time to save them is now. vation from sin must be now or never. thing can for a moment compare in importance with the matter of personal salation. An eternity of bliss or we crowded into the decision of an hour! "Seek first the kingdom of God." Seek now.—Evangelical Messenger.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 27, 1881.

As we pass through the streets and roads of our cities and country on the morning of the First-day of the week, it is a pleasant sight to see the people going to their different places of worship, to manifest their allegiance to Him, whom all are bound to love and obey. It is cheering also to notice the children, with their bright faces and clean clothing, gathering to the First-day schools connected with the various congregations. These things awaken in the mind a desire that the Lord's blessing may rest on both parents and children; that they may all grow in grace and in the saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour.

It is a pleasant sight, because it manifests a degree of deference to religion in the community; though some of those who thus assemble may have little experience of the regenerating work of Divine Grace, or little sense of its necessity to secure their salvation; or may be even of the number who rebel against the convictions with which they are favored.

But though they may take pleasure in this evidence of the recognition of dependence on a Father in Heaven, those who have been taught the spiritual nature of true religion must be faithful in bearing to the world a testimony to the character of that worship which is in Spirit and in truth, and which every man must perform for himself with Divine assistance. Such cannot depend on any human priest or minister to worship for them, or to be their teacher. They will thankfully accept instrumental help, but even in the use of these they will look principally, and in the first place, to the Spirit of Christ—the Anointing, which teacheth as never man taught, the true Light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, the Word nigh in the heart and in the mouth.

We believe a weak point in the system of most of the Christian professors is to be found in their depending too much on merely human teaching, and placing too little reliance on the immediate teaching of the Divine Word which saveth the soul, of the Grace of God which bringeth salvation, and which, as the apostle declares, teacheth. Hence there is not enough of waiting on the Lord for instruction and comfort, in the silence of all flesh. At times of worship the mind is occupied and filled with a constant round of singing, reading, praying and preaching; and though the Lord often does regard the sincerity of heart of those who are assembled, as they are drawn by his own Spirit to look up to Him, yet often the communion which they might have enjoyed is interrupted or hindered by outward performances.

The First-day schools as generally conducted, are a part of the general system of worship adopted in most of the denominations of Christians. The teachers in them, like the teachers of the grown up part of the congregation, prepare for the exercises by a similar study of the lesson and a meditation on the subjects contained therein. The instruction given in both cases is often largely the fruit of their own intellect, or of the researches of former students. The tendency of the whole system, both in the pulpit and in the school-room, is to lead the ministers and the hearers, the teachers and the scholars, away from a simple dependence on the Spirit of God for the unfolding of Divine mysteries. Paul was concerned that the faith of his hearers should not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God. A thorough First-day school disciple is in great danger of forgetting, that the most full and thorough knowledge of theological systems may co-exist with spiritual blindness—that the wisdom of this world (to which all merely outward knowledge, even in religious truths, belongs), is foolishness with God; and that we can only obtain a living knowledge of Divine things through the power of Divine Grace, giving us an experimental acquaintance with the work of religion, and opening to our understandings the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God, as we are prepared to receive them, and as the Lord sees meet to favor us therewith.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President Garfield continues in a very critical state. During the past week he has been able to take some liquid nourishment by the mouth, but considerable reliance has been placed on that by enemata, which has been, it is said, assimilated satisfactorily. The case has been complicated by an inflammation of one of the parotid glands, which it is feared will suppurate, and the additional loss of strength by the drain to the system.

Richmond, Virginia, is now suffering from the worst water famine it has ever known. The supply for domestic consumption is not only cut off by the lowness of the James River, but nearly all the industries relying on water power are suspended. Families are supplied by a few old wells and springs, the water from which has been heretofore pronounced unfit for use.

Heavy rains for some days past in Colorado have done much damage, especially to the railroads, which have suffered from washouts. A terrible waterpout, near Canon City, on Seventh-day, swept off "whole sections of railway ties" into the Arkansas River, and it is believed the road to Silver Cliff will not be open for a week. A passenger train which left Canon City on Seventh-day night is stopped twelve miles from that place. Cattle and horses were swept away by the water-spout.

The Board of Agriculture of Ohio makes the following estimate of the grain crops in that State, as compared with those of 1880: Wheat 72 per cent., or 38,000,000 bushels, against 52,500,000 bushels; corn 70 per cent., or 1,000,000 bushels, against 165,000,000 bushels; oats 107 per cent., or 22,500,000 bushels, against 21,000,000 bushels.

Of 56,607 immigrants who arrived in the United States during Seventh month, 20,374 were from Germany.

Our exports of domestic breadstuffs during the seven months ending Seventh mo. 31st, 1881, were valued at $131,962,709, against $153,556,362 during the corresponding period of 1880.

Rich and extensive silver fields have been discovered within reservation limits in the Indian Territory, near Fort Sill. White men are illegally attempting to locate mineral claims on those fields, and troops are asked to protect the Indians from the intruders.

The Raleigh Journal now figures out a majority in North Carolina for anti-prohibition of 115,556. Four counties voted for prohibition.

The revenue-cut Bill has been ordered from San Francisco on a police cruise in the Arctic regions. She will ply between the Seal and Aleutian Islands, and obtain any information possible relative to the missing whalers.

The announcement is made that the heaviest mortgage ever recorded at Albany, New York, was filed there on Saturday. It is for $50,000,000, and is given by the New York, West Shore and Buffalo Railroad Company to the United States Trust Company of New York as trustee. The indenture sets forth that the railroad company is formed by the consolidation of the New York, West Shore and Buffalo Railroad Company, the North River Railroad Company, and the Jersey City and Albany Railway Company. The purpose is to construct a railroad from Weehawken, N. J., opposite the City of New York, along the west shore of the Hudson River to West Point, Newburg, Kingston, Cornwall, Athens and Schoenck to or near Schenectady, and thence along or near the south shore of the Mohawk River to Utica, Syracuse and Buffalo, with branches to the cities of Albany and Rochester. The rate of interest is 5 per cent.

The mortality in this city last week was 204; with the former ten days, 53 died of cholera; infantum; 46 of consumption; 44 of anasarca; 26 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, and 20 of typhoid fever.

Markets.—U. S. 3 1/2's, 102 1/2; 4 1/2's, registered, 113; coupon, 114; 4's, 116; currency 6's, 132. Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of oranges and apples at 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white at 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There is a good demand for flour, and prices are firm. Sales of 2300 barrels, including Minnesota at $5.50, 55 a $6.50 for clover, and at $6.00 for new straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $6.35 a $6.75; western do. at, at $6.50 a $7.25, and patents at $7.85. Rye flour is firm at 55 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is feverish, unsettled and 2 1/2 a 4 cts. lower. Sales of 6500 bushels red at $1.35 a $1.40, according to quality and location; of the open board, 300,000 bushels No. 2 red sold at $1.39 1/2 a $1.40. Rye is nominal. Corn is excited, irregular and lower. Sales of 12,000 bushels, including yellow, at 75 cts.; mixed at 74 cts.; steamer at 73 a 74 cts.; No. 3 at 72 cts. and, and rejected at 68 a 72 cts. Oats are less active, and the options are lower. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including yellow, at 47 a 50 cts., and rejected and mixed at 47 a 48 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 8th mo. 20th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 303; loads of straw, 50. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.05 to $1.10; per 100 lbs. of clover, at $1.05; per 100 lbs. of timothy, at $1.05; per 100 lbs. of straw, 55 to 95 cents per 100 lbs.

Cattle were dull, and prices were a fraction lower; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 33 a 65 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in fair demand, and prices were firmer: 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 6 cts., per pound, and lambs at 5 a 7 1/2 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were in demand at full prices: 3600 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 1/2 a 9 1/2 cts. per pound, as to condition.

FOREIGN.—The Irish Land bill, as amended by the House of Lords, and subsequently passed by the Commons, was returned to Parliament with the royal assent, on the 22d instant.

The depreciation in the value of land is having a bad effect upon the fortunes of some of the English clergy.

Herbert Gladstone, in his speech at the meeting of the electors at Leeds, said: "One of the most satisfactory results of the English outlook is the increasing friendship between England and America. The English is more satisfactory than the outburst of British sympathy with President Garfield it was the manner in which that outburst was received in America."

Paris, 8th mo. 19th.—An official note, published here yesterday, after stating that France had no objection but to break off the negotiations with England for a new commercial treaty, concludes as follows: "We hope, nevertheless, that the disagreement is only temporary, and, as there is ample time to treat before the expiration of the old treaty in November, that a solution will be found of a nature to satisfy the interests of the two great countries who have equal need of each other."

Constans, Minister of the Interior, classifies the result of the elections in France, so far received, as follows: Republican Left and Republican Union, 340; Royalists and Clericals, 40; Bonapartists, 38; Extreme Left, 36; and Independents, 3. Five of the second ballot will be necessary. The newspapers predict that the extremists of both the Right and Left have been defeated, and that the new Chamber will essentially be Progressist.

The London Daily News has the following from Madrid: "The elections have resulted in a great success for the Liberals, whose candidates are returned in two-thirds of the polls already known."

A correspondent writes to the Times from Zermatt, in the canton of Valais, Switzerland, as follows: "Five American tourists ascended the Matterhorn on Saturday, 15th inst. In the afternoon, the party was lodged, and it struck the head of Gilbert, tourist of the Indiana University, at Bloomington, Ind., rendering him partly insensible. He was just able to move mechanically alone. Nearly four hours were spent in bringing him to the first hut, which was reached at about five o'clock in the afternoon. Some of the party proceeded and brought doctors. Gilbert arrived at Zermatt at five o'clock Sunday evening. He suffers principally from the loss of blood, and will be able to leave soon. The guides were apprehensive that, if he collapsed before he arrived at the hut, the party would be obliged to descend, and the mountain would be abandoned."

The treaty between Russia and China, which is ratified, surrenders the Kuldja territory to China, as far as the River Khorgos, Russia retaining a strip of land as a settlement. For any persons becoming naturalized Russians within a year, amnesty is granted. China will be obliged to indemnify Russia for the loss of the Kuldja in London in six instalments—one every four months. The Kuldja frontier is to be defined in six months, and the Zhoian frontier later. Russian caravans have the right to trade as far as the Great Wall, but only to towns where there are Russian Consuls. Russia has about forty deaths of cholera in the country, nearly all the principal towns in China are trade routes.

The wheat in New Brunswick is reported to be damaged by rust and the potatoes by bugs. The land telegraph line on Anticosti Island, 200 miles long, is now finished and in operation. Forty deaths of cholera from yellow fever were reported in Havana last week.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Charles Stokes, Agent, N. J., for Caleb P. Haines, George Lippincott, Thomas Wilkins, Benjamin W. Haines, Fredrick Fried, Levi Troth, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from James S. Price, City, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from James F. Reid, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Sharpless, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Daniel Smith, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jane B. Smith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Hinshaw, Jr., per John T. Moorman, $2.10, vol. 55; from John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from Palmer Good, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Stephen M. Brinton, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from R. S. Troth, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel W. Stanley, Io., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Eli Hodgkin, John E. Hodgkin, Asenath Edgerton, Rebecca Asenath, Thomas D. Yocum, McCarty, McCarty, and Thomas E. Clayton, each $2.10; from Joshua Brantingham, Agent, O., for Edward Y. Cope, Christian Kirk, Clayton Lamborn, Hannah Gilbert, John Hoyle, Cyrus Brantingham, Josiah Cameron, Benjamin Kite and Uriah Price, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Charles W. Satterthwaite, $2.10, to No. 19, vol. 56; from Samuel P. Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Burtram Kaighn, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Lydia T. King, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Thomas Evans, Md., and Joseph E. Mickle, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from William Cope, Pa., per Benjamin W. Passmore, $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Bower, $2.10, vol. 55; from John E. Smith, Jr., $2.10, City, $2.10, vol. 55, and for Amy Middleton and Albert Haines, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from William J. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John W. Hilyard, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry Briggs, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elizabeth D. Meredith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elizabeth Meredith, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from James Scarle, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary P. Gibbons, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Reuben Battin, Agent, Pa., $2.10, to No. 10, vol. 56, and for Martha McCarty, $2.10, to No. 12, vol. 56, and for Joseph McCarty, Job McCarty, and McCarty, Charles F. Hess, George Schill and John H. Brown, $2.10 each, vol. 56; from William B. Cooper and Lydia Cooper, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph Barton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Levi B. Stokes and Sarah P. Johnson, Gtn., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John Carey, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Jordan Willard, Joseph Stanton, Elijah Haworth, and Cornelius Darnell, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Zachens Test, Io., $2.10, vol. 55, and for George E. Young and William P. Young, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph K. Lippincott and Charles Bell, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Benjamin R. Rye, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from R. P. Lovett and Two R. L. Jewett, Jr., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Morris Cope, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for John Wood, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry S. Moore, Canada, per Joseph Waring, $2.10, vol. 55; from Ovee Rosdall, Io., $2.10, vol. 55; from David Darnell, N. J., $2.10,

vol. 55; from Samuel Allen, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Albert Maxwell, Ind., $2.10, vol. 55; from John Tatum City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Woolston Comfort, Mich., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Elwood Comfort, $2.10, vol. 55; from C. I. Hayes, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jacob Baer, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Erin Leese, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elisha Roberts, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, as for David Roberts, Jr., and Joseph H. Roberts, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Eli Scott, Io., $2.10, vol. 55; from Zimri Horner, Io., $2.10, vol. 55; from Job Bage, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Barclay R. Leeds, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Edwin Leese, Thomas C. Hess, H. Leeds, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph Elkington, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel F. Balderston, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Perry, R. I., John W. Foster, George Foster, Lydia F. Nichol, George C. Foster, Mary Ann Shore, and Ann Perry, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Robert Mowles, Agent, N. Y., No. 11, vol. 56; from Martha T. Cox, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from Seneca E. Malone, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from William B. Oliver, Agent, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55, as for Mercy H. Meader, $2.10, vol. 55; from Sarah I. Evans, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Gull Ann Hoyle, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Robert Mowles, Agent, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Chester A. Weaver, James I. Boss, Benjamin Knowles, Clark Carpenter, Dorca Collins, David Peckham, and Lorenzo Rockwell, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Sarah A. Wood, 70 cents to No. 8, vol. 55; from George Sharpless, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Walton, Ch., $2.10, vol. 55, and for John S. Peterson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from John R. Tatum, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Josiah T. Ballinger, Agent, Pa., for Thomas R. Warner, Ann A. Warner, Benjamin F. Warner, Anna Fim, John Smith, Esther H. Mendelstam, Thomas C. Hess, John Cope, Enos Smedley, Joseph P. Eldridge, Charles W. Roberts, and James C. Roberts, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Rachel McClain, $2.10, to No. 13, vol. 56; from J. Letchworth, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas I. Harvey, Agent, Pa., for Rebecca S. Conard, Seneca E. Malone, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from George L. Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Josiah Holmes, Jr., Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Edwin Thomas, Pa., $2.10, to No. 14, vol. 56; from John K. Kite, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for David Elyson, Joel Kirk, Edwin Holloway, Rebecca S. Conard, John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph Lynch, Eliza Ann Fogg, Robert Elyson, James A. Cope, Abner Woolman, Sarah Woolman, John H. Stanley, and Anna W. Cobb, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Lydia Warrington, $2.10, to No. 18, vol. 56; from William P. Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from John T. Moorman, Jr., $2.10, vol. 55; from Rachel F. Parke, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Dr. Isaac Huestis, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Harmon Rhodes, Joseph Doudna, Thomas E. Vanlaw, Abel W. Byre, Hannah Ann Vanlaw, Burwell Peebles, Eliza Branson, David Smith Ann Smith, Joseph H. Henry, Charles W. Roberts, Amy Clarkson Burgess, Fleming Green, Jane H. Sears, and Belinda H. Schofield, $2.10 each, vol. 55.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning, will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

TOUGHKENAMON BOARDING SCHOOL

Will re-open Ninth mo. 19th, 1881.

H. M. Cope, Principal.
Toughkenamon, Chester Co., Pa.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY

Will re-open Ninth month 5th, 1881.

The Course of Study comprehends a full and thorough training in the usual Primary and High School of this State, and also in Latin, French, German, and into the Higher Mathematics, Sciences, Greek, Latin and Modern languages—preparatory to entering colleges—ample opportunities are afforded.

Instructors: Principal—EDWARD FORSTHET.

RUTH ANNA FORSTHET. MARY JENKINS.

Boarding can be obtained in the town at reasonable rates.

DIED, suddenly, at his residence in DAMASCUS, Ohio on the 28th of 11th mo. 1880, JOSEPH PAINTER, a esteemed member of Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting, 67 years of age, in the 34th year of his age. He was a week and quiet in spirit, and had been in good health assurance that his end was peace.

WILLIAM H. FILE, PRINTER,

No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 3, 1881.

NO. 4.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

Selected.

Testimonies to the Truth.

You have often heard by the servants of the Lord, that have given testimony to Jesus, the only and alone Saviour; you have often read the report, and the report is true: That there is no name under heaven by which any can be saved, but the name of Jesus; and I have oftentimes read also in the Holy Scripture, of this Jesus the only and alone Saviour; all the holy prophets gave testimony that He should come, and when He was come, the holy apostles and ministers of our Lord Jesus Christ gave testimony that He was come, and they were made ministers of the New Testament, and their greatness was, as instruments in the hand of the great God, to turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to the power of God, that they might receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified. You know the Scripture speaks plentifully after this manner. I hope there are none here but have believed the testimonies that have been given; that the great thing is, for every one to come to a consideration of this, since you have believed the report, that which is every one's concern now, is to examine themselves, whether or no, they are really turned from darkness to the heavenly Light; none come to be turned from darkness to light, but as they come to know repentance from dead works, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. And as every one comes to know this, they come to know what it is to lay a good foundation. This was the foundation the primitive Christians laid, as you may remember the exhortation of the apostle, in the sixth chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews; Therefore using the principles of the doctrine of Christ, ye go on unto perfection, not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God.

Thus you see he presseth them to go on to perfection; it is the business of every one of you that believe in the name of Jesus, that you keep walking on in the holy way; it is the main business of us that are come to know the holy way, through the riches of the love and grace of the great God to us, to walk in the holy way; they that know anything of the Christianity, know this to be their great concern to walk in this holy way that leads to everlasting life; Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life; and all that come into this way, and walk in it, are going on towards perfection; and they are putting off the old man; they feel in themselves a power at work that crucifies the old man with his deeds; then they go on in the name of the Lord. This power doth work, till every one in his own particular comes to be crucified with Christ; it was the primitive Christians' experience. What saith the apostle of himself? Gal. ii. 20. "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

Great is the mystery of godliness; you that are engaged in the Christian warfare, and that live the Christian life, and are making war in righteousness against the devil, the enemy of your souls, know that great is this mystery of godliness. This mystery is opened among the disciples of Jesus, among the holy offspring of God, who are begotten again through the Word of eternal life; who, as the holy apostle saith, are begotten of his own will through the word of truth, that they should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures. How ought we to whom God hath graciously manifested himself, in the blessed Son of his love, our Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus, to walk as becomes the gospel? O! that the serious and weighty consideration of this might rest upon every one of us; that we ought to have our conversation as becomes the gospel of Christ, and be going on to perfection. You know that the apostle speaks, Phil. iii. 12. "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect, but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Jesus Christ." This, I am sure, every true Christian man and woman will do, as the same apostle did, who saith, "I press towards the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." And as every one comes to grow up in the life of righteousness, they will come to know an increase of faith, they will grow up in faith, and in that hope which hath been as an anchor to their souls in the day of their deep exercise; and they will remain steadfast and unmovable, as they walk in the holy way. And so every one, as they keep humble and bowed before the God of Heaven, will know his teachings more and more, and have a sensible feeling of it in themselves, every one in their own particular.

And, certainly, it is all our business to be waiting for the fulfilling of those many great and precious promises, which are recorded in the Holy Scripture, which were enjoyed by the primitive Christians, in the ages that are past and gone; and in succeeding times, shall be likewise enjoyed by all true Christian people, as they come to be followers of Jesus. As we have begun well, let us go on towards perfection, not laying again, as I said before, the foundation of repentance from dead works, and faith towards God and the Lord Jesus Christ; for whoever expects salvation by Christ the only Saviour, must be going on to perfection; they must begin at the work of regeneration, and experience in themselves a new birth, for if we be not born again, we shall die in our sins; you know that our Saviour hath left this upon record, and it remains the same truth to this day.

And therefore, how ought all that make mention of the name of the great God, and of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to be weighty and considerate, and examine whether they are come to know repentance from dead works; whether they have turned from the evil of their doings? Some are ready to say, I would gladly turn from the evil of my doings, but I find I am beset by the devil, the enemy of my soul. Well, if thou believest in the light, wherewith Christ Jesus hath enlightened thee, then cry to Him, and He will give thee power to withstand the enemy of thy soul.

Praised and blessed be the name of our God, that a remnant can say: As soon as we did really believe in the name of Jesus, we received power in some measure, as the primitive believers did that received Christ, we received power to become the sons of God. Let the eye of those that have received this power be to the Lord, and cry to him for divine assistance; for of ourselves we are not sufficient, we have not power of ourselves to think a good thought, or do a good action, but we depend upon the power of God, to enable us to work out our own salvation; for it is God that worketh in us, both to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

Therefore, repentance and remission of sins are preached in Christ's name; and without the knowledge and Christian experience of this, and believing in the name of Jesus, we cannot be saved from the wrath to come. Let us wait upon God, who by our Lord Jesus Christ, saveth all his people from their sins. "Not by works of righteousness that we have done, but," as the apostle saith, "according to his mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which He shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." When those that have experience of the work of regeneration, and of being renewed in their inward parts, where Christ bears rule, meet together in the solemn assemblies of the Lord's people, He will be in the midst of them; and they that come to hear the Word of the Lord, and wait upon Him, know it to be so; you that are real Christian people, know this by your own experience. Therefore wait upon the Lord your God, that the work of regeneration may go on, and you will find strength more and more ministered to you, and you will feel the pouring forth of the Spirit abundantly upon you; the same Spirit that raised up our Lord Jesus from the dead, and quickened him, shall quicken you, that you may live to Him here, and with Him forever hereafter.—Francis Campfield, 5th mo. 14th, 1693.

For "The Friend."

Ascent of Chimborazo and Cotopaxi.

(Concluded from page 21.)

"In passing from Chimborazo to Cotopaxi we go from an extinct volcano to an active one, and to one of the most terrible volcanoes in the world. It is situated, roughly, northeast from Chimborazo at a distance of 65 miles. From Quito it bears southeast about 33 miles. Three years ago, ashes from it fell in Quito to such an extent that it was pitch dark at mid-day, and persons in the streets in front of their houses could not tell where they were. On this occasion, too, there was a great manifestation of flames, which rose to an enormous height; the lava rapidly liquefied and poured down in vast torrents. All round the mountain the natives have stories of the tremendous ravages which occasionally occur. The general opinion seems to be that the periods of greatest activity are always preceded by periods of repose.

"During my stay in the neighborhood I several times remarked that during the night much less smoke or vapor came away from the crater than during the day, and this led me to conclude, that if we could pass a night on the summit, we should be able to see the bottom of the crater, a sight no one had hitherto enjoyed.

"All our arrangements were carefully matured, and we started for Pichincha, passing at first through a small hamlet, and up a ridge of the mountain which descends towards the west, and encamped at a height of about 15,000 feet.

"On the 16th we sent up the first installment of our stores to the final cone. The weather was very bad, with a varying temperature, and I did not go up till the 18th. The view from our camp extended over a large expanse of country, cut up by cracks and fissures, in every direction covered with cinders and blocks of lava.

"On the morning of the 18th we started before day-break, and at half past six arrived at the edge of the crater. We advanced, and from a few feet of the edge we had to peer into the unknown. A vast quantity of smoke and vapor was boiling up, and we only saw at intervals a portion of the opposite side, the bottom being invisible. We then returned to make a place for the tent, with the assistance of the natives. When this was done, we sent them back to the first camp, and the Carrels and I remained alone. The camp was necessarily established on the outside of the final cone, which at this time was entirely composed of ash. This was very warm to the touch, and so loose as to render it a matter of much trouble to fix the tent ropes, and a high wind springing up, we carried out four additional ropes, and attached them to the largest stones we could find, and bury in the ashes. We then rigged up a rope as a sort of handrail, from the tent to the edge of the crater, from which it was distant about 250 feet. We had scarcely completed the operation, when a violent storm arose which threatened to carry our whole establishment away. The poles of the tent quivered, the ropes dragged; but it passed away as suddenly as it arose. While this was going on we had another cause for alarm. A great smell of India-rubber commenced to arise, and putting my hand to the floor of the tent, I found it was on the point of melting. Outside, the air was intensely cold.

"At intervals of about half an hour, the crater regularly blew off steam, which rose in a jet of great violence from the bottom, and boiled over the edge, continually enveloping us. The noise made on these occasions resembled that which we hear when a large steamer is blowing off steam. When night had fairly set in we went up to view the interior, and saw the whole of its vast proportion for the first time. By measurements made on the following morning, I find that the rim has a diameter from north to south of 200 feet, and from east to west of about 1500. The rim is irregular, some points being considerably higher than others. The rock is trap; in the interior the walls descend to the bottom in a series of steps, and a precipitous slope of about 1000 feet. At the bottom there was a nearly circular spot of glowing fire 24 feet in diameter. Flames were flickering and traveling about in all directions, so that what was underneath them appeared more like incandescent than molten matter. The heat at the bottom of the crater was evidently intense, and far up its sides, in every direction, glowing fissures, from which flickering flames were also coming, showed that the lava was red hot below the surface, while columns of steam or smoke heightened the effect. It is impossible to conceive a more dramatic spectacle than this vast theatre presented, illuminated below by the subterranean fires and above by a brilliant moon; while every now and then the outbursts of steam occurred, rushing upward with the force of a hurricane, and scattering all around fragments of fused rock.

"We found in the morning the tent was black with ash which had been ejected. The fragments were found on microscopical examination to be particles of fused rock, and they are, I think, torn off by the violence of the steam-blasts. I attribute these outbursts to the infiltration of the snow and hail which falls on the final cone. It is almost immediately liquefied, and descends into the bowels of the mountain.

"The height of Cotopaxi is 19,600 feet. Our camp was placed about 130 feet below the loftiest point. We remained there twenty-six consecutive hours, feeling slightly at first the effects of the low pressure."

About five months after this, E. Whymper again ascended Chimborazo, partly to verify the observations which he had before made. In the early morning he looked at Cotopaxi in the far distance, and remarked how tranquil it looked—not a sign of smoke was rising from the great volcano. He says: "We went on foot, and before daylight commenced to ascend the ridge which leads continuously towards the second summit. I was in the rear stopping to heat my numbed hands, and looking toward Cotopaxi, when all at once I saw a column of smoke commence to rise from the crater. It went up straight into the air, spirally curling with such velocity that within a minute it had risen 20,000 feet above the crater. It was caught by an easterly wind and borne twenty miles towards the east, at right angles towards its former course; it then turned, and a northerly wind carried it toward our position. As the cloud came nearer and nearer to us it appeared to rise higher and higher in the sky, and about twelve at noon it got overhead and shut out the sun. But before this happened, we witnessed the most extraordinary and startling effects in the atmosphere between us and the volcano—thick cloud sometimes like shining brass, then turned to tarnished copper, or the most extraordinary green, producing a feeling of intense astonishment. In the curled openings in the clouds that arose after the commencement of the eruption, I still saw a majestic column of ash pouring out and rising to immense height in the air, blacker than the deepest ink. As we were engaged in the ascent of Chimborazo, and had many other things to occupy our attention, we did not appreciate at first the magnitude of the eruption, but when we got on the summit and found the ash beginning to fall to such an extent that the snow looked like a ploughed field, we perceived something out of the common was happening.

"When we returned to our tent we found it laden with the ash from Cotopaxi. It was still falling, and covered the country all round as with a dense fog. I subsequently found that in the town of Ambato, twenty miles nearer the mountain, between 11 o'clock and 11.15, upon a piece of paper spread to receive it, one foot square, four ounces were collected. I made a calculation that at least 2,000,000 tons of this ash must have been ejected." A microscopical examination showed that the ash which fell on the tent at Cotopaxi was a fine that 4,000 particles scarcely weighed a grain. That which fell on Chimborazo was much finer, and it was estimated that it would require 25,000 particles of it to weigh a grain. They consisted principally of glassy foldsp and of long crystalline scoriaceous dust. The lecturer said, "If you can picture to yourself the force which is required to eject 2,000,000 tons of this ash (so light that 25,000 particles scarcely weigh a grain) to a height of four miles in the air upward from the crater, and to send it up vertically unaffected by the east wind, you may be able to form some idea what a terrible creature Cotopaxi is in his more furious moments."

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

Robert Barclay, the great "Apologist" for the doctrines of Friends, spent the last two years of his life in much retirement, chiefly at home, enjoying the esteem and regard of his neighbors, the comforts of domestic society and doubtless partaking also in good measure of a soul-sustaining evidence of Divine approbation. In the year 1690, he was seized with a violent fever, which continued upon him about eight or nine days, when it pleased the Lord to take him out of this world, to a kingdom and glory that is eternal.

James Dickinson was with him at the time of his illness. It was a solemn season; and he sat by him, the Lord's power and presence bowed their hearts together, and Robert Barclay was sweetly melted in a sense of God's love. Though much oppressed by the disorder, an entirely resigned, peaceful, and Christian frame of mind shone through all. With tears, he expressed the love he bore "towards all faithful brethren in England who kept their integrity to the Truth," and added, "Remember my love to Friends in Cumberland, at Swarthmore, and to den George (meaning George Fox,) and to all the faithful everywhere." concluding with these comfortable words—"God is good still: and though I am under a great weight of sickness and weakness as to my body, yet my exercises may be permitted to come upon them; they shall tend to God's glory and my consolation: and in that I rest."—He died on the 3rd of the 8th month, 1690, in the 42nd year of his age.

The following faithful delineation of the character of "this worthy young man of God," William Penn styles him, may be fresh to thy readers; but is worthy the repeated attentive perusal of those, who claim connection with the Society of Friends, especially among the younger classes. "This account given," writes William Penn, "for their mutual encouragement, who have or hereafter may receive the eternal Truth, as well for a testimony to the power and goodness of God in raising him up to his Church." It is pared from documents, put forth by the contemporaries of Robert Barclay who knew him well, and appears in the pages of A Short account of his Life and Writings.

He was distinguished by strong mental powers, particularly by great penetration, sound and accurate judgment. His talents were much improved by a regular and classical education. It does not, however, appear, that his superior qualifications produced that notion of mind, which is too often their attendant: he was meek, humble, and ready to allow others the merit they possessed. All his passions were under the most excellent government. Two of his intimate friends in their character of him, declare, that they never knew him to be angry. He had the happiness of early perceiving the infinitude and superiority of religion, to every other attainment; and Divine grace enabled him to dedicate his life, and all that he possessed, to promote the cause of piety and virtue. For the welfare of his friends, he was sincerely and warmly concerned; and he travelled and wrote much, as well as suffered cheerfully, in support of the Society and its principles, to which he had conscientiously attached himself. But this was not a blind and bigoted attachment. His zeal was tempered with charity; and he loved and respected goodness, wherever he found it. His uncorrupted integrity and liberality of sentiment, his great abilities, and the suavity of his disposition, gave him much interest with persons of rank and influence; and he employed it in a manner that marked the benevolence of his heart. He loved peace; and was often instrumental in settling disputes, and in producing reconciliation between contending parties.

In the support and pursuit of what he believed to be right, he possessed great firmness of mind; which was early evinced in the pure and dutiful sentiment he expressed to his uncle, who tempted him with great offers to remain in France, against the desire of his father: "He is my father," said he, "and must be obeyed." All the virtues harmonized, and are connected with one another: this firm and resolute spirit in the prosecution of duty, was united with great sympathy and compassion towards persons in affliction and distress. They were consoled by his tenderness, assisted by his advice, and as occasion required, were relieved by his bounty. His spiritual discernment and religious experience, directed by that Divine influence which he valued above all things, eminently qualified him to instruct the ignorant, to reprove the irreligious, to strengthen the feeble-minded, and to animate the advanced Christian to still greater degrees of virtue and holiness.

In private life, he was equally amiable. His conversation was cheerful, guarded, and instructive. He was a dutiful son, an affectionate and faithful husband, a tender and careful father, a kind and considerate master. Without exaggeration, it may be said, that piety and virtue were recommended by his example; and that, though the period of his life was short, he had, by the aid of Divine grace, most wisely and happily improved it. He lived long enough to manifest, in an eminent degree, the temper and conduct of a Christian, and the virtues and qualifications of a true minister of the gospel.

For "The Friend."

Heavenly-mindedness the Remedy for a Low State of the Church.

The apostle Paul, after very distinctly pointing out the effect of that change of heart wrought in the true believer, says, "Be ye therefore followers of God as dear children." And again he gives as a reason for such a course of conduct as he recommends, "That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine (or shine ye) as lights in the world." What attentive reader of the Holy Scriptures can fail to see that the requirements of the gospel, while they go away with no tittle of the law, yet go far deeper and touch even to the hidden recesses of the heart. And what Christian does not rejoice with thanksgiving in that a way has been opened whereby he may be saved, not only from the guilt of sins that are passed, but from the power of those sins which do so easily beset him; that through a full surrender of the heart unto the baptizing influence of the cross of Christ, he may know a being crucified unto the world, and made partaker of the precious privilege of following his blessed Lord even as a little child followeth the parent whom he dearly loves; and though this walk may at times seem to be as in a desert land—trials, conflicts and provings, may be his portion till the shield of faith seems almost ready to drop from his grasp; yet through all the everlasting arms will be underneath; for He who knoweth our frame and remembereth that we are dust, will not permit any of his trusting little ones to be tried or tempted above that they are able, but will bring them forth from the furnace strengthened and purified so that they may indeed be enabled to glorify Him amongst men. It was this purity of heart, this close walk with God, that made the apostles what they were; they counted nothing too near or too dear to part with that they might win Christ, and be found in him; so that with great diversity of gifts there was still the same spirit, and the power of the Lord wrought mightily through them to the saving of souls, and the building up of the church in the most holy faith.

It was so again after the lapse of many generations in which the church had so grievously left her first love, that in many places the power of godliness was but little known. Our early Friends were raised up to proclaim the everlasting gospel in all its fulness, and to display the banner of purity and holiness which must ever mark the disciples of a crucified and risen Lord; and their preaching being in the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, they too were made instrumental in gathering many souls to Christ. The principles which they promulgated were those inculcated by our blessed Lord, and laid down in the Scriptures of Truth. True it is then we need nothing new, in that direction, to enable us to arise and shine as in days that are passed; yet the hearts of many are, we doubt not, bowed in sadness as we view our broken ranks, and as we realize, as we cannot fail to do, the lack of that spiritual life which was the crown and diadem of the early church. Is it not time, therefore, for every one that feareth the Lord and longeth for the salvation of their immortal souls, whether older or younger, to pause and consider; yea, reverently to wait as at wisdom's gate, that he may be taught and know for himself how this blameless and harmless walk may be maintained, whereby he may be enabled to shine as a light among the people. For as the church is made up of individuals, so it is through the faithfulness of every living Christian that she may again hope to shine, and that spirituality of the Christian religion be restored to us as in the beginning. Our blessed Saviour says, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." How is it with us in this respect to-day? If we are honest with ourselves will we not have to acknowledge that even with many who ought to be as burning and shining lights, from the high positions they occupy in the church militant, there is great danger of the cares of this world and the inordinate pursuit of business, occupying too much of that precious time which should be devoted to the glory of God and the furtherance of the glorious gospel of life and salvation? Do not their lives and conversation bear too striking evidence, that their hearts are still in the world; that they are not following God as dear children? May we not also fear, that notwithstanding our gracious Lord hath promised that He will give unto his obedient children "richly all things to enjoy," there are too many of us seeking for those pleasures which are forbidden of Him, because He knoweth, that by indulging therein, our hearts will be too much set upon the things of earth, or else using those which are lawful unlawfully, and so the life of religion is almost lost amongst us? A name to live will not suffice, if we would be Quakers indeed, and I love the epithet, we must be made first of all to tremble and quake before a righteous God, and to so bow our necks to the cross of Christ as to know the government of our lives to be upon his shoulders. Then will He indeed teach us of his ways; and, walking by the same light as our worthy predecessors, we shall again become instrumental in turning the hearts of the people from empty shadows to the living substance, and from the power of Satan unto God. True, it is not in the power of man to convert souls, but it is in the power of every Christian, through living faith in Christ Jesus our Saviour, and a full surrender of the heart unto the cleansing operation of the Holy Spirit, to have the mind so weaned from the things of earth, the affections centered on things above, as to walk blameless in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation; and as this is our individual condition, there will be a flocking to us "as doves to their windows;" the waste places will be built up, the young will be instructed, the older will become each other's helpers in the Lord, and a harmonious labor known for the salvation of souls, and the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom. May the Lord hasten this day, and may the united prayer of the church everywhere be, that we be found individually and collectively doing our part in this great work; following our risen Lord, not partially but wholly, as dear children.

8th mo. 16th, 1881.

Eastern Marriages.—At a marriage, the procession of which I saw some years ago, says—Ward, the bridegroom came from a distance, and the bride lived at Serampore, to which place the bridegroom was to come by water. After waiting for two or three hours, at length, near midnight, it was announced, as if in the very words of Scripture, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." All the persons employed now lighted their lamps, and ran with them in their hands to fill up their stations in the procession. Some of them had lost their lights, and were unprepared, but it was then too late to seek them, and the cavalcade moved on to the bride, at which place the company entered a large and splendidly illuminated area before the house, covered with an awning, where a great multitude of friends, dressed in their best apparel, were seated upon mats. The bridegroom was carried in the arms of a friend, and placed in a superb seat in the midst of the company, where he sat a short time and then went into the house, the door of which was immediately closed and guarded by Sepoys. I and others expostulated with the door-keepers, but in vain. Never was I so struck with the beautiful parable as at this moment. "And the door was shut."

Scattering and Increasing.—Now, you will find that liberal people are happy people, and get more enjoyment of what they have than folks of childish mind. Generous souls are made happy by the happiness of others. The money they give to the poor buys them more pleasure than any other that they lay out. I have seen men of means give coppers, and they have been coppers in every thing. I have seen others give to the poor and to the cause of God by shovelfuls, and they have had it back by barrow loads. They made good use of their stewardship, and the great Lord has trusted them with more, while the bells in their hearts have rung out merry peals when they have thought of widows who blessed them, and orphan children who smiled into their faces.—John Ploughman's Pictures.

The Scapegoat.—During the last illness of the late Maharajah of Travancore a ceremony was performed with bears some resemblance to the Jewish institution of the scapegoat. A man was found willing, for a consideration (10,000 rupees) to bear the responsibilities of the Maharajah's sins. He was brought into the royal presence, and after the Brahmins had performed certain ceremonies over him, the sick man tenderly embraced him. He was then led out of the country of Travancore into the Tinnevely district, with a charge never to return.

DO IT NOW.

BY PHOEBE CARY.

If you're told to do a thing,
And mean to do it really,
Never let it be by halves;
Do it fully, freely.

When father calls, though pleasant be
The play you are pursuing,
Do not say, "I'll come when I
Have finished what I'm doing."

If you are told to learn a task,
And you should now begin it,
Do not tell your teacher, "Yes,
I'm coming in a minute."

Waste not moments nor your words
In telling what you could do
Some other time; the present is
For doing what you should do.

Don't do right unwillingly,
And stop to plan and measure;
'Tis working with the heart and soul
That makes our duty pleasurable.

THE PLOWMAN.

The plowshare's silver gleam,
Behind the panting team,
Lights the brown furrow in the field,
And hope foretells the future yield
Of sun-damned crops of wheat,
Ripening in genial heat.

How well he draws his line;
Through tangled grass and vine
The plowman scores the hill and vale,
Where violets blue and daisies pale,
Crushed by the gleaming share,
Sweeten in death the air.

Fair birds on every bough
Sing praises of the plow;
And groups of golden daffodils,
Dancing in shadows of the hills,
Like happy girls at play,
Inspire the plowman's lay.

His mandates are obeyed;
The dumb brutes, unafraid,
Come at his call from pastures green,
Over the bars, half-down, between
The meadow and the sled,
And by his hand are led.

Serene the plowman's life;
He's king—a queen his wife.
Right royal they, no crowns to press
The heart out of their happiness,
No threats, in undertone,
To hurl them from their throne.

He is a rural king,
And every living thing
Within his realm, the farm, obeys
When he commands. I sing his praise
In chorus with the birds
And bleating flocks and herds.

EVENING HYMN.

Slowly all around us gather
Shadows of the eventide;
Home we come to thee, O Father,
Let our hearts with thee abide.
We are weak and worn and weary,
Chafed by toil and care and strife,
Thou wilt give us welcome cheery
To thy home of love and life.

Bright with dew-drops was the morning,
Golden fair the early light,
Earth and sea and sky adorning
With its splendor pure and bright.
Birds their matin-song were singing
In the fragrant leafy bowers,
Incense-breathing, worship bringing
Were the glory-vested flowers.

We from quiet rest were waking
At the gentle touch of day,
From the bonds of slumber breaking,
Faring to our work away.

Selected.

All day long thine angels holy
Sent to help us by their King,
Be we lofty, be we lowly,—
Have our steps been following.

Lord of angels, Saviour Jesus,
While thy watchful hosts are near,
Death or danger cannot seize us,
Therefore we know no fear.
Stronger than the strongest angel
Art thou, ever by our side;
So hath taught us thine evangel,
In that blessed faith we bide.

Therefore, though the shadows darken,
Trudging wearily along,
Yet we know thine ear will hearken
While we sing our even-song.
Light of life, departing never,
Light of earth, and light of heaven,
Earthly suns may set, but ever
Will thy love make light at even!

For "The Friend,"

Thomas Wright.

(Concluded from page 19.)

"After he had been thus working on for years, his voluntary labors at length obtained official recognition. Captain Williams mentioned him in his annual reports on the state of prisons. He says, 'To show the extent to which this humble and unassisted good man has carried his benevolence, and the success with which it has been crowned, it is but necessary to state that out of ninety-six criminals befriended by him, and re-established in life, only four have returned to a prison. It is delightful to witness the implicit confidence and reliance reposed in him by the guilty and wretched, and which seem to be wholly induced by his simple, unassuming, and truly fatherly way of doing good.'

There were many cases in which he could not get employment for the released prisoners. In such cases he either lent them money of his own, or raised a private subscription among his friends, to enable them to emigrate. In this way he assisted 941 discharged prisoners and convicts to go abroad, and to begin life under new circumstances and separated from their old companionships. In many cases the discharged prisoners themselves helped him in his philanthropic labors. They got employment for their friends, or they helped to raise subscriptions to enable others to emigrate. Thus charity begot charity.

One of these forlorn emigrants, who had been sent to North America, wrote to T. Wright in 1864, addressing him as 'My dear adopted father.' He enclosed £2 as a contribution to the London Male Reformatory. 'The emigrant, who was now a prosperous man, said, 'To your never-to-be-forgotten fatherly aid I owe my present success. You were indeed my best, my kindest, and my sole advising friend on this earth. You rescued me from a life of vice by your own unaided help. When all others had turned their faces from me as a miscreant and a vagabond, you, like the prodigal's father of old, welcomed me back to the paths of virtue and integrity of life, consoling my youthful heart with the hope of brighter days yet in store, and blending your fatherly counsel with a still purer hope beyond the grave. God bless you, dear father! God bless you for all your kindness! Tears of kind remembrances fall from my cheeks as I think upon all your noble efforts for your poor fellow-men.'

In the mean time T. Wright was working daily at the foundry—working from 5 o'clock the morning until 6 o'clock at night; and sometimes to a still later hour. All his evening leisure and most of his First-days were devoted to his self-imposed services; either in jail, the penitentiary, the ragged First-day schools, or at the homes of the unfortunate and the criminal. He was now sixty-seven years old, and his health was beginning to fail. He had saved nothing. All his surplus earnings had been devoted to the relief and emigration of discharged prisoners. He frequently reduced himself to the lowest means of subsistence—always considering that while he had the means he would not be justified in withholding them from those who were in distress.

Selected.

The government of the day, recognizing the value of his services, offered him the post travelling inspector of prisons, at the salary £800 per annum. Here, it would seem, was a method by which he could lay by a little money, and at the same time extend the sphere of his operations. But he unhesitatingly refused the offer. He said that it would rob him of his power of doing good, as he felt convinced that if he once became a government official, he would soon cease to be regarded as the Prisoners' Friend.

Accordingly, the attempt was made by the people of Manchester to raise a sum for the purchase of an annuity equal to the amount of his weekly wages—a mere tithe of the amount which his exertions had saved to the State. A sum of £100 was allotted from the Royal Bounty Fund in aid of the subscription. The Manchester people did the rest. They raised a sum which provided him with an annuity of £182, the exact amount which he had before earned by his daily toil.

He still continued in his works of mercy. He went from town to town, like Howard, visiting the jails of the country. He inspected the Field Lane Night Refuge, the Redhill Industrial Schools, the hulks and convict establishments at Millbank, Pentonville, Portland, Portsmouth, and Parkhurst. He worked hard in the establishment of Ragged Schools. He wished to train the poor boys to earn an honest livelihood, and thus to prevent their becoming criminals. He regarded ignorance and bad example as the fruitful parents of all evil; and he did what he could to eradicate them by secular and religious instruction. He urged upon Cobden, who was then engaged in advocating a system of National Education, that it should be made compulsory, as the primary means of diminishing crime and pauperism. Besides his Ragged Schools, he instituted Reformatory Schools, Penny Banks, and the Shoeblack Brigade. Wherever a good work was to be done, his hand and help were never wanting. He loved to have every moment occupied. His motto was, "Work, work, while it is called to-day, or the night cometh."

Thus he went on to the end. When he had lived at eighty-five years of age his health rapidly failed. Yet he was always ready to receive those who wished to see him—especially poor persons, discharged prisoners, or returned convicts. His life gradually faded away. The twenty-third Psalm was continually on his lips, and at the end of each day's illness he felt himself "a day's march nearer home." He had fought the good fight, and was about to finish his course. He passed peacefully and calmly to his rest on the 14th of 4th month, 1875."

Purchasable Health.

There are thousands of men in every great city, who are perfectly aware that they are bankrupting themselves in health—that is they are selling their health for money. The time will surely come, at last, when they will be willing to pay all this money back for the health they have parted with; but it will be too late. The object of this article is to induce these men, if possible, to buy health while it is in the market and not to sell it under any consideration. Col. Thomas Scott carried his burden so long that the four millions he had won had no power to bring back the health he had parted with; but there were undoubtedly times in his life when, by the proper expenditure of money and of time, he could have bought health enough to last him a brace of decades longer. A man crowds his powers through a series of years of excessive labor, and, some day, he drops with paralysis, and from that day forward he becomes a powerless child, to be led kindly and carefully to the grave. The increase of this disease is undoubtedly the result of the increase of unwisely conducted labor. Money can do nothing for it when it befalls a man; but it can do [much] to prevent. "Nervous prostration" has become a too familiar phrase in these latter years. Money cannot restore a shattered nervous system; but, properly expended, at proper time, it [may] prevent it, which is a great deal better.

There are two plans of life, by either of which money will buy health and prolong a comfortable existence. The first is, the setting aside of a part of every day for recreation. So far as this can be done, it ought to be done; but there seems to be some peculiarities in our American life that forbid it. Competition in business is cruelly sharp, and most men feel obliged to devote themselves to it, when they are in it at all, from morning until night. The sleeping hours are the only ones which give them release from active care. Now business followed in this way, from year's end to year's end, is just as certain to ruin health and shorten life as the recurrence of seed-time and harvest is sure. The alternative of daily recreation is a yearly period of rest. There are always slack seasons in business, and these every business man should avail himself of, for rest and recreation. Suppose he loses money by it; he wins that for which he will sometime be willing to give money, when money will not buy it. When a man gives health for money, he makes the poorest investment of his life. When he gives money for health, he makes, from every worldly point of view, the best.

There is a hallucination, cherished by a great multitude, that they must be constantly in their own business or it cannot possibly go on prosperously. Some of these men are so unfortunately organized that they cannot believe that anybody living can do their work as well as they can do it. It takes an enormous self-conceit to come to such a conclusion as this; and there is a great misfortune in it. Of course these men are never able to leave their work for a moment in other hands, and so they become the bond-slaves of their own mistake. Now there is nothing in which a great business man shows his greatness so signally as in his ability to find men to do his work—to find competent instruments to execute his purposes. The greatest business man is always a man of comparative leisure. His own work is always deliberately done. It is, as a rule, the small man who never gets a moment, and who never can find a pair of hands as good as his own. If a man cannot leave his business, or thinks he cannot, he shows that he lacks the highest grade of business capacity.

The leisure of Newport and Long Branch and Saratoga, with its social excitements and attractions, is not that certainly which buys health in the cheapest market. Stillness, rest, freedom of action and of dress in the open air, distance from the marts of trade—these pay best; and, when these are properly and regularly enjoyed, the money that they cost buys health and the prolongation of life. Money avails nothing to a worn-out man; but to a man slowly wearing out it avails [much] when properly used.—Scribner's Monthly.

A notable instance of praying to God, and resolving to take no denial, and prevailing when hope seemed gone, was that of the pious wife of a hard drinking man named Martin, in West Riding, Yorkshire, England, who prayed twenty-one years for his reformation and conversion.

When that long time had passed, and no answer had come to her prayers, she went one night at midnight, to the "public" where her husband spent much of his time, and found him sitting in the bar-room with several other men and the landlady.

"You go home," said Martin, roughly, when he saw his wife enter.

"Wait a little, and your husband will go with you," said the landlady.

"— Tolman," replied the poor wife, advancing to the table where they were sitting, "I have waited twenty-one years for my husband to 'go with me'—and all that time I have prayed for him."

She steadied her voice, and added:

"I am certain, too, that God will answer my prayers. As sure as he is sitting in your bar I shall live to see him pass your house and have no inclination to go in."

She turned to go out, and Martin rose and followed her, saying not a word.

That night was the turning-point in his life. The long-felt promise to the heart of the pious wife that her husband should "go with her" began to fulfill to her patient waiting.

He went to meeting with her, and was melted by a sermon on the words, "Where thou goest, I will go; . . . thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." He went with her on the road to life, and helped her to lead their children in the narrow way.—Sel.

Do Small Things Thoroughly.—Every boy should ponder the words of the preacher in Ecclesiastes:

"Whosoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

This injunction is exceeding broad, for it covers small things as well as larger ones. Hon. Josiah Quincy reports in the Independent a conversation he once had with Daniel Webster which illustrates the preacher's words:

The conversation was running upon the importance of doing small things thoroughly and with the full measure of one's ability. This Webster illustrated by an account of some petty insurance case that was brought to him when a young lawyer in Portsmouth.

Only a small amount was involved, and a twenty dollar fee was all that was promised. He saw that to do his clients full justice a journey to Boston, to consult the Law Library, would be desirable.

He would be out of pocket by such an expedition, and for his time he would receive no adequate compensation. After a little hesitation, he determined to do his very best, cost what it might. He accordingly went to Boston, looked up the authorities, and gained the case.

Years after this, Webster, then famous, was passing through New York. An important insurance case was to be tried the day after his arrival, and one of the counsel had suddenly been taken ill.

Money was no object, and Webster was begged to name his terms and conduct the case.

"I told them," said Webster, "that it was preposterous to expect me to prepare a legal argument at a few hours' notice. They insisted, however, that I should look at the papers; and this, after some demur, I consented to do.

"Well, it was my old twenty-dollar case over again, and as I never forget anything, I had all the authorities at my fingers' ends. The court knew that I had no time to prepare, and were astonished at the range of my acquisitions.

"So, you see, I was handsomely paid both in fame and in money for that journey to Boston; and the moral is that good work is rewarded in the end, though, to be sure, one's own self-approval should be enough.—Ez.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Liberty of Conscience in France.—A letter from France to the National Baptist of this city, describes the case of a young Baptist named Taquet, in prison for conscience sake. The circumstances attending his imprisonment are thus explained:—

"Among the church festivals, is one of the most gorgeous style, an imitation of some pagan pomp, called God's Fete. On that day, all the people rival in show; the houses are hung with white cloths, carpets decorated with flowers, and statues set up here and there—a sort of shelves with lights, burning, costly silver, flowers, &c. The clergy go out decked with their richest robes, bearing the box of gold in which the holy sacrament is kept; as they believe in the real presence, they call it 'God.' The school-children follow, all dressed for the occasion; girls in white, scattering flowers, precede the priests; a little child, naked, with a girdle of undressed skin, holding out a cross, bedecked with lights, goes on to the Baptist; another little one, as lovely as nature, can make a child, follows the little St. John, as Christ, dragging a heavy little cross on the ground behind him; then come statues of the Virgin and of saints, borne by men if too heavy, by girls in white if possible; also military bands, and all the devotees of the place. Wherever this procession passes, women are expected to kneel, and men to take their hats off, at least. The church always wants soldiers in its ranks to give lustre to these shows; and a law of Napoleon I. grants this privilege. In the last years, some Republican deputies asked that this law should be revised and that soldiers may not be forced to do this service against their consciences. The law is still waiting, with others, that displease the clergy.

"The clergy of Laon required soldiers to accompany the procession; and it happened that our Bro. Taquet was one of the men detailed to go. He protested and asked of his superior to be exempt from a service repugnant to his conscience and religion. The sergeant would hear of nothing; so Taquet went; it was the 15th of June last. But, when in church the order was given, 'Knee on ground,' Taquet remained upright. He was spoken to. 'It is against my conscience to kneel here,' he said; 'I cannot do it!' You may imagine what a scandal! Our friend was sent to prison, where he is now. The Baptist sisters in Paris and elsewhere have done one seems powerful enough to go against this insult done to the Holy Sacrament. The War Minister himself was appealed to; he promised to send an order to free Taquet; no order has come. Some newspapers took up the cause very warmly; but they were radical papers; and these do not count much. One of the papers, the Nineteenth Century, Gambetta's organ, mentioning the incident, said something to this effect: 'What a very simple man that was, to make so much ado for an act of no consequence! We do not believe in the sacrament either; but then, lifting our hats to it, or kneeling, costs us so little and gives them so much satisfaction, that we would not refuse them what gives us so little trouble?'

"Such words show what value they set on principles."

"No Man can Redeem his Brother."—The Christian at Work refers to one of the Roman Catholic papers which, in speaking of the assault upon President Garfield says, that a surgeon was sent for first, not a priest; and adds: "With Catholics it is different. In case of calamity, concern for the soul is first. The priest is the soonest summoned, then the doctor."

In reply, the Christian at Work says: "With Roman Catholics the priest is sent for first, not because concern for the soul is first with Roman Catholics and secondary with Protestants, but because the Roman Catholics hold that only the priest can prepare the dying man for heaven, and this however vicious his life may have been, while Protestants hold that a Christian is always prepared, and that beyond the comfort which every dying Christian man experiences in having a minister or his friends by his bedside, the offices of the minister cannot change the destiny of the soul."

More copies of the Scriptures were sold in Japan in 1880 than in all the years since it was open to western civilization.

No opium smoker is admitted to church membership by any Christian mission working in China. The estimated deaths from the use of opium in China are 160,000 annually.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Indigo.—The plant is so bitter that no animal, not even a goat, will touch it, and where the weeds, favored by the shelter of the indigo crops, attain a dangerous rankness, the village sheep and goats in India are sent in to browse down the unwanted weeds.

The dye which the plant contains is extracted from the leaf, and is grown for the leaf alone.

The mode of manufacture is this:—The plant is first steeped in steeping-vats, for about ten to twelve hours. The liquid that runs out is a yellowish green color, which on exposure to the air, absorbs oxygen, and becomes of an intense blue. The liquid is beaten violently for from two to three hours by machinery, a revolving wheel with small discs at the end churns the liquor, exposing every particle to the action of the air, till the vat in which it is beaten assumes a deep intense indigo-blue color, beautifully flecked with foam, and is one of the prettiest sights in the range of manufacturing industries. As the beating process progresses, the liquor gets seeming filled with little flakes. These get bigger and bigger till at length the beating is complete. The flakes then gradually settle to the bottom as a pulpy sediment of an intensely blue color. This sediment is strained, purified, dried and packed for shipment as indigo.

Cork.—Cork is the outer bark of a tree called Cork Oak, Quercus suber, and once every eight years the crop of cork is gathered from those trees. The cork is the outer bark which, after the tree is four or five years old, makes a rapid growth and becomes very thick. While this outer bark is increasing, a new bark forms on its inner side, and thus the Creator has provided a covering for the tree by the time the old bark shall have become cracked and dry, and useless for further protection. It is just before the outer bark has reached this useless condition, and while there is yet life and pliability left in it, that the workmen go forth and carefully separate it from the trees. This operation is performed during the summer months, by cutting furrows in the bark, lengthwise, and making cuts crosswise, about forty inches apart; the bark is then beaten, in order to loosen it from the tissues beneath, after which it is pried out in square pieces. The bark is finally carried to the factory, where men and boys cut and turn it into the different shapes used for corks, buckets and such like. If the barking or peeling is carefully done, without hurting the new bark beneath, it does no injury to the tree.—Vick's Monthly.

A Curious Case of Partial Deafness.—Edwin Cowles, of the Cleveland (Ohio) Leader, gives the following account of an infirmity which curiously limits the range of his sense of hearing:—

"My deafness is somewhat of the nature of color-blindness. There are certain sounds I never hear. I have never heard the sound of the bird since I came into this world, and until I grew up to manhood I had always supposed the music of the bird was poetical fiction. You may fill this room with canary birds, and they may all sing at once, and I would never hear a note, but I would hear the flutter of their wings. I never hear the hissing sound of the human voice, consequently, not knowing of the existence of that sound, I grew up to manhood without even making it in my speech. A portion of the consonants I never hear, yet I can hear all the vowels. I never could distinguish the difference between the hard sound of the letter 's' and the soft sound, consequently I frequently mix these sounds in a sad manner. It is the same with the soft and hard sound of the letter 'g.'"

Wool-sorter's Disease.—For some time past considerable discussion has arisen in the manufacturing districts of England over a malady called Wool-sorter's Disease. Roberts, the medical officer of health for the district of the Keighley Local Board, treats at considerable length in his annual report for 1880, of the nature and preventives of this disease. In summing up from the report it is recommended that the following precautions be taken without fail by wool-sorters:—(1) Wool-sorters not to sort dangerous wools when they have any sore places or cracks on their hands or fingers, (2) to be careful not to wipe or rub their faces with their hands while sorting, especially if they have any cracks or pimples on the face lips; (3) to wash their hands before eating, and to take neither food nor drink into the room where the wool is being sorted." The dining room, he adds, ought to be well ventilated, to be swept regularly, and to have the walls and ceilings whitewashed twice a year. Scientific American.

The Utilization of Worn-out Horses.—The lization of horses not fit to eat and too old to be of working service, in France, is said to be as follows: "It is first shorn of its hair, which serves to stuff cushions and saddles; it is then slaughtered and skinned, the hoofs are made combs; next the carcass is pressed in a cylinder and cooked by steam at a pressure of three atmospheres; a cock is inserted, which allows the steam to be run off; the remains are cut up, the leg-bones are sold to make knife-handles, &c., and the rest, the ribs, the head, &c., are converted into animal black and glue. The first are pressed in cylinders, and the vapors when condensed form the chief source of carbonate ammonia, which constitutes the base of nearly all ammoniacal salts. There is an animal oil yielded which makes a capital ingredient in a vermifuge. To make glue the hoofs are dissolved in muriatic acid, which seizes away the phosphate of lime; the soft residue, retaining the shape of the bone, is dissolved in boiling water, cast into squares, and dried on nets. The phosphate of lime, acted on by sulphuric acid and calcined with carbon, produces phosphorus for lucifer matches. The remaining flesh is distilled to obtain the bonate of ammonia; the resulting mass is mixed up with potash, then mixed with old iron and iron of every description; the whole calcined and yields magnificent yellow crystals—prussiate of potash, with which tissues are dyed. It also forms the basis of cyanide of potassium and prussic acid, the two most terrible poisons known in chemistry."—Scientific American.

Some curious points of ceremony and payment of fees are necessary before a memorial man can be set up in Westminster Abbey. After the Dean's permission has been obtained and he has selected the site, the exact dimensions must be described and a design of the design must be submitted to the chapter, when the fee will be decided according to precedent. For a simple bust the fee is usually £500; for a tablet or for a figure varies according to the size and position in which the memorial is placed. This fee must be paid in a little office in the cloister before a monument is admitted to be placed in the abbey. It is understood that for the bust of Lord Beaconsfield the fee will be £500; for one of Thackeray it was £200. The money is divided between the Dean and the monks, and a guinea in addition goes to the mason. No inscription is admitted until the Dean has signified his approval of it.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 3, 1881.

We have been frequently edified and instructed in referring to the memorial preserved by Piety Promoted, of that worthy minister Thomas Camm, who labored much for the slave of others and that he might fill up a measure of service which the Lord required of him. As the end of life drew near he was favored with great peace and satisfaction in looking back at his faithful labors in the Lord's cause, and said—"I bless the Lord, I can say with the apostle, I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." This holy rejoicing did not proceed from any self-confidence, but from a sense of the Lord's goodness and preserving power, as is evidenced by his further remarks:—

"I have been pondering in my mind, and meditating of the wonderful and unspeakable mercies and loving kindnesses of God, to whom I extended all my life long, even to this very day; that I, such a poor, weak, feeble creature, should be enabled to hold out, and go through those many trials, travels, sufferings and exercises, both inward and outward, of various kinds, that have fallen to my lot. It has indeed been the Lord's doings, who is and has been all along my buckler and my shield. He shall have the praise and the glory of all, for He alone is worthy of it for ever and forever more."

At his funeral, his friends had a "precious edifying season together, the powerful living presence of the Lord in an eminent manner overshadowing the assembly, to the tendering and affecting many hearts. And divers living testimonies were then borne to the sufficiency of that universal principle of Divine Light and Grace, which is given to be a teacher and a leader unto all mankind." Testimony was also borne to the faithfulness, care and labor of love of the deceased. And his friends were careful to add that all these things "he was enabled to perform and go through by the power and assistance of that Divine Grace and Holy Spirit of God, which he accounted his buckler and his shield, his bow and his battle-axe, and by and through which he was what he was; and to which alone, and not to him as man, the praise and glory of all was attributed."

We fully believe that precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints; and that it is right for survivors to cherish the memory of the faithful servants of the Most High who have passed away; but we believe it is profitable to bear in mind, that the praise and the glory of all excellence must ever be attributed to the Lord, through whose assisting grace alone any are enabled to do his holy will. At the time of funerals, ministers sometimes speak of departed worthies in a style of panegyric unsuited to the solemn occasion; and which seems to thoughtful listeners to be the outpouring of their own affectionate feelings, rather than a message given to them for the people by their Divine Master. We believe it is safest to keep to true moderation in the praise of even the best of men; and to labor to turn the thoughts of people to the Grace of God which bringeth salvation, and which enabled our departed friends to walk humbly and acceptably in the Divine sight. It is well to remember the injunction of our Saviour to his disciples: "When ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which it was our duty to do."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President Garfield, the latter part of last week, was so much reduced as to give reason to fear that his end was rapidly approaching. On Sunday a change for the better was noticed, and the improvement has continued up to the present time, and hopes of his ultimate recovery are again entertained. The parrot gland has been punctured several times, and once discharged spontaneously through the auditory canal. It is gradually diminishing in size.

The total value of our imports of merchandise during the twelve months ending 7th month 31st, 1881, was $883,972,221, against $724,477,322, for the twelve months ending 7th mo. 31st, 1880. The total value of our exports of merchandise during the twelve months ending 7th mo. 31st, 1881, was $855,722,371, against $804,416,066 during the preceding twelve months.

Two hundred and fifty of Sitting Bull's Indians from Standing Rock arrived at the Cheyenne Agency on the 23d ult. The remaining 1700 were expected in five days.

At a meeting of the "Oklahoma Town Company" in Wichita, Kansas, on Fourth-day evening, specimens of the silver found near Fort Sill, in the Indian Territory, were exhibited, and it was reported by the notorious Captain Payne that the army officers at the fort were "daily taking out mineral." It was resolved to move into Oklahoma in 10th month next. The "colony" is said to number ten thousand adventurers from nearly every State.

It is said in Ottawa that "a great drawback to the cattle ranch business" on Bow River, in the Northwest Territory, "is the presence of a large number of Indians, who will become herdsmen, and are entirely dependent upon the Government for support."

Navigation is reported to be virtually closed throughout the entire length of the Ohio river, owing to the lowness of the water.

An easterly storm at Charleston, South Carolina, was especially furious on Sunday from noon to midnight. A heavy sea ran up the harbor, and broke furiously against the sea-wall, throwing vast sheets of water forty feet into the air. Trees, fences, signs, chimneys were blown down, and houses overthrown throughout the city, the damage being estimated at $100,000. On Sullivan's Island cottages were swept away, and the loss here is estimated at $40,000. Four lives were lost by the storm, three negroes and a young girl, and many being drowned. The latter was on the sea-wall, and the wind while catching the tremendous sea. The shipping, having received due warning of the storm, no marine disaster is reported. At Savannah the maximum wind velocity was 80 miles per hour, and great damage was done to buildings of all kinds, and to craft in the river. Along the Savannah and on Tybee Island, 18 persons, mostly colored, are known to have perished. All the people on Shad Island were swept away, but the number is not known. At Port Royal, South Carolina, ten colored men were drowned by the washing away of a ferry house. The light ship on Rattlesnake Shoals, at Charleston, broke from her moorings, and is now anchored in six fathoms of water southeast of Fort Sumter, three miles nearer the city than she was before. The sea buoy off Charleston bar has drifted off Folly Island, and the outer bar buoy has drifted about a quarter of a mile to the eastward.

The Sound Steamer State of New York, from Hartford on New Year's, struck a rock in the Connecticut river on First-day night and was beached, just as the water extinguished her fires. The only person missing is Sidney Snellen, baggage master of the boat.

Large forest fires, said to be the largest shared by berry pickers, are devastating the lumber region of Carbon county, in this State. The loss in White Rock and Kidder townships alone is estimated at $10,000.

The railroad through the Stony Cove, in the Catskills, is completed for a distance of nine miles from Platteville. It climbs the mountain side for 1500 feet in eleven miles, 185 feet to the mile being the heaviest grade.

Those who have been interested in the importation of the English skylark into this country will be glad to know that the experiment made some years ago on Long Island has proved a success. A number of birds were put out at Flatlands, Long Island, near the County Houses, some years ago, before the war, we believe, and these birds and their progeny have been seen almost every year since. Edmund Orgill has frequently seen them there and heard them sing. One remarkable feature about their annual return is that they always come back to the exact locality where they were at first put out.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health states that there were 349 deaths in this city last week, 14 more than occurred during the corresponding week of last year, and 51 less than during the week ending 8th mo. 20th, 1881. Of these 177 were 10 years or under; 1 died of consumption, 34 of marasmus, 30 of cholera, 1 infant of 17 of inflammation of stomach and bowels, and 14 of typhoid fever.

Markets.—U. S. 3's, 101½ a 101½; 4's, registered, 112½; coupon, 113½; 4's, 115; currency, 6, 132.

Cotton was firmly held at full prices. Sales of middlings were reported at 12½ a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white at 7½ cts. for export, and 8 a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and firmly held. Sales of 2700 barrels, including low super at $4.57½; Minnesota extras, at $5.50 a $7.50 for clear, and at $7.25 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $6.75 a $7.25; western do. at $7 a $7.50, and patents at $7.25 a $8.25. Rye flour at $5.50 a $6 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is unsettled and is lower. Sales of 8000 bushels, including low super at $1.35 a $1.41½, according to quality and location; 50,000 bushels 10th month at $1.45½. Rye is scarcer and at $3 a $7 cts. Corn is in fair demand and is lower. Sales of 9000 bushels, including yellow, at 73 a 74 cts.; mixed at 73 cts.; steamer at 73 cts.; No. 3 at 72 cts., and rejected at 70 a 71 cts. Oats are in good request and firm. Sales of 1000 bushels, including white, at 53½ a 56 cts., and rejected and mixed at 52½ a 53 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 8th mo. 27th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 320; loads of straw, 60. Average price during the week—Prize timothy, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; straw, 60 to 70 cents per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull, and prices were a fraction lower; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 4½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and rather lower: 13,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 4½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per lb.

Hogs were active and higher: 3700 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 5½ a 10 cts., the latter rate for extra Chicago.

FOREIGN.—The British Parliament was prorogued by the Queen on the 27th ult.

Reports from all parts of the provinces state that the rains have done immense damage to crops. Some of the cut crops have already begun to sprout. Great apprehensions are felt for the harvest in Ireland, owing to continuous rain throughout the country. Corn is much damaged, and potatoes are showing signs of rot.

The Times in a leading article says: With each day there is less hope of a good harvest. The weather has turned against us at a critical moment. The loss to the country from the late rains is to be reckoned by millions. It is impossible to get in the corn, and it will soon cease to be worth gathering. The situation of our farmers is dismal. For many of them a bad harvest must mean absolute ruin. Farming is a highly skilled enterprise, and if the present race of farmers succumb and are driven out of their business, there will be no others capable of succeeding them.

The Times, in a leading article, says: Much has naturally been made of the Wilson proposal with which the veteran Irish patriot, Sir Gavan Duffy, has greeted the Land bill, and it may be fairly expected that his opinion will have considerable weight among the more rational Irishmen.

A dispatch from Oren announces that negotiations have been begun between France and Morocco with a view to removing any cause for conflicts resulting from the French operations in Algeria. It is understood that Morocco is very favorably disposed on the subject.

Athens, 8th mo. 27th.—The Turkish Governor of Armenia, Thessaly, has been given notice that the occupation of that district will begin on Second-day next.

The heat in Athens during the past few days has been excessive. A hot wind continued day and night, as if blowing from the Libyan Desert. Deaths from typhoid fever have occurred at the rate of ten a day, and there is an exodus of families to the country or adjacent islands.

A telegram from Tchesme, Asia Minor, says the recent earthquake there and on the island of Chios was more violent than that of last 4th month. The inhabitants are in despair.

A private letter from Bangkok, Siam, dated 7th ult., states that a Siamite chief is going home. It is variously estimated that from 100 to 300 natives are dying daily. Very few foreigners have died, but several had fled to Singapore and Hong Kong. Every one feels as though he was living in a graveyard.

A telegram from Constantinople states that the Transvaal Convention has caused great dissatisfaction among the British, the Boers and the blacks.

"Clouds of flying ants" covering miles of territory appeared at Emerson, Manitoba, a short time ago. The myriads of insects gazed the day light while torturing, and, when they alighted, the streets and earth were "black with them." On the river they floated "an inch thick."

Officers of a Chilean steamer, while on an exploring expedition off the coast of Peru, recently discovered two hundred deposits of guano the day light while torturing, and, when they alighted, the streets and earth were "black with them." On the river they floated "an inch thick."

Islands, and contains, it is estimated, about 60,000 tons; the other, in Ferrol Bay, to the south of Chimbote, comprises 40,000 tons. In quality this guano is thought to be first-class, and for shipment, access to it is easy. Its value is placed at $6,000,000.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Mary W. Bacon, Philada., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Anna D. Snowdon, $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry A. Knowles, Id., $2.10, vol. 55; from Francis Taber, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua H. Ballinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph S. Heald and Edwin T. Heald, Ind., per James Heald, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Dr. William H. Walker, Io., $2.10, to No. 52, vol. 55; from Sarah Ann Cox and Sarah Ann Allen, Phila., $2.10, vol. 55; from Richard Buzby, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Aaron Meekel, $2.10, vol. 55; and for Elizabeth Meekel, $2.10, to No. 13, vol. 55; from Mary M. Applegate, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from William Carpenter, Agent, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Rebecca Wistar, Letitia Reeve, Achsa S. Reeve, and S. Zelley, Anne D. Sinnickson, Josiah Wistar, and Samuel Carpenter, $2.10, vol. 55; from Dr. William R. Billock, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Harriet Roble and Jesse G. Hill, Pa., per Christiana Smith, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Ahner Eldridge, Ind., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Alexander L. McGrew, $2.10, vol. 55, and M. A. Fritchman, $2.10, to No. 19, vol. 55; from William J. Jenks, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from John Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Stephen H. Foster, III., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel Woolman, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Jacob L. Evans, $2.10, vol. 55; from Julianna N. Powell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles T. Lukens, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Mark S. Wilson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Wm. Warrington, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Ephraim Tomlinson, $2.10, vol. 55; from Capt. William Reed, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Darnell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel Williams and George Williams, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph E. Hoopes, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Wm. A. Wilson, $2.10, vol. 55; from Henry Palmer, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel F. Troth, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Amy H. Nicholson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John Trimble, Agent, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Caleb E. Thomas, Rebecca Larkin, Harvey Thomas, Samuel Fogg, and Thomas A. Webster, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Wm. Garretson, Agent, O., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Rachel Green, Sarah M. Bailey, Amasa Farns, Barclay Smith, Jesse Bailey, Joseph Doudna, Elizabeth Bailey, Sarah S. Bundy, John Bundy, Robert Plummer, Eliza Doudna, Rebecca W. Bundy, Joseph Cowgill, Aaron Farns, Elizabeth Bailey, John Doudna, Deborah Roberts, Jonathan T. Scofield, Dr. Ephraim Wistar, John E. Wilson, Deborah S. Hall, Francis Davis, William Stanton, Esther Sears, John Thomasson, Joseph W. Doudna, O., Homer Gibbons, Io., and John G. Hoyle, Kans., $2.10 each, vol. 55, and for Sarah D. Sears, O., $2.10, to No. 52, vol. 55; from Mary H. Perry, R. I., $2.10, vol. 55; from Ruth A. Randall, R. I., $2.10, vol. 55; from Samuel Nicholson, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Anne W. Boone, Canada, $2.10, vol. 55; from William Kite, Gen., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Thomas Kite, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Woolman, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Ashton Richardson, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Ann Sawdwood, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from John E. Wilson, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Rebecca Hibberd, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Isabella P. Huston, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua G. Allen, M. D., City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Richard P. Gibbons, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Truman Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Sarah E. Leeds, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from N. Newlin Stokes, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elizabeth C. Cooper, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jonathan E. Rhoads, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Edmund S. Fowler, Agent, O., for Stephen Hobson, Benjamin J. Hobson, Thomas Hobson, Elizabeth Bowdler, and Edgar Hollingsworth, Daniel M. Mott, Jonathan Dean, Thomas Hobson, Caleb Elton, Joseph Penrose, Thomas Bowman, and James Hiatt, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from George Blackburn, Agent, O., for Elizabeth Bonsall, Edward Bonsall, Aaron Stratton, John M. Stratton, and Mary R. Strawn, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from M. S. Butler, B. Buffinton, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from William C. Taber, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from William Bishop, Columbus, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Priscilla M. Lippincott, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Hensbeth C. Hussey, N. Y., per Alfred C. King, $2.10, vol. 55; from Allen Furnas, Agent, Ind., for William T. Hadley, and Jesse Osborne, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John C. Allen, City, $2.10, vol. 55, and for John C. Allen, Jr., and Samuel L. Allen, N. J., Samue Leeds, Mich., and Jane B. Broomall, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Parker Hall, Agent, O., for Israel Seely, Lindley B. Steer, Eliza B. Steer, Joseph P. Lupton, Israel Sidwell, John Starbuck, and Lindsey Brackin, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Sarah V. Willis, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Ann Satterthwaite, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary Jane Satterthwaite, Mich., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua H. Ballinger, Agent, Pa., for Alfred Bree, Gilbert Cole, Deborah G. Brinton and Jane Forsythe, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Tabitha J. Stokes N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Elizabeth S. Morris, Gen., $2.10, vol. 55.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning, will not appear in the Receipts until the following week.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the Third Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second day, Ninth mo. 12th, 1881.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable embellishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can fully rely.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Mary Woolman, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

The primary Schools on Seventh St., on Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

EVENING SCHOOL FOR ADULT COLORED PERSONS.

Teachers are wanted for Men's and Women's departments of this school, to be opened about the first of Tenth month. Apply to Thomas Elkinton, 400 S. Ninth St., Phila.

Thomas Woolman, 558 Marshall St., "
Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, "
Finley Hutton, 502 Marshall St., "

TOUGHENAMON BOARDING SCHOOL.

Will re-open Ninth mo. 19th, 1881.

Wm. M. COPE, Principal.

Toughenamon, Chester Co., Pa.

MOORESTOWN ACADEMY.

Will re-open Ninth month 5th, 1881.

The Course of Study comprehends a full and thorough training in the usual Primary and High School branches, while to those who wish to carry their studies into the Higher Mathematics, Sciences, Greek, Latin and Modern languages—preparatory to entering college—ample opportunities are afforded.

Instructors: Principal—EDWARD FORTSHE.

RUTH ANNA FORTSHE. MARY JENKINS.

Boarding can be obtained in the town at reasonable rates.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

New Franklin, (Twenty third Ward), Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Rancocas, N. J., Fifth month 11th, 1881, WALTER S. REEVE, of Camden, to MELBAIDE, daughter of Richard Buzby, of the former place.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 10, 1881.

NO. 5.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Geikie's Life and Words of Christ.

In this work the learned author endeavors on various sources to collect information as to the condition of the Jews at the time of the coming of our Saviour; their connection with the Gentile world; the mental, moral and physical peculiarities of their people; the character of the country they inhabited; and their past history and their future hopes and aspirations—with the object of throwing such light as history can furnish on the doings and teachings of our Saviour when personally on earth.

Those, whose knowledge of the events of that era has been principally drawn from the sacred narratives themselves, will probably be surprised in reading such a work, at the amount of collateral information that can be drawn from other sources. Yet some of this so mingled with fable as to require the exercise of careful judgment to separate the real from the fictitious. The author might have lessened the bulk of his work (which is in no large octavo volumes), perhaps without diminishing its value, by omitting some of the imaginative descriptions of the personal appearance, conversations and doings of our Saviour; and the legends and traditions which grew up among Christians in the early or middle ages respecting him and his family, and the wonderful works which he wrought in Judea.

The book is written in a reverent spirit, and there is much in it that can be read with satisfaction, as well as interest. Yet there are many passages in which the author must depend mainly on his imagination for the materials of his narrative. This is the case in his accounts of the conversations between our Saviour and those with whom he had intercourse, as recorded in the Scripture narratives. These conversations he relates with many additions, pointing out the trains of thought, the peculiar feelings and the motives which were present in the minds of the speakers. Some light is undoubtedly thrown upon them by our author; but the reader must be careful not to accept his version of such occasions any further than as it commends itself to his own solid judgment.

We have become so familiar with the blessed doctrines of the Gospel, that it is difficult to realize the condition of a world in which many of them were denied or disregarded. In speaking of the teaching of our Saviour, Geikie says:

"It was reserved for Christ to bring the character of God, as a God of love, into full noon-day light, in his so loving the world as to give his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish but have eternal life. In the New Testament, He is first called our Father in Heaven—the Father of all mankind. The Old Testament proclaimed Him the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob—the Portion of Israel; Christ points the eyes of all nations to Him as the God of the whole human race.

"The morality taught by Christ is in keeping with such fundamental demands. To be a perfect Christian is to be a sinless man—sinless through the obedience of perfect love. Such a morality has the seal of the living God on its forehead.

"It is to be remembered, in realizing our obligations to Christ, that there was a perfect novelty in this teaching. Antiquity, outside the Jewish world, had no conception of what we call sin. There is no word in Greek for what we mean by it: the expression for it is synonymous with physical evil. There was either no guilt in an action, or the deity was to blame, or the action was irresistible.

"The Roman was as free from having any conception of sin as the Greek.

"We owe it no less to Christ that the belief in a future life, with its light or shadow depending on a future judgment, is now part of the creed of the world. Judaism indeed, in its later years at least, knew these revelations, but Judaism could never have become the religion of mankind. Pagan antiquity had ceased to have any fixed ideas of anything beyond this life. Immortality was an open question; the dream of poets rather than the common faith. But Christ brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel.

"The heaven thus cast into the mass of humanity has already largely transformed society, and is destined to affect it for good, in ever-increasing measure, in all directions. The one grand doctrine of the Brotherhood of Man, as man, is in itself the pledge of infinite results. The seminal principle of all true progress must ever be found in a proper sense of the inherent dignity of manhood; in the realization of the truth that the whole human race are essentially equal in their faculties, nature, and inalienable rights. Such an idea was unknown to antiquity. The Jew, speaking in the Fourth Book of Esdras, addressed God—'On our account Thou hast created the world. Other nations, sprung from Adam, Thou hast said are nothing, and are like spittle, and Thou hast likened their multitude to the droppings from a cask. But we are thy people, whom thou hast called thy first-born, thine only-begotten, thy well-beloved.' In the Book Sifri, the Rabbis tell us—'A single Israelite is of more worth in the sight of God, than all the nations of the world; every Israelite is of more value before Him than all the nations who have been or will be.'

"To the Greek, the word 'humanity,' as a term for the wide brotherhood of all races, was unknown. All races, except his own, were regarded and despised as 'barbarians.' Socrates only gave expression to the general feeling of his countrymen when he thanked the Gods daily for being man and not beast, male and not female, Greek and not barbarian.

"The Roman, in common with antiquity at large, considered all who did not belong to his own state as hostes, or enemies; and hence, unless there were a special league, all Romans held that the only law between them and those who were not Romans was that of the stronger, by which they were entitled to subjugate such races if they could, plunder their possessions and make the people slaves. The fact that a tribe lived on the bank of a river on the other side of which the Romans had settled, made its members 'rivals,' for the word means simply the dwellers on opposite sides of a stream. It was even objected to Christianity, indeed, that its folly was patent, from its seeking to introduce one religion for all races. 'The man,' says Celsus, 'who can believe it possible for Greeks and Barbarians, in Asia, Europe and Libya, to agree in one code of religious laws, must be utterly devoid of sense.'

"It was left to Christ to proclaim the brotherhood of all nations by revealing God as their common Father in Heaven, filled towards them with a father's love; by his commission to preach the Gospel to all; by his inviting all without distinction, who labored and were heavy laden, to come to Him, as the Saviour sent from God, for rest.

"In this great principle of the essential equality of man, and his responsibility to God, the germs lay hid of grand truths imperfectly realized even yet. It is to this we owe the conception of the rights of individual conscience as opposed to any outward authority. There was no dream of such a thing before Christ came.

"The Slave before Christ came, was a piece of property of less worth than land or cattle. An old Roman law enacted a penalty of death for him who killed a ploughing ox; but the murderer of a slave was called to no account whatever. Crassus, after the revolt of Spartacus, crucified 10,000 slaves at one time. Augustus, in violation of his word, delivered to their masters for execution, 30,000 slaves who had fought for Sextus. Pompeius Trajan, the best of the Romans of his day, made 10,000 slaves fight at one time in the amphitheatre, for the amusement of the people, and prolonged the massacre 123 days.

"The great truth of man's universal brotherhood was the axe laid at the root of this detestable crime—the sum of all villainies. By first infusing kindness into the lot of the slave, then by slowly undermining slavery itself, each century has seen some advance, till at last the man-owner is unknown in nearly every civilized country, and even Africa itself, the worst victim of slavery in these later ages, is being aided by Christian England to raise its slaves into freemen.

"Aggressive war" is no less distinctly denounced by Christianity, which, in teaching the brotherhood of man, proclaims war a revolt, abhorrent to nature, of brothers against brothers. The voice of Christ, commanding peace on earth, has echoed through all the centuries since his day, and has been at least so far honored that the horrors of war are greatly lessened, and that war itself—no longer the rule, but the exception—is much rarer in Christian nations than in former times.

"The poor in antiquity, were in almost as bad a plight as the slave. 'How can you possibly let yourself down so low as not to repel a poor man from you with scorn?' is a question of a rhetorician of the imperial times of Rome to a rich man. No one of the thousands of rich men living in Rome ever conceived the idea of founding an asylum for the poor, or a hospital for the sick. There were herds of beggars. Seneca often mentions them, and observes that most men fling an alms to a beggar with repugnance, and carefully avoid all contact with him. But we know the sayings of Christ—'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' 'I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.' 'Give to the poor: The alms and forlorn received a charter of human rights, when He proclaimed that all men are brethren: sprung from the same human stock; sons of the same Almighty Father; one family in himself, the Head of regenerated humanity."

(To be continued.)

The Power of Example.—Not long since the writer called on a business friend at his office, and while there was introduced to a prominent clergyman, who told the following story during a conversation upon the use of tobacco. "Some years ago," he said, "I was an inveterate smoker. I had abandoned the habit two or three times, but after the lapse of a few months would return to it again. One day after dinner, as I was lying on the sofa in my study, I overheard my two little boys, who were playing in the hall, telling each other what they were going to do when they became men. After the oldest one had stated his plans the little six year old spoke up: 'I'll tell you what I'm going to do when I get to be a man. I'm going to smoke cigars, like papa.' I sprang from the sofa, and opening the door said, 'Charley, papa wants to see you a minute.' The little boy ran into my study at the call, and I took him upon my knee, and with tears running down my cheeks said, 'Charley, papa heard what you just said, and it made him feel very badly. Now, papa is not going to smoke any more, and he hopes that God will help his darling boy to keep free from the dreadful habit.'

"That was seven years ago," he continued, "and I have never violated my pledge to Charley, and, God helping me, I never shall." This incident is a forcible illustration of the fact that as men and women were unconsciously influencing those about us by our example for good or evil. And it is not infrequently happens that what we do has far greater influence upon those with whom we come in contact than what we say.

As Christians we are under the most solemn obligations to make our religion the one active principle of our daily life, carrying it with us wherever we go.

There are many persons who seem to think that they are destitute of all influence, and who say that if they thought they had any influence, they would do this or that. Now, the very idea that any one is devoid of influence is an absurdity. "If," as Gough puts it, "you stand still, fold your arms, shut your eyes, close your lips, you exert an influence by the position you occupy—you can not help it." What a thought have we here for every father and mother, and all who have the early training of children in charge! There are those in our homes, church or neighborhood who are being daily influenced by what we do, and this one fact alone ought to lead us to strive to live nearer to God each day, so that that whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we shall do all to the glory of God.—Geo. M. Hove.

For "The Friend."

Gleanings from Quaker Annals.

The following letter of condolence was addressed to the widow of Robert Barclay, soon after his decease, by George Fox. It is an effusion of the ancient, evangelical spirit, and was the last letter, except one, which that worthy ever wrote.

George Fox to Christian Barclay.

"28th of 10th mo. 1690.

Dear friend!—With my love to thee and thy children, and all the rest of Friends in the holy Seed, Christ Jesus, that reigns over all; in whom ye all have life, and salvation, and rest, and peace with God!

Now, dear Friend, though the Lord hath taken thy dear husband from thee, his wife, and his children, the Lord will be a Husband to thee, and a Father to thy children. Therefore, cast thy care upon the Lord and trust in Him: let Him be thy confidence, and let thy eye be unto Him at all times; who is a great Ruler and Orderer of all, both in heaven and earth, and hath the breath and souls of all in his eternal infinite hand! And all the creation is upheld by his Word and power, by which they were made;—so that a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his will and pleasure;—and his sons and servants in his image, are of greater value in his eye than many sparrows. Therefore, thou and thy family may rejoice, that thou hadst such an offering to offer up unto the Lord, as thy dear husband; who, I know, is well in the Lord, in whom he died, and is at rest from his labors, and his works follow him.

And, now, my dear Friend, do thy diligence in thy family, in bringing up thy children in the fear of the Lord, and in his new covenant of life; that thou mayest present them to God as his children, and all thy servants and tenants, in the wisdom of God. Thou must answer the Truth in them all, in Truth, holiness, righteousness, and justice, and walking humbly before God. Thou wilt always feel his presence to assist, and enable thee to perform whatsoever He requires of thee; so that whatever thou dost do, it may be to the honor and glory of God. And do not look at the outward presence of thy husband; but look at the Lord, and serve Him with a joyful heart, mind, soul, and spirit all the days thou livest upon the earth.

From him, who had a great love and respect for thy dear husband, for his work and service in the Lord, who is content in the will of God, and all things that He doeth;—and so must thou be. And so, the Lord God Anointed might settle and establish thee and thine upon the heavenly Rock and Foundation; that, as thy children grow in years, they may grow in grace, and so in favor with the Lord. Amen.

GEORGE FOX.

Postscript.—I know thy husband hath left a good savor behind him, so I desire thou mayest do the same."

How beautifully George Fox, in the foregoing sympathetic address to this bereaved widow,—after setting forth the consolations which flow from an union with the Lord, as the Husband and Father of his people,—endeavors to stimulate her to do the day's work, to put on his strength, and to hope for his blessing on a faithful discharge of her duty, as a spiritual nursing-mother over her household. Indeed, he goes further; and subjoins his fervent prayer, that her children may be established upon the Rock, Christ Jesus, and thus be favored of the Most High, through the fervent exercise of their surviving parent. But here, it may be well to pause—and hold up to view, one means, among others, which she used, by way of laying open the grounds of the hearts of her tender offspring to the genial rays of Divine Light. We are informed by a Friend, who, about this time, passed several days under her roof, that "when her children were up in the morning, and dressed she sat down with them before breakfast, and in a religious manner waited upon the Lord; "which pious care," he adds, "and motherly instruction of her children when young, doubtless had its desired effect upon them; for, as they grew in years, they also grew in the knowledge of the blessed Truth; and since that time, some of them have become public preachers thereof."

When we call to remembrance the fervent zeal, faith and constancy of our worthy elder and predecessors in the Truth, who, through manifold sufferings, were enabled to bear a faithful testimony to the purity and spiritual ality of the gospel dispensation, an earnest desire is raised in us, that we, who succeed them in the same profession, may be excited to follow their example. In order whereunto we recommend to every particular member of our Society, a strict and serious self-examination, whether we are really concerned for the glory of God and the honor of his name? Are our hearts united unto Him, and one unto another? Do we live answerably to the principles of our profession? Do we walk as becometh the followers of Christ? Do we not depart from the testimonies of Truth, &c. the known doctrines of his gospel? Do we in our conversation among men, live in the practice of Christian humility and self-denial? Doth our "light so shine before men, that others seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in heaven?"

If upon such a solemn search, any of us shall find that we have declined from the estimonies borne by our faithful predecessors; hat we have gone astray, and been too remiss in our conduct and conversation: that we have been too conformable to the customs and manners of the world, and have not walked according to the plainness and purity of our profession: let us humble ourselves before the Lord, and turn unto Him with all our hearts, who is "long suffering and gracious, and delighteth in mercy; who reconcileth the penitent, healeth their backslidings, is the repairer of breaches, and the restorer of paths to walk in." Such an holy care and watchfulness in very particular, each over himself, will be readily conducive to the confirming and strengthening our church-fellowship and communion, and to making us one another's joy in the Lord.

For "The Friend."

Ellen Evans.

A few letters, and only a few, from Ellen Evans appear in the Pemberton correspondence, but they are of so original and weighty character it is thought as to merit being brought more prominently to view, believing that the experience of those who have trodden the straight and narrow path is often helpful to the struggling traveller of the present day. The following brief account of her is condensed from Piety Promoted: "She was the daughter of Rowland and Margaret Ellison near Dolgelly, in the principality of Wales, in the year 1685. A naturally good understanding was improved by religious education; and strict attention to the dictates of divine Grace, soon distinguished her as one seeking after heavenly treasure, which made her in riper years an humble member of Society. She married Jno. Evans, a much esteemed Friend, to whom she was truly a helpmeet, more especially in public religious services; for whenever she discovered the least inclination in him to visit meetings of Friends, whether far or near, she did all in her power to cherish and encourage that motion. She was also a great support and comfort to him under his spiritual conflicts, about the time of its first appearing in a public testimony. In her family she was an example of piety and industry, rising early in the morning and encouraging others to do so; often observing that those who lay late, lost the youthful purity of the day, and wasted the most precious part of their time; that the sun was theandle of the world, the light of which called upon us to arise and apply to our several duties; when the affairs of the morning were transacted, it was almost her invariable practice, except on meeting days, to retire about noon, with the bible or some other religious book, when a portion of her time was spent alone, from which retirement she often returned with evident tokens that her eyes had been bathed in tears. She was remarkably well acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, as with the writings and characters of our most worthy Friends, together with those of her own time; frequently expressing 'the many advantages she reaped from often conversing with the dead and absent,' endeavoring to cultivate the same disposition in her family by often calling them together in the winter evenings, and requiring one of her children to read audibly in the Bible or some other religious book; repeatedly observing to them, the benefit which attended the preserving the characters of those faithful ministers and leaders in the Church whose pious lives and happy dissolution, if held up to the view of posterity, might be a likely means of kindling the same holy zeal and resolution to tread in their footsteps." When ministering Friends, (whom she truly loved as brethren and sisters in gospel fellowship,) in the course of their visits came where she lived, they generally lodged at their house, at which time she seldom missed to prepare her family and inform the neighborhood of an intention to sit awhile together in the evening, which opportunities were often singularly blessed with divine comfort and edification. Her diligence in attending meetings for religious worship was no less manifest than her steady zeal for supporting Christian discipline, and that she and others might adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things; yet was her zeal mixed with charity, for having long experienced how few were qualified to lay justice precisely to the line and righteousness to the plumb line, she thought it safest rather to incline to the merciful side, firmly believing that the Grace of God which bringeth salvation had appeared to all men. She delighted to converse with the un instructed Indians about their sentiments of the Supreme Being; and often said, 'She discerned evident traces of Divine goodness in their uncultivated minds.' In her friendship she was warm and steady, and on her death-bed earnestly pressed her children 'Not to forget the friends of their father and mother.'

Some years before her decease she lost, in the husband of her youth, a bosom friend and the great support of her age, which proved so great a trial that she said: 'If God, whom she loved all her life-long, had not enabled her to sustain it, she must have sunk under it.' Her last illness began about a year before her decease. In the forepart of it, she felt a lowness and depression of mind, which caused her to cry: 'Tell me, oh! thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest; where thou makest thy flocks to rest at noon?' But after some time this cloud was removed, and she was enabled to say, 'He brought me to his banqueting house, and his banner over me was love.' Thus by remembering her Creator in the days of her youth, and a steady perseverance in the path of humble obedience to the will of God, relying on his mercy in and through Jesus Christ, her crucified and risen Saviour, she was enabled to meet the king of terrors with a serene countenance, and resigned her breath, without sigh or groan, the 29th day of the 4th month, and was buried at Gwynedd the 2d of the 5th mo, 1766, being, we trust, admitted to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven."

Of whom we may safely judge it might be truly said, she was an elder indeed worthy of double honor.

W. P. T.

Ellen Evans to John Pemberton.

(Received at Warrington, 1st mo. 7th, 1752.)

John Pemberton: Dear young friend,—I saw several letters lately wrote by thee to thy valuable parents—one of which more particularly made some tender impressions on my mind, from which sprung a disposition to send thee a few lines; which though perhaps thou may not need them from me, yet hope they will not hurt thee, being the effects of love. I am not sorry, but have rather reason to rejoice to hear thee bemoan thy wilderness travail; it were impossible thou should miss this desert, this land of drought, and of the shadow of death, and be an Israelite indeed; for the King's highway (from Egypt to Canaan) runs right across it; nevertheless a most ravishing beauty appears on the soul even in her wilderness state; how goodly (says one) are thy tents, O Jacob! It was gratifying news to my good spouse and self to hear that was favored with a kind visitation whilst on thy travels abroad; that thy mouth was at times opened in way of testimony in the assemblies of God's people, faithful, to whom indeed nothing can be more pleasing than to hear babes in the temple crying hosanna, and prattling forth (though by half-words and broken sentences) their Heavenly Father's praise, so be it in Hebrew, the language of the true Jew. Mayest thou, tender Youth, watch, watch as if for life, against aught that would cramp thy growth, (now in growing time) that so from a child's state thee may gradually advance to that of a man; even such a watchman that cannot hold his peace,—as indeed who can that have use of their eyes to behold the holy city surrounded with the enemy, and many of her precious sons carried captives to a strange land, (to a state of alienation). Where are there any (thou, O God, mayest see many though we see few) fine youths remaining yet within her walls, who, being filled with holy ambition, are catching at the weapons of former worthies (with which they wrought wonders), are running to and fro through her streets, blowing their trumpets in order to gather a company to repel the armies of the aliens, to save the city from actual invasion. Send forth thy word, O God! that so great a company of youth may become publishers thereof. These sees I am just out of paper, therefore must say no more, but that I am, more than I can tell thee, thy real well-wisher, and give my love to thy companion.

ELLEN EVANS.

(To be continued.)

The Samaritan Passover on Gerizim.

BY H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

So long as the temple of Jerusalem remained, the Jews went thither to celebrate the passover feast. But when the temple was destroyed, it was no longer lawful for them to sacrifice the paschal lamb; for the command was explicit (Deut. 16: 5, 6): "Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates; . . . but at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name in." And now the Jewish observance of that feast is but a partial one, in the household, with a bit of roasted lamb to represent the commanded sacrifice. In only one place in all the world is there any continuation of that sacrifice; and that is near the ruins of the ancient Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim, by the scanty remnant of the Samaritan people.

Although that temple was unauthorized by Jehovah, and the Samaritans were a mongrel people, with a mongrel religion, so many sacred associations cluster around Mount Gerizim, and the connection of the Samaritan rites and ceremonies is so direct with the original Hebrew ritual, that an exceptional

* J. P.'s first appearance in the ministry is believed to have been in 1750, whilst accompanying John Churchman, at a meeting at Farnham, Cornwall, England, when about 23 years of age, of which J. C. says: "At this meeting my companion, John Pemberton, spoke a few words in way of testimony, tender and broken, being the first time, and I thought it had a good degree of the savor of truth attending."

interest attaches to this one vestige of the ancient passover sacrifice, with its standing witness to God's foreshowed plan of salvation by the blood of the Lamb.

In the afternoon of Tuesday, April 12, 1881, with two traveling companions, I rode up along the way by which the disciples of Jesus had gone to the city of Sychar to purchase food, while he sat by Jacob's well and had that memorable conversation with the woman of Samaria. The well of Jacob and the reputed tomb of Joseph were behind us. At our right, on the north, flowed Ebal, the mount of cursing; at our left was Gerizim, the mount of blessing. Before us was Nablous, the modern city at or near the site of Sychar, and yet earlier of ancient Shechem. Passing through the narrow main street of the walled town, and out of the western gate, we came to our tents, already pitched for us, where we were greeted by Youhannah El Karey, a Christian missionary at Nablous, and told that we were just in season for the passover sacrifice in Gerizim. A few minutes later found us ascending the mountain, under his kind escort.

Recalling the great events in the history of God's people which had their centre at or near that mountain, it did not seem so strange that the Samaritans gave it the first place in their reverence and affections. It was there that Abraham rested and builded his first altar to Jehovah as his coming a pilgrim to Canaan. There was the home of Jacob. There the embalmed body of Joseph was laid to rest nearly two centuries after his death in Egypt. There the whole land was formally dedicated to Jehovah, with stately ceremonies as directed by Moses and conducted by Joshua, when the Israelites were fairly in its possession. There again all the people were gathered, to renew their neglected covenant with Jehovah, before the death of Joshua. There, on the plain, Abimelech, the first claimant of royal honors in Israel, was declared king, in the days of the judges; and there, from one of the mountain cliffs, still pointed out, his brother Jotham spoke his parable against this brief-lived usurpation. There, two centuries later, the foolish son of Solomon was crowned king of united Israel, and there his folly cost him the greater part of his kingdom. There also the ten revolting tribes crowned their new king, and established their first capital. There again, after the Assyrian overthrow of Israel, the new hybrid Samaritan people, with their imperfect understanding of the Mosaic law, built their temple and conducted their worship for centuries. To the manifold associations and traditions of this sacred site the remaining Samaritans cling with superstitious veneration, saying, as said the woman at the well, "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain."

Less than a hundred and fifty of the Samaritans, all told, now remain, and their number has not materially changed for many years. They live in Nablous; but on the fourteenth day of their month Nisan—at a time corresponding to our "Passion Week"—they leave their homes, and take themselves to the summit of Gerizim, where they pitch their tents, family by family, at a spot a little west of the temple ruins, and on somewhat lower ground, for the celebration of the passover feast. It was there that we found them as we reached the mountain top.

It was near the close of day. All was ready for the sacrificial services. Between the temple ruins and the tents two fires were burning: the first in a trench, within a low-walled enclosure, at the place of sacrifice, for the heating of water in two huge caldrons or kettles for scalding the dead lambs; the other at a little distance from this, and outside the enclosure, in a great oven or pit, some seven or eight feet deep, and three or four across it, stoned up inside from the bottom, for the roasting of the lambs. Within the low enclosure the congregation had gathered for worship. The high-priest with a white turban, and in a pearl-colored silk surplice, knelt on a scarlet rug before a small stone bench or desk, facing the temple-site eastward. The men and children (the women remaining in their tents) were in a semi-circle back of him, also facing the temple-site. At the right of this semi-circle were seven men ready to bring the prepared lambs to slaughter. Their dress was a simple white shirt or tunic, with white under-drawers. They were called "the murderers," or slayers. Seven lambs appointed to slaughter were just before the high-priest as he knelt.

It was about twenty minutes before sundown that the kneeling high-priest began the service by an invocation, imploring God's acceptance of this sacrifice according to his word. Then came a recital of the story of the exodus, and of the institution of this sacrifice, in which the people joined with the high-priest. The service was intoned, somewhat like the peculiar singing of the Egyptians, or the notes of the walling derwishes. At the first mention of the name of Jehovah, all prostrated themselves, as the Israelites did when they heard that God would bring them out of Egypt (Exod. 4: 31; 12: 27). Then all rose and stood in silent prayer—in most oppressive silence. At every subsequent mention of Jehovah's name the people put their hands to their faces, as if covering their faces in the presence of God. In token of emphasis, as they recited, they repeatedly stretched out their hands with upturned palms, in oriental demonstrativeness. In every movement the children followed their parents, whom they watched closely as the service proceeded.

(To be concluded.)

The Young Infidel Convict.

BY ANNIE A. PRESTON.

The following narrative is strictly true. The inhabitants of a prosperous and picturesque village in Southern Ohio took great pride in their new high school, and when they secured the services of Professor Andrews as its principal, they considered themselves very fortunate.

"He's a bright fellow," said Judge M. "He is not afraid to proclaim himself, not only a liberal in religion, but a free-thinker. You ought to hear him talk upon science and religion!"

"I'm afraid his influence over our young men and maidens will not be altogether beneficial," replied Dominic Manning, the old village pastor.

"How is that possible, sir?" asked Judge M., rather testily. "His character is spotless, as you know yourself, and is it wrong for one to investigate, to prove all things, and to think for himself?"

"There are some things which can neither be proved nor disproved without being destroyed. The moment Christianity is proved to be a scientific fact, that moment it loses its hold on the human heart. I have met this young Professor Andrews. He surely has a very pleasant address, and, I doubt not, he possesses sufficient intelligence, coupled with a measure of faith inherent in the soul of every man, to lift him from the mire of doubt in which he is at present floundering. Yet, I think, we had best beware of placing our young people under his influence while his mind is in its present chaotic state."

The good old dominie's feeble protest was vainly made, and the brilliant young infidel was installed within the classic walls of gray old Bright Academy, now transformed into the town High School. The young man proved to be an excellent teacher, winning the love of his pupils by his genial bearing and sympathetic demeanor. His active mind was constantly seeking out "fresh ideas" and "new truths," which gradually formulated, according to his notion, into a sort of philosophy that as yet baffled him, however, and kept him blinded by the clouds of his own ignorance.

Warily choosing opportune occasions out of school-hours, and selecting his brightest pupils, he sought to instill into their susceptible minds his "scientific" vagaries and abstract cavils of unbelief. "Churches were associations of people banded together for really selfish purposes; the clergy were men who, for the most part, preached what they did not really believe, and got their living out of the credulity of their fellow-men; the Bible was only valuable in a historical and literary point of view; and as for immortality, that was a question." These and similar assertions often fell from his lips.

After spending some two years in this Ohio village, the restless spirit of the young Professor prompted him to make a change, and, going West, the old academy lost sight of him for a long interval.

One day, several years later, a diseased, emaciated young man in a murderer's cell in one of our large Western towns was visited, much against his will, by the pastor of a large and vigorous Church in the neighborhood of the prison. The poor convict did not lift his sad and sunken eyes from the floor at the appearance of the pleasant-faced, middle-aged minister at the cell door, who said kindly and frankly:

"The newspaper reporters say you are thoroughly hardened; that you have no care for this life, no belief in a life to come. Now, my young friend, one so seldom meets with an avowed infidel, that I have come to ask you how you came to your present state of mind and heart. Such cases as yours have a very peculiar interest for me, and it may be that at this very interview, or at a subsequent one, we can compare notes, and I may be able to do you some good."

The alarmed prisoner started at the first sound of the minister's gentle yet clear, deep voice, and looked earnestly and curiously up into the handsome, sympathetic face a moment before he answered. Rising now with a slow and painful effort from the hard, narrow bed upon which he had been reclining, he moved to his cell door and signaled to the keeper to let his visitor in. He pushed the one little stool toward the minister, and seating himself upon the bed, he said: "My name is not William Hart, as the Court records and register have it, but for the sake of my family I wish to be still known by that name. I am John M., the only son of Judge M., of — Ohio. I was reared by a Christian mother, but received my first lessons in the scientific investigations of religion and in free thought from you, sir, when you were Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in, and in charge of, our High School."

"Alas! alas! God pity and forgive me!" cried the minister, clasping the thin, blundered hand of his former pupil, seating himself on the low iron bedstead beside him, and supporting him with his arm as he was seized by a violent fit of coughing. "O, my poor friend, my dear old pupil, what shall I say, at all I do, in this terrible conjunction of events? First, I must tell you that I went into the world, after leaving your quiet village, and was soon convinced that I was no wiser, than the generality of my fellows."

I was then ready to be taught, and so was used about, which means conversion, and saved by the precious blood of that Christ whom I had so long rejected and despised. The blessed Spirit led me to devote myself unreservedly to his service. I studied geology, and have been preaching the gospel with too great self-complacency all these years, while those pupils in —, whom I had enlured with the virus of my old-time patched and impious delusions, had been left perished. Tell me, pray, how is it with the members of that bright senior class whom I led into the fogs of skepticism with myself?"

Many of them are as free in their ways thinking and acting as I am, I hear, and now has a society of free-thinkers, sir," a young convict replied in a feeble voice. "They are ahead of the age; I am ahead of age. In the years to come, in the not far future, a man will not have to suffer the excessive penalty of human law, as I am about for freeing the world of an excrescence and cancer in human shape."

At that time the dying convict persisted that he had done no wrong in killing his enemy. At the same time his old teacher, calm, reasoned, prayed with him, with unflinching devotion, and remained with him almost constantly until he died, a few days before the time appointed for his execution, died contenting not of the crime he had committed, but in relinquishing the pernicious ideas inculcated by the teacher whom he had so much loved and adored. Those false systems of error were too deeply planted to be eradicated, and his ill-balanced, rudderless bark, wrecked in the old, old treacherous sea of science.

agreeable to a promise made to the unfortunate deceased, — Andrews himself went to look the sad news of the death to the parents, the real name of the wretched young man never made public. — Chr. Adv., 8th mo., 1881.

A gentleman who came to me for a long time said: "I have a conscientious objection to ecstasism, and it is this: our Saviour let wine at the marriage at Cana, in Galilee."

I know he did."
I made him because they wanted it."
So the Bible tells us."

"He made it of water."

"Yes."

"Then he honored and sanctified wine by performing a miracle to make it. Therefore," said he, "I should be reproaching my Master if I denied its use as a beverage."

"Sir," I said, "I cannot understand how you should feel so; but is there nothing else you put by which our Saviour has honored?"

"No, I do not know that there is."

"Do you eat barley bread?"

"No," and then he began to laugh.

"And why not?"

"Because I don't like it."

"Very well, sir," said I; "our Saviour sanctified barley bread just as much as ever he did wine. He fed five thousand people with barley leaves, manufactured by a miracle. You put away barley for the low motive of not liking it. I ask you to put away wine for the higher motive of bearing the infirmity of your weaker brother, and so fulfilling the law of Christ. I wish to say, that man signed the pledge three days afterward. — J. B. Gough."

Selected.

LEARNING TO WALK.

Only beginning the journey,
Many a mile to go,
Little feet, how they patter,
Wandering to and fro.

Trying again so bravely,
Laughing in baby glee;
Hiding its face in mother's lap,
Proud as a baby can be.

Talking the oddest language
Ever before was heard;
But mother—you'd hardly think so—
Understands every word.

Tottering now, and falling,
Eyes that are going to cry,
Kisses and plenty of love words,
Willing again to try.

Father of all, oh! guide them,
The patterling little feet,
While they are treading the up-hill road,
Braving the dust and heat.

Aid them when they grow weary,
Keep them in a pathway level,
And when the journey's ended,
Saviour, oh! give them rest.

LED.

Selected.

What though I toil upon the road—
With bruised feet
And burdened with a weary load—
Am tempest beat.
Cannot my faith this promise see
Through cloud and storm, "He leadeeth me?"

What, if each day my weary sight
Its weakness learns,
When over steps or mountain height
My life-path turns.

Though weak and dimmed my vision be
"Tis He discerns—" He leadeeth me."

What matter, that through ways which I
Have never known,
I faint must go—nor question why
This way be shown.

Adown the darksome path I see
His love alone: "He leadeeth me,"

What if—when He would safely hold
My trembling hand,
I fear to trust—my faith grows cold,
And faint would stand

With doubts beset lest even He Should fail? Ah well! He leadeeth me.

Thus ever. So when I shall stand
The stream beside
Which hides us from Hereafter's land
With mist-hid tide.
I know in whom I trust—and He
Through waters deep safe leadeeth me.

Selected.

THE SETTING SUN.

How I love to see thee,
Golden evening sun!
How I love to see thee,
When the day is done.

Sweetly thou reallest
Childhood's joyous days;
Hours when I so fondly
Watched thy evening blaze.

When in tranquil glory
Thou didst sink to rest,
Then what heavenly rapture
Filled my burning breast!

Were it mine thus brightly
Virtue's race to run;
Mine to sleep so sweetly
When my work is done—

Thus I wished in childhood
When I gazed on thee!
Wished my heavenly pathway
Like thine own might be.

Still I love to see thee,
Golden evening sun!
Evermore to see thee,
When the day is done.

Selected.

Lead, kindly light, amid the encircling gloom,
Lead thou me on;
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead thou me on;
Keep thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step's enough for me.

I was not ever thus; nor prayed that thou Shouldst lead me on;
I loved to choose and see my path; but now
Lead thou me on;
I loved the garish day, and, spite of fears,
Pride ruled my will; remember not past years.

So long thy Power has blest me, sure it still Will lead me on
O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone;
And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile!

—John Henry Newman, 1833.

Mary Catlett.—More than one hundred years ago there lived in England a Kentish girl, named Mary Catlett.

She never discovered a planet, or wrote a book, or gave a lecture. I can not find that she ever clamored for her "rights," nor was discontented because she could not fill some great place in the world. But so far as I discover she spent the days spinning flax, and spreading the linen to white on the grass, conserving rose-leaves, and making jam and gooseberry tarts like any other rosy-cheeked English girl. Yet though she did nothing great, and her very name is almost unknown, by simply being a woman, sweet and fair and lovable, she was better than he that taketh a city.

In the next county lived a young man of whom at this time nothing good could be said, excepting that he had a good mother, who tried to train him to be a good boy and a good man. But the seed had been sown among thistles, and the boy was wayward and wicked. He had somehow found out pretty Mary, but, though he must have loved her even then, he loved wild ways better, and drifted off toward all manner of evil.

When no more than nineteen years old he was impressed and carried off to serve on a man-of-war. He managed soon to escape, but was caught and treated with great severity, so that he was glad to be exchanged into an African trader, and from that hired himself out as a slave-trader in the island of Benanoes, off the African coast. Here he lived for several years a more wicked life than you can imagine, so that it is said even the savage natives would not stay in his company.

At last his father sent for him to go home, but only one thought persuaded him. This was the memory of Mary Catlett. Silent and unconscious, she had the power to draw that rough, hardened man to a new life.

He sailed for England, and during the stormy voyage the early lessons his mother taught him came back to his remembrance, and stirred his heart. The next year he was married to Mary Catlett, and afterward became the friend of the Wesleys, and a minister. He lived a long and good life, and wrote some of our sweetest hymns.

The man was John Newton, the friend of the poet Cowper.

For "The Friend."

Undraped Paintings and Statuary—"The Fine Arts."

The allusion made to the above subject in one of the late numbers of "The Friend," has induced the query in the mind of the writer, especially upon consideration of the glaring excess to which in some instances it is carried, whether the cultivation or indulgence of the taste in what are termed "The Fine Arts," is at all compatible with that higher, spiritual, and heavenly taste becoming a strictly virtuous, chaste, and worthy follower of an immaculate Saviour? This divests the vanities and excesses of the world of their beguiling attractiveness, and causes the Christian to estimate the most specious and beautiful works "given by art and man's device," if tarnished by want of modesty, as little better than the labors of such as "hatch cockatrice eggs and weave the spider's web." Paul, the learned, the great Apostle, no doubt had a mind that, when in the renowned city of Athens, was fully capable of admiring and appreciating these things; but instead of taking thought by way of admiration of them, how was his spirit stirred in him when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry! How moved he was at their ignorance, superstition and wickedness! How strictly he carried out into consistent practice his own apostolic advice to his beloved Timothy: "Be not a partaker of other men's sins: Keep thyself pure."

Painting and sculpture existed among the Greeks from time immemorial. These were, at first, almost exclusively of a public character, intended for the moral and religious improvement of the people, or as an incentive to noble deeds. When they ceased to be influenced by this patriotic purpose, they began to decline. Many of the early artistic designs are in a sitting or kneeling posture, and always clothed with draperies of the simplest character, frequently falling straight to the ground without folds. Praxiteles is historically described as "unsurpassed" in representing in statuary, like Titian in painting, "the softer beauties of the human form." One of his statues is said to have been "a master-piece of sensual charms;" and he, likewise, was the first artist that ventured to carve his ideal entirely divested of drapery. This perversion was deservedly considered to violate true taste and propriety, as it unquestionably does that delicate refinement, that amiable modesty which is such engaging and lovely characteristics of our sister sex, as well as so becoming the Christian character.

Our readers are mostly, no doubt, familiar with the suggestive verse:—

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien,
That to be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Is it not to be feared that some in this day have, imperceptibly, grown so familiar with this "vice," from seeing it in its more refined forms and from being tolerant of what is termed "the gracefulness and skill" exhibited by elaborate artists, that that which was at first deemed indelicate and even "hated," has, through complaisance and too much freedom from religious restraint, grown to be "endured," "pitied," and "embraced" by some who have in their dwellings paintings and statuary which should cause modesty to blush; and which may have an influence upon young persons and upon society in general inconceivably prejudicial to the formation of a pure taste, as well as to their preservation and growth in morality and virtue.

Satan weaves his webs with such mastery art and skill, and such are the enchantments with which both sexes are surrounded as devoted admirers of "The Fine Arts," in the present day of overgrown liberty, that it may well call forth from the heart the reverently breathed petition, "Lead us not into temptation;" and, also, the no less forcible injunction of the Saviour, "Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." The true Christian is a follower of Christ; and must be a stranger and pilgrim upon earth. Whatever may be the enticements to evil, whatever the captivating idolatries of a world that lieth in wickedness, every candidate for heaven must either renounce these; or, dreadful alternative, renounce Him who declared, "No man can serve two masters." If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. And "The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life are not of the Father, but of the world."

The enormous price paid for these "graceful, symmetrical and elegant" artistic labors, over and above their evil tendencies, is another serious objection to them; especially at a time when there are so many up and down in the land almost wholly destitute not only of the comforts but the necessities of life. Can any lavish of that wealth for which, with all other of Heaven's gifts they are accountable stewards, on their own personal and sensuous gratification, when so much good might be done in helping to establish schools, to found hospitals, or in feeding the poor, clothing the naked, and in administering to the sick and afflicted? "Who made thee to differ from another," might well be the soliloquy of each of us, "and what hast thou that thou dost not receive" from the bountiful hand of an omniscient and just Judge to whom thou owest all, and who will require a strict and faithful account for the use or abuse of all.

In conclusion, the writer hopes to be excused for attempting to expose or, at least, to call attention to some evils or unsafe examples, which, having the sanction of the rich, intelligent and amiable, are likely to spread and increase; but he trusts to be borne with while honestly pleading for a chastity and modesty which, by "the grave matrons of yore" used to be considered in the light of a virtue, though now, perhaps, more regarded as a narrow-minded, unfeeling prejudice.

Be this as it may, custom can never reconcile things wrong with things that are right; neither can popular sentiment justify any ignoring tried and safe landmarks, or in laying waste the foundations of social propriety and moral and religious restraint. K. C.
8th mo. 18th.

Storm at the Signal Station, Mount Washington

Noticing that the sides of the summit were strewn with boards, beams, and debris of sorts, my guide explained that what I saw was the result of the great January gale which had demolished the large shed used for an engine-house, scattering the loose fragments far and wide. I begged him to give me his recollection of it.

"During the forenoon preceding the gale we observed nothing unusual; but the clouds kept sinking and sinking until the summit was quite above them."

"By nine in the evening the wind had increased to one hundred miles an hour, with heavy sleet. At midnight the velocity of the storm was one hundred and twenty miles an hour, and the exposed thermometer recorded twenty-four degrees below zero. When the stove red, we could hardly get it above freezing inside the house. Water froze wit in three feet of the fire—in fact, where you are now sitting."

"At this time the noise outside was deafening. About one o'clock the wind rose to one hundred and fifty miles. It was now blowing a hurricane. The wind, gathering up all the loose ice of the mountains, dashed it again the house with one continued roar. I heard wondering how long the building would stand this, when all at once came a crash. — shouted to me to get up, but I had tumbled on on hearing the glass go. You see I was dressed to keep myself warm in bed."

"Our united efforts were hardly equal to closing the storm shutters from the inside but we finally succeeded, though the light went out when the wind came in, and we worked in the dark."

"He rose to show me how the shutters, thick oak, were first secured by an iron bar and secondly by strong wooden buttons firmly screwed in the window-frame."

"We had scarcely done this," resumed Doyle, "and were shivering over the fire when a heavy gust of wind again burst on the shutters, as easily as if they had never been fastened at all. We sprang to our feet. After a hard tussle we again secured the windows by nailing a cleat to the floor, against which one end of a board was fixed, using it other end as a lever. You understand?"

"Well, even then it was all we could do to force the shutters back into place. But we did it. We had to do it."

"The rest of the night was passed in momentary expectation, that the building would be blown into Tuckerman's, and with it. At four o'clock in the morning the wind registered one hundred and eighty miles. It had shifted then from east to north-east. From this time it steadily fell to two miles, at nine o'clock. This was the biggest blow any one ever experienced on the mountain."

"Suppose the house had gone, and the hotel stood fast, could you have effected entrance into the hotel?" I asked.

"We could not have faced the gale?"

"Not for a hundred feet? nor in a matter of life and death?"

"Impossible. The wind would have lifted from our feet like bags of wool. We would have been dashed against the rocks, & smashed like egg-shells," was the quiet reply.

"And so for some hours you expected to sweep into eternity?"

"We did what we could. Each wrapped oneself in blankets and quilts, binding those tightly around him with ropes, to which were attached bars of iron, so if the house rent by the board we might stand a chance of a slim one—of anchoring somewhere, somehow."

Somewhere, indeed!—S. A. Drake, in Harvard Magazine.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Secular vs. Religious Education.—An annual tribulation of four thousand handsomely bound copies of the Scriptures is made in London to the London Board school-children who have shown the greatest proficiency in scriptural knowledge.

The distribution this year was made at the Crystal Palace in the presence of a large assemblage of people. The Bishop of Manchester, in addressing the assembly, mentioned in the reports of the examiners showed at a very great majority of the parents of the children at these schools desired that their children should receive religious instruction. In face of this desire on the part of the parents, he thought no theorist had a right to interpose an objection and say that the children should only receive secular instruction.

It spoke of the responsibility involved in sending out into the world children possessed of quick wits, strong desires, vague ambitions, but without the restraining influence of conscience, and without a knowledge of God or of Christ.

This responsibility is certainly a serious one; and, although the "restraining influence of conscience" and "the fear of God" may be said to exist independently of any instruction received at school, yet it is very desirable that all the influences that can be thrown around the young in the critical period of their lives when their characters are being made, should tend to promote their love of God, and to imbue them with the spirit of the Redeemer.

Profession vs. Practice.—The London Baptist publishes the following from "the walls of a building in Lubeck." "It is just such an appeal as we may all 'read, mark, learn and inwardly digest.'"

"You call me Master—and you do not ask my will."

"You call me Light—and you see me not."

"You call me the Road—and follow me not."

"You call me Life—and you desire me not."

"You call me Wise—and imitate me not."

"You call me Good—and love me not."

"You call me Rich—and from me ask nothing."

"You call me Eternal—and yet do not seek me."

"You call me Merciful—but do not trust in me."

"You call me Noble—but do not serve me."

"You call me All-Powerful—but do not honor me."

You call me Just—and do not fear me."

When I condemn you, therefore—blame me not for it."

Romanism.—At Rome, Father Curci's new book, condemned by the Inquisition, has had a sale of seven thousand copies—a remarkable occurrence in Italy. It is said that the Pope has consented to the condemnation of the book. It treats of the decay of the Church and of religion in Italy, condemns the attempt to restore the temporal power of the Papacy, and counsels the Church to adapt itself to the life of the times.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Cistern Water.—An examination of the purity of the water in various cisterns was made at the instance of the Board of Health of Cincinnati, which shows more foreign ingredients in it than some may have suspected. Five cisterns examined, which were all underground cisterns, cemented with lime, and filled from the roofs of dwelling houses, all showed traces of organic matter, some of them to such an extent as rendered their contents unfit for drinking or culinary purposes. Part of the contaminating materials were derived from drainage from the surface or neighboring sink wells, and a want of care and cleanliness.

But the report states that it must not be forgotten that the air near the surface of the earth is pervaded with soluble gases which are absorbed by the rain as it falls, and that soot and dust and other impurities are constantly falling on the roofs of the buildings which collect the rainfall for the supply of the cisterns. These sources of corruption are often increased by the ventilating pipes of sewers and water-closets carrying up fetid gases and deleterious solids; and by the organic dust and germs floating in the air ready to produce decomposition under the stimulating presence of water.

The Sanitary Committee of Cincinnati suggest that all cisterns should be repeatedly and thoroughly cleansed, and that the water should be drawn from them by means of buckets, chain-pumps or such other means as will introduce plenty of fresh air into the water. In addition to this, care is needed as to the cleanliness of all the surroundings, and especially that the cisterns be so placed that there shall be no danger of any drainage into them from the ground or neighboring sinks or wells.

Ozoniferous Plants.—Oxygen in that particular state called ozone possesses very active disinfecting powers. It is supposed that some plants aid in producing ozone, and thus assist in the destruction, through its influence, of disease-breeding germs in the air. On this theory are explained the anti-malarial powers of the Australian Eucalyptus which has been planted for this purpose in many unhealthy localities. To the same ozone-producing power is ascribed the comparative freedom from malaria of sections in which pine trees abound. Among the plants which have at different times been regarded as contributing to the healthfulness of the country are aromatic and balsamic herbs, Camomile, Feverfew, Sweet Bay, and odoriferous plants such as are cultivated for the essential oils they produce. The pond weeds and some other water plants are said to have a similar action on the disease germs in the water.

On the other hand, there are some plants which in large quantities are thought to be unfavorable to health, as the Oleander, Daphne, Pride of China, &c.

Microscopic Test for Poisons.—An exceedingly delicate test for strychnia and other organic poisons is found in their action on the minute animalcules present in stagnant waters. If a drop of water containing infusoria is placed on the glass slide of a microscope, and a drop of the fluid containing the organic poison placed at its edge, the infusoria will be instantaneously destroyed. Professor Rossbach, who has published an article on this subject, says: That one fifteen-millionth of a grain of atropine can thus be detected.

Elephants' Milk.—Dr. Doreman has made an analysis of the milk from the elephant Hebe, which on the 10th of 3d mo., 1880, gave birth to a calf.

To obtain the milk was a matter of some difficulty, as the calf was constantly sucking, nursing two or three times an hour. The specimens seemed watery, but yielded more cream than the milk from an Alderney cow.

The milk was pleasant in flavor and odor, and in quality equal to that of cows. It must contain considerable nourishment, since the calf had increased in weight about seven hundred pounds in a year on a milk diet.

Fish Plagues in the Gulf of Mexico.—At different times there have been areas of poisoned waters causing the death of the fish in different parts of the Gulf of Mexico. They are described as strips of greenish discolored water, strongly marked by numbers of dead sponges and fish floating in it.

One of these fish plagues occurred in the fall of last year. An observer at Egmont Key first saw the dead fish as the tide came in on the 17th of 10th mo. There were thousands of small fish four or five inches long. On succeeding days other species were found to be affected. From the 25th of 10th mo. to the 10th of 11th mo. was the worst time, and the stench was so bad that it was impossible to remain on the beach.

Rye-Roots in Ice.—D. J. Benner, of Gettysburg, Pa., in a letter to the Scientific American, says: "On removing a thick bed of ice from the wall [of an ice house] between which and the ice there was a package of rye straw, I found a large number of the grains, with their rootlets penetrating the solid, clear ice in various directions."

Ants as Fruit-growers' friends.—Many of the cultivators of Northern Italy and Southern Germany establish ant hills in their orchards as a protection to the fruit crop. The ants largely feed on the insects which are destructive to the tender shoots of the trees.

Beetles in Wool.—A French entomologist asserts that the wool of different countries can be distinguished in market by the beetles which frequent the bales. He has identified 47 species in Australian wool; 52 in South African wool; 30 in South American wool; 16 in Spanish, and 6 in Russian wool.—Sci. American.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 10, 1881.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The condition of President Garfield has not materially changed in the last few days.

The parotid abscess continues to improve, but the wound remains the same. Preparations for his removal to Long Branch are complete, and it is expected the journey will be completed in a few days.

The report from the Signal Service Office in this city, gives the mean temperature for Eighth month, 75 degrees; highest temperature 99, and lowest 50 degrees. Total rainfall 1.18 inches. Prevailing direction of the wind, southwest. In Washington, the month was warmer than the same month for fifty years, and the rainfall less than for ten years. During the past week there have been rains in a few sections of country, but in most parts the severe drought continues. In Virginia the corn and tobacco crops are said to be "burnt up" in many counties, and the James river is lower than it has been for fifty years.

A peculiarly destructive thunder storm is reported from Olean, New York, on the 3rd inst. By a single electric flash, four houses and five barns, besides several smaller buildings, were set on fire and destroyed, and several persons were injured by the shock.

The City Controller of New York gives the total funded debt of that city as $135,100,997, while the securities and cash in the sinking fund for its redemption amount to $55,700,932, leaving a net funded indebtedness of $99,399,974. The total assessed valuation of real and personal estate is $1,151,540,000, and the City Controller's statement for last month shows a decrease of $14,181,221.

A new elevator of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, at Baltimore, recently finished, will add 1,800,000 bushels to the storage capacity of that city.

The work of dredging the mouth of the Delaware river, between Georgetown and Trenton, with a view of making it navigable for steamboats, is now being done under direction of Colonel Wm. Ludlow, of the U. S. engineers.

The forest fires in Northwestern Pennsylvania and Western New York continue very destructive to timber, the crops and other works. The damage is estimated as high as $2,500,000. Several persons have been burned to death, and others severely injured by the flames. In Ottawa Valley, Canada, about sixty families have been burned out, and the loss on property is estimated at $500,000.

The mint coinage for the past month amounted to 1,950,000 pieces, valued at $5,565,500. There were coined 424,000 eagles, 76,000 half eagles, 900,000 silver dollars, and 4,550,000 cents.

The mortality in this city for the week ending on the 3d inst., was 37, or 1.54 per cent. of the population. The week of 78 from the same period last year. Of the whole number 182 were adults and 193 children—96 being under one year of age.

Markets.—U. S. Bonds, 31 per cent, registered, 101½; 4½s, 112½; 113s, 113; 4s, registered, 115; 115½; do. coupon, 116 a 116½.

Cotton.—There was no essential change in notices in price or demand; sales of middlings are reported at 12½ a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white at 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in moderate request and very firm; sales of 2600 barrels, including Minnesota extra, at $6.75 a $7.00; and at $7.75 a $7.50 for straight Pennsylvania extra family at $7 a $7.25; western do. do. at $7.25 a $7.60, and patents at $7.50 a $7.75. Rye flour is in small supply and firm at $6 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is unsettled and lower. Sales of 4000 bushels Delaware red, track and offat, at $1.41 a $1.41½. At the open board 70,000 bushels sold at $1.44 a $1.44½. Rye and corn, wanted for Pennsylvania. Corn is moderately active, but is lower for option. Sales of 9000 bushels, including yellow, at 73 cts.; mixed at 72 cts.; steamer at 72 cts.; No. 3 at 71½ cts., and rejected at 71 a 71½ cts. Oats were quiet. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including white, at 52 a 53 cts., and rejected and offat at 51 a 52 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—Loads of hay, 292; loads of straw, 64. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; Straw, 85 to 95 cents.

Extra cattle were scarce and in demand at an advance, but the lower grades were dull and weak; 3500 head of beef and mutton at the different yards at 3 a 3½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were dull and lower: 16,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand at full prices; 3900 head sold at the different yards at 8½ a 10 cts., per lb., the latter rate for extra Chicago.

FOREIGN.—The weather in Great Britain continues unfavorable for saving their grain. In some sections the oats and barley sheaves still stand in pools of water.

The court of inquiry, at Plymouth, in the case of the disaster to the ship "Herald," has admitted the captain and officers of all blame. In the opinion of the court, the first explosion was caused by gas evolved in the coal-bunkers, into which a light had probably been introduced for purposes of examination.

Bradburgh has issued a fresh manifesto to the English nation, in which he intimates his intention to go to the House of Commons again at the next session of Parliament, and asking them to protect him against unlawful violence.

The British Board of Trade has decided to appoint a committee to consider the project for the construction of a tunnel under the channel between England and France.

The Union Mail Steamer Teuton, has been wrecked near Quoin Point, on the southeastern coast of Africa. She had on board 147 passengers and a crew of 80 persons, but few of whom are known to have been saved. The state of affairs in North Africa appears to be growing worse, and active preparations are being made in France for the despatch of more troops. A correspondent at Tunis, who personally visited the scene of hostilities, shows that General Corneil was really captured, and he is now in the hands of the Arabs.

Arabs and feared that his whole party would be cut off, as they were running short of ammunition. During the retreat General Corneil was perpetually attacked by swarms of Arabs, who were, fortunately, under no regular organization, or they might have caused serious damage. The river of the Nile, near Khartoum, is in critical condition as the Arabs, aided by their success against General Corneil, are surrounding it. Even the road from Bizerta to Tunis is becoming unsafe.

A despatch from Marseilles states that General Colville, who was sent from Macheria on account of a lack of troops and scarcity of provisions.

The steamer Wymong, from Liverpool the 3d inst., for New York, took out 550 Mormons for Great Salt Lake from Great Britain, Switzerland and Germany, the two latter countries contributing over 200. Including the foregoing, more than 1000 Mormons have left Liverpool this summer. Another contingent will go before the season closes.

A Constantinople correspondent says: "Germans and Englishmen interested in the welfare of the Jews, have set a movement afoot to obtain a grant of land in Syria from the Porte for allotment to Jews desiring to emigrate from countries where they are now subject to persecution. A delegate is now here trying to secure the Porte's approval. The Sultan favors the scheme."

A despatch from Naples, dated the 4th, says that Vesuvius is in a lively state of eruption, sending streams of lava down the northern slopes.

An arrival from Honolulu reports that the island of Hilo, Sandwich Islands, was in danger of being overwhelmed by lava from the volcano Mauna Loa. The lava was moving at the rate of a sixteenth of a mile daily, and was slowly advancing on the town of Hilo, which would shortly be overwhelmed. The authorities are endeavoring to restrain the people, who were fleeing from the approaching destruction.

FRIENDS' SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second-day, Ninth mo., 1881.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is invited to them. The terms are moderate, and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the next term under the care of John H. Dillingham and Mary Woolman, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, and of the models and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

The Primary Schools on Seventh St., on Cherry St., and at Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Teachers of the schools, or to

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Edward Sharpless, N. J., $2.10, vo 55; from William H. Brown, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from Sarah S. Bacon, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Margaret W. Warrington, $2.10, vol. 55; from Stephen Hodgkins, $2.10, vol. 55; from Mary D. Maris, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from Caleb Webster, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from T. Chalkley Palmer, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from R. E. Reeve, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Levi Varney, Canada, $2.10, vol. 55; and for Mary E. Jones, William Valentin and William Branson, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from J. J. Hopkins, Del., and Lawrence Hopkins, D. C., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Charles Allen, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Richard Wistar, $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph Hall, Agent, Io., for Abraham Cowgill, James Francis John Oliphant, Pearson Hall, Harris Penn, Edward A. Dickinson, Samuel H. Harris, Israel Head, John A. Heald, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John E. Baldwin and Mary Ann Baldwin, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55; for Hannah Flanagan, City, $2.10, vol. 55, and for James F. Meloney, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Eliza Wilson, O., per Daniel Williams, Agent, $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph Cardman, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua Jefferson, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Ellen Walt, Myk, $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Emmons, Agent, Io., 5 Elwood Spencer, Joseph Edgerton, Thomas Warrington, Lemuel Bracker, Jonathan Briggs, and Jesse R. Garwood, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from John H. Spence, $2.10, vol. 55; from Susan S. Canby, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Sarah B. Darnell, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Elizabeth Stapler, Mary Ann Spencer, a Mary D. Malone, Del., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Daniel Paeker, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Clement Ogden, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Rebecca Hutton, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from John H. Bullinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Matlack, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from William Archet, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Russel Taber, Io., $2.10, vol. 55; from Hetty Ann Bellah, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; from James H. Moon, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and Martha B. Taylor, $2.10, vol. 55; from Maria C. Odell, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from Daniel Koll, O., $2.10, vol. 55; for Elijah Kester, Md., $2.10, vol. 55; from Matilda Hodgson, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from Anna Warrington, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Curtis H. Warrington and T. Francis Warrington, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Josiah W. Cloud, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from John H. Lippincott, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Eshe H. Griffen, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from William Berry, Gtn., $2.10, vol. 55; from Hannah Hutton, Myk, $2.10, vol. 55; from John M. Sheppard, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; for Phoebe Contant, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Pelata Gove, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from John Atkins, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from John A. Brown, $2.10, vol. 55; from Asenath H. Clayton, Canada, $2.10, vol. 55; from George Sharpless, Agent, Pa., for Maria Pusey, Mary Margaret Maule, J. Borton Hayes, Isaac Good, Robert W. Lewis, Joshua Sharpless, and Mary Ann Chamberlain, and Lydia Sharpless, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from C. Canby Balderston, Thomas K. Brown, Wm. W. Deewes, Charles Potts, Edwin Tharp, and Richard W. Hutton, Westtown B. School, $2 each, vol. 55; from Mary Ann Moore, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from Edwin Whiteacre, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua Brantingham, Agent, O., for Joseph W. Winder, $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles H. Benjamin, Jr., Coppock Nathan Whitney, Joseph Straton, Ellen Straton, Joshua Coppock, Mary L. Test, Alfred Brantingham and William Brantingham, $2.10 each, vol. 55, and William G. Coppock, Io., $4.20, to No. 52, vol. 55.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning, will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

EVENING SCHOOL FOR ADULT COLORED PERSONS.

Teachers are wanted for Men's and Women's departments of this school, to be opened about the first-Tenth month. Apply to

Thomas Elkinton, 400 S. Ninth St., Phil
Thomas Woolman, 558 Marshall St., "
Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, "
Finley Hutton, 502 Marshall St., "

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house on Arch St. Philadelphia, 5th mo. 12th, 1881, HENRY M., son of Josiah F. Jones of Germantown, to LYDIA L., daughter of Samuel H. Roberts, of the former place.

DIED, at his residence in Moorestown, on the 27th 7th mo. 1881, WILLIAM MATLACK, in the 75th year of his age, a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 17, 1881.

NO. 6.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Geikie's Life and Words of Christ.

(Continued from page 24.)

At the time of the birth of our Saviour, the Jewish people were earnestly looking for Messiah, whom they expected to be a great prince who should raise the Jews to the height of political power. Geikie says:—

"The central and dominant characteristic of the teaching of the Rabbis was the certainty of a great national Deliverer—the Messiah, or Anointed of God, or in the Greek translation of the title, the Christ. In no other nation than the Jews has such a conception ever taken such root, or shown such vitality. From the times of their great national troubles, under their later kings, the words of Moses, David, and the prophets had, been cited as divine promises of a mighty Prince, who should 'restore the kingdom to Israel.' The captivity only deepened the faith in his duly appearing, by increasing the need of it. Their fathers had clamored far distant times of distraction and trouble, for a king, who should be their Messiah, the anointed of God, anointed by prophets. They had bad kings, but had found only a partial good from them. As ages passed, the fascination of the grand Messianic hope grew even more hallowed, and became the dearest passion in the hearts of all, burning and glowing unceasingly, unquenchably, more and more, and irrevocably determining the whole future of the nation.

"For a time Cyrus appeared to realize the promised Deliverer, or at least to be the chosen instrument to prepare the way for him. Zerubbabel became in his turn the anointed of the people. Simon Maccabaeus made high-priest-king only 'until a faithful prophet—the Messiah—should arise.' As glory of their brief independence passed away, and the Roman succeeded the hated Persian as ruler and oppressor, the hope in the Messiah which was to come out of Jacob grew brighter, the darker the night. Deep gloom covered every heart, but it was pierced by the sun of this heavenly confidence. Having present, Israel threw itself on the future, literature, education, politics, began and ended with the great thought of the Messiah, when would He come? What manner of king would He be? The national mind had become so inflammable, long before Christ's day, by constant brooding on this one theme, that any bold spirit, rising in revolt against the Roman power, could find an array of fierce disciples, who trusted that it should be he who would redeem Israel."

"All the prophets, says Rabbi Chojá, 'have prophesied only of the blessedness of the days of the Messiah.' But it was to Daniel especially, with his seeming exactness of dates, that the chief regard was paid. It was generally believed that 'the times' of that prophet pointed to the twentieth year of Herod the Great, and, when that was passed, not to mention other dates, the year 67 of our reckoning was thought the period, and then the year 135; the war which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem rising from the one calculation, and the tremendous insurrection under Hadrian from the other.

"With a few the conception of the Messiah's kingdom was pure and lofty. The hearts of such as Zacharias, Elizabeth, Mary, Anna, Simeon, and John the Baptist, realized more or less the need of the redemption of the nation from its spiritual corruption as the first necessity. This grander conception had been slowly forming in the minds of the more religious. But the prevailing idea of the Rabbis and the people alike, in Christ's day, was, that the Messiah would be simply a great prince, who should found a kingdom of unmatchable splendor. Nor was the idea of his heavenly origin at all universal; almost all fancied he would be only a human hero, who should lead them to victory.

"It was agreed among the Rabbis that his birth-place must be Bethlehem, and that he must rise from the tribe of Judah. It was believed that he would not know that he was the Messiah, till Elias came, accompanied by other prophets and anointed him. 'Till then he would be hidden from the people, living unknown among them. The better Rabbis taught that the sins of the nation had kept him from appearing, and that, 'if the Jews repented for one day, he would come.' He was first to appear in Galilee; for, as the ten tribes had first suffered, they should be first visited. He was to free Israel by force of arms and subdue the world under it. 'How beautiful,' says the Jerusalem Targum, 'is the King Messiah, who springs from the house of Judah! He girds his loins and descends and orders the battle against his enemies, and slays their kings and their chief captains; there is no one so mighty as to stand before him. He makes the mountains red with the blood of his slaughtered foes; his robes, dyed in their blood, are like the skins of the purple grapes.' 'The beasts of the field will feed for twelve months on the flesh of the slain, and the birds of the air will feed on them for seven years.' 'The Lord,' says the Targum, 'will revenge us on the hands of Gog. At that hour will the power of the nations be broken; they will be like a ship whose tackling is torn away, and whose mast is sprung, so that the sail can no longer be set on it. Then will Israel divide the treasures of the nations among them—a great store of booty and riches, so that, if there be the lame and blind among them, even they will have their share. The heathen will then turn to the Lord and walk in his light.'

"The universal kingdom thus founded was to be an earthly paradise for the Jews. In that day, say the Rabbis, there will be a handful of corn on the top of the mountains, and the stalks will be like palm trees or yillars. Nor will it be any trouble to reap it, for God will send a wind from his chambers, which will blow down the white flour from the ears. One corn of wheat will be as large as the two kidneys of the hugest ox. All the trees will bear continually. A single grape will load a wagon or a ship, and when it is brought to the house, they will draw wine from it as from a cask.

"A great king must have a great capital, and hence, Jerusalem, the capital of the Messiah's kingdom, will be very glorious. In this splendid city, the Messiah is to reign over a people who shall all be prophets. A fruitful stream will break forth from the Temple and water the land, its banks shaded by trees laden with the richest fruits. No sickness or defect will be known. There will be no such thing as a lame man, or any blind or leprosy; the dumb will speak and the deaf hear. It will be a triumphal millennium of national pride, glory and enjoyment.

"It was to a people, drunk with the vision of such outward felicity and political greatness, under a world-conquering Messiah, that Jesus Christ came, with his utterly opposite doctrines of the aim and nature of the Messiah and his kingdom. Only here and there was a soul with any higher or purer thoughts than such gross material and narrow dreams."

"So firmly fixed was this idea of the outward and visible nature of Christ's kingdom, that it appears to have been very difficult even for the apostles, who were the immediate followers of our Lord, to rid themselves of it, and to appreciate the spiritual nature of the religion taught by their Master. The people who were cured of their diseases by his word or touch; thousands of whom were fed to the full by a few loaves and fishes blessed by Him, and broken by his hands; and who had known of his wondrous power and mighty acts; were ready enough to follow Him as an earthly prince, and would doubtless have flocked in multitudes to his standard, if He had proclaimed a 'holy war,' and called upon them to drive the Roman forces from Judea. But when they found that his kingdom was to be established through submission to suffering and even death; that reproach and persecution and wait awaited his disciples, instead of the glory and pomp of an outward monarchy; that it was indispensably necessary to be born again—to know a change of heart—in order to enter among his subjects; all but a few forsook Him, and no longer walked with Him.

It may be doubted whether the apostles themselves fully realized the nature of Christ's kingdom till they received the wonderful baptism of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. Under that Divine and heavenly influence no doubt their minds were enlarged and their mental and spiritual eyes opened to understand the mysteries of Redeeming Grace in a manner far superior to what they had known in the earlier years of their companionship with the blessed Saviour of men, when He led them about and instructed them as they were able to receive the truths that fell from his lips.

(To be concluded.)

The Samaritan Passover on Gerizim.

BY H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

(Concluded from page 36.)

The service of worship must continue until actual sundown. As it went on, arrangements were in progress for the sacrifice. The lambs were carefully examined separately by an assistant of the high-priest, to see that they were ceremonially worthy—"without blemish." The unleavened bread and bitter herbs were brought in on a straw mat, or platter, and laid before the high-priest. When the sunlight on the temple-site above him showed that sunset was just at hand, the high-priest stepped on to the stone bench which had been his reading-desk, and looked intently toward the west, watching the sun for its slow dipping in the blue waters of the Mediterranean beyond the Plain of Sharon. He was still reciting the story of the first passover, and the people were intoning with him more earnestly than before. The seven lambs were led by attendants to the place of sacrifice, around the caldron-fire, and held firmly there—without a single bleating cry. The flashing knives for their slaughter were tested by the attendants. The interest in the service was intensified moment by moment.

At precisely sundown—"between the two evenings"—the high-priest gave the signal for the sacrifice by repeating the words of the original command to Moses (Exod. 12: 6), "And the whole assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel shall kill it in the evening." Instantly two persons at each lamb struggled for the privilege of killing the lamb. The high-priest was at his desk, some thirty or forty feet from the place of sacrifice, where the other men were already gathered. Throwing off his silken surplice, he sprang to the place of slaughter, and so quick and agile was he that he killed four of the seven lambs himself. The lambs were thrown on their sides, and their throats cut with a single stroke—nearly severing the head from the body. The spurting blood was caught in basins, and the children's foreheads were marked with it—a straight line up and down between the eyes. The tents also were at once sprinkled with the fresh blood, above their entrance way. At the bloody sight of the slaughtered lambs, some of the children, who had borne a part in the service up to this point so heartily, began to sob and cry aloud, which added to the excitement of the strange scene. Then came an outburst of general rejoicing and mutual congratulations. It was "the beginning of months" to that people—a new-year's service of thanksgiving. All embraced one another most heartily, kissing on the cheek again and again, except in the case of the high-priest and of the more venerable patriarchs, whose hands instead of their cheeks were kissed by all. It was a scene of unmistakable delight in the memories and privileges and hopes of the hour. Then it was that the startled children could say to their parents, "What mean ye by this service?" and the glad-hearted parents could answer them, "It is the sacrifice of the Lord's passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses (Exod. 12: 26, 27)."

And now the slaughtered lambs were to be made ready for the oven. Sealding water was thrown on them, to loosen their fleeces. They were not skinned, but the wool was pulled from them by busy fingers, hot water being added from time to time as was needed. Then the lambs were opened, their entrails were taken out, and these together with their wool and the right foreleg of each, which belongs to the priest, were laid on the fire and burned. The prepared lambs were each run through lengthwise by a sharpened stake or spit, of from eight to ten feet long. All this took about an hour and a half from the time of slaying. Meanwhile, as before, the enclosure where the services were in progress was sacredly guarded from the intrusion of strangers, although outside observers were permitted to approach the low wall, or even to stand upon it, and watch the ceremonies.

At a new signal from the high-priest, the seven spit-roasted lambs were borne from the place of sacrifice to the place of roasting, and arranged around the oven, at the bottom of which the fire was burning brightly. Again brief services of prayer and recitation were intoned, and at another signal the seven lambs were lifted and simultaneously thrust into the oven, the sharp stakes being forced into the oven-bottom to hold them upright. A grating, or hurdle, of green twigs was laid over the oven-mouth, fresh fonges were laid over this, and earth heaped above all as an effectual cover. There the lambs were left to roast, for three hours and a half to four hours.

The high-priest, meanwhile, retired to his spacious tent, and we were courteously welcomed there as his guests. He gave us of the "bitter herbs," leaves of a kind of dandelion, to taste; for a foreigner may share the bitterness of the passover feast, while he can have no taste of the paschal lamb. While the high-priest and many others rested in their tents, there were those who watched and worshipped outside. Some did not leave the sacred enclosure, but continued there, facing the temple-site, and praying demonstratively. All who were to partake of the passover must have fasted since the day before, until they partook first of the unleavened bread and bitter herbs after the new year was fairly ushered in.

Suddenly, just before midnight, there was a cry that the lambs were now ready; and all who had rested in their tents were quickly astir. Then there was a hurrying from the tents to the place of assembling. The high-priest was now clad in a plain white robe, fastened about the waist with a coarse girdle, with slippers on his feet and a long staff in his hand. All who joined him were similarly clad. Heavy clouds had gathered, the sky was wholly overcast, and rain was falling. At the still-closed oven there was a brief service of worship, in the flickering light of the still-burning sacrificial fire. The earth was removed from the oven's cover, and the hurdle itself lifted off. All signs of fire were gone, and the oven's mouth was as dark as the night. One by one the stakes were up lifted, and the roast meat was stripped from them into large straw mats or baskets at hand for the purpose. Portions of meat had fallen to the oven bottom. These must be rescued that nothing of it might be lost. One man after another was lowered by his fellows in the heated oven, to gather up as much of it as he could in the few seconds he could exist there. At length all was taken out, and was fairly in the baskets. These baskets were carried within the hollowed enclosure, and laid in a line not far from the place of sacrifice. On either side of them the people took their places for a share in the feast.

At this moment there was a lull in the storm. The clouds broke away, and the full moon shone out on that weird scene on the summit of Gerizim. There crouched the girded and shod pilgrims,—not standing in olden time, but sitting or crouching in oriental style,—the last surviving celebrants of the sacrificial feast which Moses instituted at the command of God, on that memorable night of deliverance from the angel of death in the land of Egypt, more than thirty centuries ago. The whole story of the passover seemed never so real before. The men ate it haste. Portions were taken to the women in their tents. Whatever remained of the lamb—meat or bone—was carefully gathered up and burned in the fire. "Ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; and that which remaineth until the morning ye shall burn with fire."

And in the early morning, in the renewed storm of rain and hail, we found our way down the slope of Gerizim to our tents at its western base, with a new sense of the truth that "the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things can never with these sacrifices which the [have] offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect"—"a shadow of things to come; but the body is Christ,"—S. S. Times.

Selected for "The Friend."

A Learned Man's View of Human Learning.

Though I am no enemy to the acquisition of useful knowledge, I have seen many instances of young men who have been much hurt by what they expected to reap advantage from. They have gone to the school or college, humble, peaceable, teachable and respectful but have come out self-wise, dogmatical, serious, and full of a prudence founded upon the false maxims of the world. I have been ready to address them with that line of Milton

"If thou art he—But ah! how fallen!"

These attainments, like riches, are attended with their peculiar temptations; and unless they are under the regulation of a sound judgment, and spiritual frame of mind, will prove like Saul's armor to David, rather cumber some than useful.

Learning, though it is useful when we know how to make a right use of it, yet, considered in its own power, and to those who trust in it, without seeking a superior guidance, is usually the source of perplexity, strife, and cism, and infidelity. The favor of God is the one thing needful, which no outward advantages can compensate the want of; and the right knowledge of Him is the one thing needful, which no human teaching can communicate. Moreover, those whom He teaches are always increasing in knowledge, both of themselves and of Him.

Human learning tends to feed and exalt itself to make a person something in his own eyes. This we are prone enough to by nature. An increase of unsanctified knowledge adds fuel to the fire. None cast a more daring or public slight upon the requisitions of Holy Scripture than some who are admired and applauded on account of their knowledge and learning.—John Newton.

For "The Friend."

Bondage of Sin.

We, as natural men, but while under the wrings of light from the Spirit, groan because of the bondage of sin, and long to be set free and enjoy "the glorious liberty of the children of God." We groan within ourselves, waiting and longing for the adoption into the family of the redeemed. Yea, the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until this time is witnessed. And it has been pain and "sorrow" ever since the ground was cursed for the transgression man; the spirit of evil strives to bear rule in opposition to the spirit of good. And we come servants unto whatsoever power we are sold ourselves servants to obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness. "For of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he also brought into bondage." We are either in the bonds of the gospel or the bonds of iniquity.

"He alone is free that's free from sin, and he is fastest bound that's bound therein."

Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin." Have we known the truth, and has the truth made us free from the bondage of sin? Or after having known the truth, have we become entangled again with the yoke of bondage? Have we overcome the world? Or do we overcome by the world, and imperceptibly conformed to its religions and ways? We have "the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, which is not of the Father but of the world" that lies in wickedness, been crucified and slain?

Paul had got to where he could say: "I fight in the law of God after the inward man." And although he, in common with others, had been one of the children of wrath, and had found a law in him, warring against the law of God in his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin and death, so that he could cry out in the bitterness of soul: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Yet in mercy, found one who alone can enable to break the bondage of sin, and witness overcoming, so as to joyfully say with him, in another place, "thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord." We would then also experience, he did, "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, to set us free from the law of sin and death." And it is then, and only then, that we shall be delivered from the body of sin and death which we, by nature, are carrying out with us, and under the weight of which we groan and from which we long to be delivered, waiting for the adoption and redemption of body and soul and spirit, so as to be made "meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." Now what we want and what we most need, in order to facilitate our journey heavenward, is repentance towards God, and more faith in our Lord Jesus Christ—more faith and trust in Him who came to finish transgression and make an end of sin, by taking away the sins of the world out of the heart, and bringing in an everlasting righteousness into every individual soul.

And by being more obedient to the teachings of Him, and having less faith in the wisdom and teachings of men, we should, in his own time, find his grace and power to be sufficient, in co-operation with the strength and light that He would willingly give us, to open our eyes spiritually, so that we might see our sinful condition, and the bondage we are in under it, and break every yoke, and let the oppressed soul go free. Yes, we want to have every yoke broken that binds us to the gratifications of a sinful world; whether it be in the indulgence of the intoxicating cup, or any other sin that so easily besets us; we want them all taken away through the assisting grace of Him who came as the Lamb of God to take away the sins of the world.

"That they are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts." And they "glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto them and they unto the world." We may, like Simon, wish to purchase the gift of the Holy Spirit by some easier way than through the cross, and while we are yet in "the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity." Spiritual death is the wages which we receive for sinful indulgences; and if continued in, the bondage will become stronger and stronger; and eventually separate us "from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

Finally, "if we do well shall we not be accepted? and if we do not well, sin lieth at the door." And if the bonds of iniquity are not broken, it will forever remain there as a bar to our entrance into the mansions of purity, where nothing that defileth can ever come. And while I believe that "the abomination which maketh desolate," has got a welcome seat in high places, I also believe that we have a living remnant left, who have broken the bonds of sin, and who, if they continue to "abide the day of his coming," will, as the three Hebrew sufferers, "come forth" as from a seven-fold heat in the furnace of affliction. And "my heart's desire and prayer to God for our Israel is," that this number may be increased. Wherefore let us "lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees; and make straight paths for our feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed."

The same power that delivered Israel of old, from servitude and bondage; and from the captivity of Babylon; is able to deliver his chosen children now from the bondage of sin, and from the Babylonish captivity and oppression under which our true spiritual Israel now groans and longs to be delivered. When the Lord shall turn again the captivity of his people, the true wrestling seed of Jacob will rejoice, and our poor tempest-tossed Israel be glad. But I fear it may be truly said of many, that "the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed," &c. May the Lord assist them in opening their eyes, and turning from darkness to light, is the prayer of an aged Friend.

D. H.
Dublin, Ind, 8th mo. 1881.

Ellen Evans.

(Continued from page 35.)

For "The Friend."

The 29th of the 1st mo. 1754.

My dear friend John Pemberton,—The sorrowful account of the death of so worthy, so honorable a parent as thine was, must needs sensibly affect thee. Mayest thou be favored with strength (as the day is, says one, so shall thy strength be) to bear thy present close baptism acceptably; so shall this cloud, which is of the Lord's sending, rain fitness and fruitfully thy soul and cause it to bring crops more abundant than it has heretofore done to God's glory, thy own comfort and benefit of the Church. Let not, dear young friend, thy tender heart be overmuch grieved that thy worthy father had not the pleasure of beholding thee with his eyes before he closed them, but let it suffice that the eyes of his soul saw thee, and thereby thou became his joy in the Lord. When the news of his death flew through the land, it seemed as if a box of precious ointment had been shed, yielding a most fragrant smell. When good men die their virtues quicken in the mind of the people. I conceive some hope (dull as the times are) that there are even of the youth, that lay the loss the Church sustains by the removal of this just man, to heart. A youth feelingly said, no man's countenance did him so much good as his; those beautiful lines,—so legible was the true index of his mind, the company of saints so much his delight on earth (that his house was their hospital) that at length with wings took sudden flight to heaven, where uninterrupted union with God and spirits of just men, is enjoyed. Left his truly valuable family and friends all clad in mourning, may we so mourn as to be worthy to receive the oil of joy. My husband writes, therefore shall say less. My love to thy good companion and other good friends which have some knowledge of us. Farewell dear Johnny.

Thy real friend, ELLEN EVANS.

To Rachel Pemberton, 1754.

My Dear Friend,—I behold thy tears, hear thee moan (like that of a turtle dove that lost her mate) for the husband of thy youth; to bear the separating bone from bone, flesh from flesh, must needs be a very close trial to those especially who were so nearly united, even like twins in soul, which seemed much the case of thine and precious spouse; but alas! the best, the choicest of all temporal favors are only benefits, blessings just lent us during the pleasure of our bounteous benefactor; could we, would we, be so wise as to consider them as such, we should quietly and calmly resign to God his own, whenever He was pleased to call them from us. Thy loss, dear and tender friend, we all know is very great, but is it to be compared to the great benefit he obtained by the exchanging that weak, frail, mortal body, which was attended with many infirmities, for a glorious immortal one? He rests from his labors and his good works (which were many) follow him—doubtless is well in the Lord. What remains now, dear Rachel, for thee but with that pious matron Anna, get into the temple, there spend the remainder of thy days in fasting and prayer night and day. It's most probable thee will not want (for) visitors at these times—that of the best sort too. It's good when one friend drops in after another, to retire and spend some time in waiting upon God, that so thee may witness renewing of strength. Such little opportunities will set well upon thy mind when the company withdraws; the sick love stillness, such in mind art thou now. Elijah's mind was so closely engaged, when the Lord was about taking his master from off his head, that he could not be asked any questions; no, not by the sons of the prophet. I must break off abruptly, the bearer is just turning off; farewell.

Thy truly sympathizing friend,
ELLEN EVANS.

Do tell my friends I love them, and can even from hence see all clad in mourning.

Ellen Evans to Israel Pemberton.

Fifth-day, 7 o'clock, 30th of 9th mo. 1756.

My Dear Friend,—One William Thomas, a Baptist teacher of good repute, who built a meeting-house at his own charge, and preaches gratis in it, came to our meeting last Third-day, expressed to some Friends whom he called aside, viz: that it was cause of rejoicing to him to hear that some of our friends had purposed to contribute a certain sum of money in order to make peace with the Indians; imitating the peaceable Christian disposition of the famous first founders of this thriving colony, to whose worthy memory he professed the greatest regard; wished with all his heart their honest endeavors would be attended with good success, and that for his part he had done what he could to persuade those of his congregation to follow the Quakers' example in that respect, but none would join him; and applying to me, as I was the relic of one whom he dearly loved and whom he visited in his sickness, beseeching me to let those Friends know who were most concerned in this weighty affair, that they strengthen their hands. Go on and prosper in the wish, says he, of the Baptist preacher. Nothing could have extorted these lines from me at such a time as this* but the singular regard he always bore my worthy spouse. Think of me, my dear friends, when it is best with you. Farewell. ELLEN EVANS.

Relaxation—Amusement.

I think many things which custom pleads for will be excluded from a suitability to a Christian, for this one reason, that they are not consistent with the simplest notion of the redemption of time. It is generally said, we need relaxation; I allow it in a sense; the Lord himself has provided it; and because our spirits are too weak to be always on the wing in meditation and prayer, He has appointed to all men, from the king downwards something to do in a secular way. The poor are to labor, the rich are not exempted from some equivalent. And when every thing of this sort in each person's situation is properly attended to, I apprehend, if the heart be alive and in a right state, spiritual concerns will present themselves, as affording the noblest, the sweetest, and most interesting relaxation from the cares and business of life; as in the other hand, that business will be the best relaxation and unbending of the mind from religious exercises; and between the two, perhaps there ought to be but little more leisure time. A life in this sense, divided between God and the world, is desirable; when one part of it is spent in retirement, seeking after and conversing with Him whom our souls love; and the other part of it employed in active services for the good of our family, friends, the church, and society, for his sake. Every hour which does not fall in with one or other of these views, excepting the season needed for sleep, I apprehend is lost time.

The places and amusements which the world frequent and admire, where occasions and temptations to sin are cultivated, where the law of what is called good breeding is the only law which may not be violated with impunity, where sinful passions are provoked and indulged, where the fear of God is so little known or regarded, that those who do fear Him must hold their tongues, though they should hear his name blasphemed, can hardly be a Christian's voluntary chosen ground. Yet I fear these characters will apply to every kind of polite amusement or assembly in the kingdom.—John Newton.

THE NATION'S SUSPENSE.

All the thrilling wires were trembling
With their messages of grief,
Bearing to the startled millions
Tidings of their rostrated chief;
Till from ocean unto ocean,
Flashing with the lightning's speed,
Every hamlet, every hearthstone
Heard the foul assassin's deed.

And as poised upon the balance
Hangs the chance for life or death,
Fifty million souls are waiting,
Listening with bated breath:
Men of strength and courage fall,
Women weep and children cry,
And from every household altar
Fervent prayers ascend on high.

From ten thousand sanctuaries,
With their throngs in supplication bent,
Floats to God the aspiration,
"Save our noble President!"
Ne'er suspense so deep and painful
Hovered in the shuddering air,
Ne'er before the listening heavens
Heard such universal prayer.

'Mid the fertile fields and valleys
Of his own fair native State,
On the wild hills of New England
Tearful, prayerful thoughts wait;
And the Mississippi heaving
Seaward his resistless tide,
Hears a murmur of bewailing
From his prairies wild and wide.

And beyond the rocky summits
Of the white Sierra's crest,
Rich with sympathy and pity
Beats the strong pulse of the West;
Blending with their mountain echoes
To the Nation's cry of pain,
Swell the calm Pacific's chorus,
Taking up the sad refrain.

From the lovely sun-kissed valleys,
From the orange-shaded homes
Of the South, a thrilling murmur
Full of love and pity comes;
For the great heart of the nation
By its nobler instincts bound,
With the suffering of its chief in Beats in sympathy profound.
Oh the sympathy of sorrow!
Oh the charity of love!
Lifting up our better nature
All our grosser selves above,
Making manhood seem more Christlike
Through the ministries they bring,
Stealing o'er us like the shadow
Of an angel's shining wing.

Blending with our human nature
Thoughts and feelings half Divine,
As within their worldly setting
Heavenly genes of kindness shine;
And our kindred ties grow stronger
As our hopes and prayers are blent,
In the overshadowing sorrow
Round our wounded President.

Columbia, O.

J. E.

Selected.

SWEET HOME.

Look at that pretty hammock swung
The boughs among;
In it beneath a feathery breast
Young orioles in sheltered rest
Toss safely between grass and sky.
With the elm's soft whisper for lullaby.
They, even of the countenance of air,
Have their home there.

On wooded plain or rough hill-side
The foxes hide.

Under the rocks and roots of trees
Are wrought their cunning galleries,
Where they can lie and hear the sound
Of thwarted hunter and baffled hound.
To rest in from the panting race
A fitting place.

But when the Son of man on earth,
Of lowly birth,
Came with Love's gospel to mankind,
To cure the sick and heal the blind,
And even to raise to life the dead,
He had not where to lay his head.
No door to enter, no field to reap,
No pillow to sleep.

Think of his lonely sorrowing years—
Think of his tears!
Think how even the bird or beast,
From the greatest down to the very least,
Had sense of comfort and peace somewhere,
Either in burrow or water or air;
Yet was there neither roof nor bed
For his dear head.

So sweet the mere word "home," 'tis even
One name for health;
And the many mansions there that stand
With open door, that the weary hand
Need not so much as knock, express,
That He knew all of homelessness.
So has He promised rest and home
To all who come!

From "The Anti-Slavery Reporter," 6th mo. 19th.

Death of Gessi Pasha.

In our issue of March last, we reported terrible sufferings endured by Gessi Pasha and his followers in the Bahr Gazette, while they were shut in for months by the impassable "Sudd" of those waters. For a description of this extraordinary growth of weeds we are indebted to Colonel Gordon's notebook, where it is thus described:—

"The Sudd. I have spoken of the opening of the 'sudd.' You know that the Nile comes out of Albert Nyanza Lake. Below Gondokoro it spreads out into lakes; on the edge of these lakes, an aquatic plant, with root extending five feet into the water, flourishes. The natives burn the top parts, when dry the ashes form mould, and fresh grasses grow till it becomes like terra firma. The Nile rises, and floats out the masses; they come down to a curve, and then stop. More of these islands float down, and at last the river is blocked. Though under them the water flows, no communication can take place; they bridge the river for several miles. In year the Governor went up, and with his companies and two steamers he cut large blocks of the vegetation away. At last, at night, the water burst the remaining part and swept down on the vessels, dragged the steamers down some four miles, and clear to passage. The Governor says the scene was terrible. The hippopotamuses were carried down, screaming and snorting; crocodiles were whirled round and round, and the river was covered with dead and dying hippopotamuses, crocodiles, and fish which had been crushed by the mass. One hippopotamus was carried against the bows of the steamer and killed; one crocodile, twenty-five feet long, was also killed. The Governor, who was in the marsh, had to go five miles on a raft to get to his steamer. "You can scarcely imagine the advantage of this opening to me: I took people eighteen months and two years ago to Gondokoro from here, and now it is but twenty-one days in the steamer."—Colon Gordon in Central Africa.

* Her valued husband, Jno. Evans, had deceased just one week previous: a short account of whom may follow these letters.

The sudd had again formed and become penetrable when Gessi Pasha was caught in massive folds at the end of last year, in a steamer only 40 horse-power, which ought never to have been sent into the dangerous windings of the Bahr Gazettele.

We quote from The Times of 16th May a short notice of this remarkable man, which is truly a sad and touching history.

"A correspondent writes:—Gessi Pasha, a tried friend and coadjutor of Colonel Gordon in the Soudan, has fallen a sacrifice to his zeal in the cause of humanity. He died the 30th of April, in the French hospital at Suez, after protracted sufferings, caused the terrible privations endured in the months of November and December last, when he was shut in by an impassable barrier of weeds in the Bahr Gazettele River, Upper Egypt. It will be remembered that under his command a small army of black Soudanese hunters hunted down the slave-dealers of that district, and rooted out the slave-trade for a while. But the experiences of his return northwards must have been even more terrible to him than those of his long, harassing campaign against the slavers and their armed bands. He started in a steamer towing a fulla of rafts and boats, with a caravan of some 500 people, soldiers, and others, last September. They had food enough for the ordinary journey; but the expedition was completely blocked by the sudd, the vegetable growth of the Nile, which in extreme tropical climates converts the river into a vast impenetrable marsh, and stops all traffic as completely as the ice does in a northern river. After losing more than 400 of his followers on hunger, and being himself reduced to a skeleton, the remainder of his men, who had been driven to feed upon the corpses of their companions, were rescued and brought to port. Gessi's reception by Raout Pasha, successor of Colonel Gordon, was by no means a generous one, and Gessi was on his way to Cairo to lay his case before the Khedive when death overtook him at Suez. The Italian Count Penazzi, and another Italian officer, were assiduous in their attention to the hunger and fever-stricken soldier, but no ill could restore the strength that had been severely tried in the impenetrable weeds of the Upper Nile. He has left a wife and family dependent for their support upon the generosity of the Egyptian Government, which certainly owes much to Gessi Pasha. In him the natives of the Soudan have lost their truest friend, and the Khedive a faithful servant."

The luxury of luxuries is that of doing good.

Is Wine Drinking a Necessity in Social Life?

Extract of a letter written by Lady MacDonald, wife of Sir John MacDonald, Premier of Canada, to a co-laborer and correspondent of Savannah, Ga.:

"I was myself led to give up wine drinking after some reflection, suddenly, at last, on Christmas day, 1867. I had thought a good deal on the subject, but never made any decided resolution until this day, when at dinner with a large party, the conversation turned on Total Abstinence, one of our guests, himself a strictly temperate man holding high office in our country (then and now) said that practically total abstinence was impossible for any one in society. I said laughingly, 'What a dreadful statement; I quite differ from you.' He took me up warmly, and several joined in, all without exception agreeing with him in saying that the requirements of modern society were such that no one could be so singular as to become teetotal without being more or less ridiculous, and that the fatigues, excitement, and wear and tear of political society life especially, made the use of wine, in great moderation of course, absolutely a necessity. I entered the lists, scarcely knowing why, and declared I did not believe this theory. At last the question was pressed more closely. My friend, who had begun it, said that he did not believe even 'you, yourself, Lady MacDonald, could or would give up your glass of sherry at dinner.'"

"I asked 'why not?' And he went over with great force and clearness all the specious and dangerous arguments that are urged in support of drinking wine in moderation, ending with the remark that in Sir John's public position my being a total abstainer would do him great harm politically. This seemed too monstrous, so I said (emptying my half glass of sherry into the finger glass as I did so) 'Well, I will try; henceforward I enter the ranks of the total abstainers, and drink to our success in water.' Since then, thank God, I have never found any necessity for wine. In health I can do my life's work without any aid from dangerous stimulants; in sickness I have invariably and positively refused to touch it. My life is a very busy one: I have sometimes, for weeks together, days of constant occupation and nights almost all sitting up. Politics are exciting and fatiguing, and every temptation to try stimulants is to be found in the late nights of listening to anxious debates, and the constant necessity of being 'up to the mark' late and early. I have had a great deal of nursing to do with a delicate husband and child, and this often during our busiest 'society season'; and yet I have never sought strength from wine at any single moment, and my health is far better than that of so many friends who 'take a glass of wine, or a little beer just to give them a little strength.' Thus I give you my experience, as far as it goes to show, that stimulant is not necessary in the station of life where it is unfortunately most commonly used. So far as mental and bodily fatigue goes I have tested the possibility of doing without stimulant to the fullest extent, in long anxious hours over sick beds, in sudden disaster, in long watchings and journeys where food was uninviting, and in many fatiguing and very uncongenial society claims."

"When I told my husband my decision, and that our friend had said that it would hurt his prospects politically, Sir John answered with a laugh, 'Oh, I will risk the prospects; you can be a total abstainer if you like.' My example can and ought to help many similarly situated. My husband's long public career and position only second to that of the Governor-General, the Marquis of Lorne, makes our family a prominent one in Canada."

An Ancient Love-letter.

Mary Meteyard of East Hamburg, Erie Co., N. Y., contributes the following letter to the Woman's Journal. It was written by a relative of hers, who resided at Chesterfield, England.

"Copy of a letter to Katherine Frost at her father's house at Buddington, Yorkshire, England:

"Chesterfield, 14th of 4th month, 1701.

Dear Katherine: Blessed be the Lord and fountain of mercies, I am got well home and found things well, mother having been better than for some time before. I am bowed down this time in a sense of that great concern I laid before thee; the Lord help us both to give it its due weight in the balance of his sanctuary, and put out that eye that could look at anything save the honor of his name and the performance of his will. I believe thou dwells nearer the golden sceptre than I can approach; pray thee fail not to wrestle with Him for a clear discovery of his mind, for I believe He wants to do us good. Ah! I am sensible whatever we may propose to ourselves, without we have his blessing it will prove a bitter cup in the end. My secret breathing is to the Lord, many a time, that who He appoints may be the woman for my helpmeet, and not only person whom, but time when, which I am still freely willing, as far as I know, to leave to his disposal, and I hope He will not suffer the great adversary to deceive me. Pray thee whatever the Lord makes known to thee in this concern, be as true as Samuel was to Eli; tell me every whit. Some persons if they will not equivocate are apt to evade, but I hope better things of thee. I hope thou wilt be furnished with a few lines for me by the next post, which will be very acceptable. Not finding much to add at present save that in sincerity I love thee, and hope in that love that will never decay; the Lord will preserve us in it, that however He is pleased to dispose of us here, our souls may ascend together into his everlasting rest and peace, when time to us shall be no more. Dear love to thy father and all honest friends, from thy hearty and well-wishing friend,

JOSEPH STORRS.

Two Ways of Conquering.—The writer recently met an intelligent gentleman, a German, who had spent some time in South Africa, and who remarked: "If Lord Beaconsfield had not tried to force the Transvaal, it would soon have come in, and would have wanted to be annexed to the British Dominions. But Lord Beaconsfield wanted to do a brilliant thing; and the result was the war and the indefinite postponement of the result."

In fact, there are two ways of conquering. The stronger may conquer the weaker by force; or the stronger may without force make it at once the interest and the wish of the weaker to be united with the stronger. France has for forty years been trying the first method in the North of Africa; as the result, she holds Algeria nominally, at the expense of no one knows how much treasure and life; but it is not easy to see wherein she is in the slightest degree benefited. Untaught by the past, she has commenced a new experiment in Tunis, no doubt to be followed by similar results. It looks just now as though France was likely to have a war on her hands with all the Mohammedan tribes in North Africa. A thousandth part of the cost might have made Algeria and Tunis friendly to France, and opened the door for her products, and prepared the way for a peaceful union in time.—Nat. Bapt.

A Prayer Heard.

On a pleasantly situated country-seat not far from the little town of B— lived L—, a very worthy Christian man. On a stormy harvest evening a loud knocking was heard at the outer door of this peaceful house. The servant hurried to answer it, opened the door, and saw standing on the door-steps two uncommonly tall men, who handed him a letter, and said with an insolent air, "Give this writing to your master, and bring us an answer as quickly as possible; we will wait for it. But look sharp!"

The servant was not a little amazed at the big strangers and their imperious manner, but promised to obey their orders, and come back as soon as possible. He hurried to the sitting-room and delivered the letter, but remained waiting in order to read in his master's countenance what all this could mean, and what might be the contents of the ominous letter. The mother, too, and the children surrounded the father, and felt not a little anxious when they saw how pale the master of the house became as he read the missive.

"We have a letter here," he began, "the contents of which are far from pleasant. But, my love, banish all fear; for in this case, too, we can say, 'If God be for us, who can be against us?' Arm yourself with courage, and I will read the letter to you:

"Sir: The leader of a numerous band stands before your house with the positive demand that you shall, before break of day, deposit 20,000 thalers, (£3000) at the gate of your garden. In case of refusal, your beautiful house will this night be given to the flames.

THE LEADER."

"Oh, thou God in Heaven!" sighed the mother, when her husband had finished reading. The children went in great alarm, and the servants, who all had by this time gathered together, trembled as if they heard the crackling of the flames; only the father was again quite calm. After a little reflection he wrote:

"Sir: Your imperious command deserves a decided answer. I will not comply with your requisition. If it should be according to the counsel of God's will that my house should be a prey to the flames, I hope to be able to say, 'Lord, thy will be done!' only it is certain that you have no power to accomplish this; God is almighty; but whatever godless designs you may have determined on, He reigns.

Yours, L—."

At this moment there was again a loud knocking at the outer door, and the servant hastened to take his master's letter to the strangers. They read the writing by the aid of a dark lantern, and in a tone of the utmost menace called out to the servant, "A friendly greeting to your master; we shall soon present our thanks to him in person." With these words they hastened away.

When the servant returned to the sitting-room the master barred all in, and then said, "Let us kneel down and pray to that powerful One without whose will can no hair fall from our heads."

All obeyed, and followed with deep devotion their master's words of entreaty, as he commended himself and his household to the care of his God of strength. They were words that came from the depth of his believing heart, and they could not be unheard. All rose up strengthened, and now awaited their time of severe trial, with their eyes toward the Lord.

"Let us now wait courageously, and see what the Lord will bring us," said L—. "Whatever He sends is good, and He will not let us wait for strength: has He not said, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee?' so that we may boldly say, 'The Lord is my helper; I will not fear what man shall do unto me!'"

Midnight has just struck. They could not go to the little town for help, because it was too far off, and they feared to meet the robbers on the way. The great bell, which they could generally use to call together the neighbors in case of any unexpected emergency that required their help, had been sent to the town a few days before to be repaired. In short, it was as if God would show them that from Him alone help should come. The wind howled from time to time with great violence around the solitary dwelling, and it appeared as if the storm would increase the coming terrors of the night.

About two o'clock in the morning loud peals announced a severe thunder-storm. Soon one flash of lightning followed another with great rapidity, accompanied with loud resounding thunder. If any one could have observed the little family now, they would have seen that they all appeared more calm. One danger seemed to have chased the other from their minds, and none of them thought any more of the robbers and their threats.

Then suddenly a bright flash of lightning zigzagged through the air; a fearful crack followed instantaneously, so that all the windows rattled.

"The lightning has struck!" cried one of the servants. "See, see, the bay-shed is burning!"

It was true, and soon they saw the building of which he spoke in flames; it was a bappy thing that it stood far enough off to prevent any danger of the house catching from it. That clap of thunder was the last. With distant mutterings the storm died away, and the wind calmed down. But still they did not venture to go out, for fear of the robbers. After a quarter of an hour had elapsed a sound was heard outside, and soon they could distinguish the well-known voices of neighbors whom the sight of the flames had called together to help extinguish the fire. Now L— and his family hurried out to the burning building. But imagine their astonishment—still unconsumed by the flames, there lay at a little distance the body of a man, in whom the house servant recognized one of the strangers who had the evening before given him the letter of which we have spoken. It was, in fact, the much-feared robber-chief, who had been struck by the lightning at the very moment when he was approaching to execute his cruel and desperate purpose of setting fire to the house. There he lay, a corpse, forsaken by his companion in evil, who had fled as soon as they saw their leader fall.

The fire was soon quenched by the help of kind neighbors, and L— related the remarkable circumstances to them. Deep astonishment seized them all.

When they went to carry away the dead man they found a paper on him which put them on the track of the other miscreant who had, for a long time, made the neighborhood insecure.

Thus had the Almighty made evident that it is to Him a light matter to bring to nothing the purposes of men.—Cor. of the British Messenger.

Some of us think that we have a good deal to bear; that our peculiar trials are a little harder than anybody else's; but now and then we have a glimpse of another's suffering, which shows how little we have ever known of real endurance in trial. Here is a note of thanks from Chloe Lankton, which ought to move some of us to feelings of tenderness toward her in her need, and of gratitude toward God for our lot. Twenty-two years ago, when The Sunday School Times was first started, the case of Chloe Lankton, as patient Christian sufferer, who had lain on a bed of pain for then a quarter of a century was attracting attention through her memoir published by the American Sunday-School Union. Mention of her case in these columns brought contributions for her comfort, and were duly acknowledged and forwarded. And in all the many changes of these changed years she has remained a patient sufferer on that bed of languishing, and the contribution for her relief have been coming hither and going hence to her. Her latest note of thank is as follows:

New Hartford, Conn., July 21, 1881.

My dear friend: Your note with the check for $15 is received. Again I thank you for all the dear friends for this kind gift. My heart overflows with gratitude to them for all the kindness that I have received from them in years past. They have added much to my comfort, God bless them! I still live and suffer the same as usual, sometimes much worse than others. God still sustains me under all my heavy trials. It is forty-eight years this month since I have been entirely confined to this bed of pain and weakness. Jesus only knows what I have endured. I feel resigned to the will of God, I will trust Him to the end. Many, very many thanks to you all.

Your grateful, loving friend,

CHLOE LANKTON.

Nearly half a century of torturing pain, helpless weakness, of slow decaying life, and thanking God at that!—S. S. Times.

Nothing so hinders our knowledge of God and our enjoyment of him as sin, and no life is more unpleasant than that of the man who tries to enjoy worldly and spiritual things, and enjoys neither. He takes the bonds of Christianity without its blessings. He bears the cross without the strength which would make it light. He is like a boat without speed enough to give steerage, or like a way of the sea driven of the wind and tossed. He dwells on middle ground between two conading armies, spoiled of his enjoyment by e and of his rest by the other.

"Remind Me of the King."—LaFontaine, chaplain of the Prussian army, once preached a very earnest and eloquent sermon on the me and folly of yielding to a hasty temper. The next day he was accosted by a major of a regiment with the words:

"Well, sir! I think you made use of the prerogatives of your office to give me some very sharp bits, yesterday."

"I certainly thought of you while I was preparing the sermon," was the answer, "but had no intention of being either personal or impertinent."

"Well, it is of no use," said the major, "I am a hasty temper, and I can not control it. It is impossible."

And still adhering to this opinion, after the further conversation he went away.

The next time, La Fontaine preached upon "deception, and the vain excuses which men are wont to make."

"Why," said he, "a man will declare that it is impossible for him to control his temper, when he very well knows that were the same vocation to happen in the presence of his sovereign, he not only could but would control himself entirely. And yet he dares to say that the continual presence of the King's and the Lord of lords imposes upon him a neither restraint nor fear!"

The next day his friend, the major, again accosted him.

"You were right yesterday, chaplain," he humbly. "Hereafter whenever you see me in danger of falling, remind me of the King!"—Scl.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Church Debt.—A correspondent of the Episcopal Recorder writing from Nova Scotia, speaks of a building for worship which he thought a handsome edifice, but loaded with a very indebtedness. He makes this just comment: "No man has a clear right to erect a rate dwelling which he cannot reasonably expect to pay for; and much less has a congregation the right to build a house for [Divine] worship," with no other prospect than that of groaning beneath the burden to the detriment and crippling of that spiritual work whose promotion in the hearts of men should be the main object of every ecclesiastical organization."

Japan.—It is said that the spread of Christianity among the Japanese people has so roused some of the natives who are opposed to it, that a number of the citizens have organized themselves into a society to resist progress. Each member of this society pledges himself by a solemn oath, never to embrace the Christian faith.

The Hebrew Bible.—The New Testament has been translated into Hebrew, and no less than 784,000 copies, in whole or in part, have been circulated in Hebrew by the British and Foreign Bible Society alone amongst the Jews. Hebrew Sabbath.—There is a movement among the Jews to make the First Day of the week their Sabbath. One of the congregations has decided to hold service on that day. The Jews protest, however, that the Sabbath is to be on the 7th day of the week.

The Oldest Translation of the Bible.—What is regarded as the oldest translation of the Bible?" we have been asked. The oldest translation or version in any language of which there is a record, is the Septuagint, written in Greek, and prepared in the city of Alexandria, in Egypt, about B. C. 286-280. It is said that the oldest known copy of this version is written on thin vellum, and contains the whole Bible, and that it is dated in the Fifth century, and is now in the British Museum.—Christian World.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 17, 1881.

We have received a communication from the Treasurer of the Sanitarium Association of Philadelphia, requesting the insertion in our columns of an appeal for aid in sustaining the Sanitarium located at Point Airy, Windmill Island, in the Delaware river opposite the city.

The Annual Report showed that last year 30,256 persons were received and cared for at the institution without expense to the recipients; and the number during the present season is said to have increased.

The charity is mainly designed for the use of sick infants and children, and their caretakers; and we believe has been instrumental in saving the lives of many, by furnishing to such the opportunity of spending the hot portions of the day in a cool and breezy position, surrounded by the waters and fresh air of the river.

From memoranda furnished by two women Friends who recently visited the island, the following information is gleaned: "Point Airy Sanitarium is reached by steamer Rockland, from Pier 22, below Pine St., Philada. The Sanitarium opens 6th mo. 1st, closing at the end of 9th month. The present season is the third year of its existence. The largest attendance for any one day this season amounted to more than 1000, the lowest being about 125."

"The buildings consist of a lodging-house, a kitchen, and bath-houses for the boys and girls. A tin cup of soup, prepared from fresh beef and vegetables, with three crackers, is given to each child at 12 M. Beef tea is also made, and as cases of need present, this with milk and cracked ice are administered according to the judgment of those in charge. A physician is daily on the premises, leaving the city in the first boat, and returning at the close of the day. The lodging-house, as it might be called, consists of a long room in the middle, on each side of which is a row of beds; some little ones, and cribs for the children, and some of usual size for the mothers. The children cannot remain over night without their mothers."

"The order among the children is generally good, when disagreements arise they soon subside after a few kind words of correction from some one of the caretakers. The children frequently go with their elder sisters. The gate is closed, except on arrival and departure of boat. The children can obtain a ticket of admission from some one of the Board of Managers, which they present at the gate on entering the premises; and when leaving receive, if desired, a ticket for another time, from an officer in attendance."

"Pillows, carriages and hammocks are given out for the use of the children while there.

Clothing is also given out when that worn on arrival there is past use, either from being worn out or not sufficiently clean. As many of those that go there come from courts and alleys, baths are a very necessary thing. The bathing is generally yielded to without opposition; occasionally, a mother thinks it a reflection on her care of her child that cleansing should be needed, but even such generally soon yield. Some of the mothers appear to be ignorant and some careless in preserving the health of their children: the knowledge they have opportunity of acquiring at this sanitarium must be of use to them."

"There have been some deaths during the season, but these have been such as were almost at the point of death when taken there. There is a small collection of books in one of the rooms, and the managers would gladly have it increased. The matron reported a need of more clothing; the supply of infants' garments is nearly sufficient, but girls' and boys' clothing is much needed, as well as garments for adults."

Contributions may be sent to the Treasurer, Dr. Eugene Wiley, 339 Reid St.; to Bines & Sheaff, 114 South Fourth St., or to any of the managers.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the morning of the 6th instant, President Garfield was taken to Long Branch in the special train provided for the purpose. He left Washington at 6:30 A. M., and was in the Franklyn Cottage at Elberton at 1:30 P. M. During the journey his wants were attended to in the usual manner, and his wound was dressed in the morning at Bay View station, near Baltimore. After reaching Long Branch the fatigue and excitement of the journey told upon the sufferer, and he was restless and feverish for several hours. This condition was followed by an improved condition, and fluctuations between hope and fear have succeeded. The connective tissue of the parotid gland has sloughed away, and now the gland has nearly ceased suppuration. Fears are entertained of a pus cavity in one lung.

On the afternoon of the 11th, Sergeant Mason, of the Second Artillery, when relieving the guard at the jail in Washington, looking for him through the window of the cell, and came near killing him. The ball grazed the assassin's head, and lodged in the cell wall. Mason was at once arrested and confined at the Arsenal.

Official despatches received by the War Department state that the Indian outbreak in Arizona is general, and that the Indians have been for several months preparing for war.

Telegrams from London and Shakespeare, Ontario, report a continuance of the drought, which has now lasted for five weeks. The pastures are all burned up, and cattle are dying of thirst. The loss by the fires in Northern and Northwestern Ontario is estimated as high as $1,000,000.

Wood and swamp fires are reported between Rochester and Buffalo, in Western New York.

"Port Huron, Mich., Sept. 11th.—To the American People:—We have to-night returned from the burnt district of Huron and Sanilac counties. We have seen the burnt, disfigured and writhing bodies of men, women and children. Rough board coffins contained the dead, followed to the grave by a few blinded, despairing relatives; crowds of half-starved people at some of the stations, waiting for kindred for days; families and neighbors. We hear of more than two hundred victims already buried, and more charred and bloated bodies are daily discovered. Already more than fifteen hundred families are found to be utterly destitute and homeless. They huddle in barns, in schoolhouses and in their neighbors' houses, some blind, some lame and helpless. Some still wander half-crazed around the ruins of their habitations, vainly seeking their dead; some in speechless agony wringing their hands and refusing to be comforted. More than ten thousand people, who only a week ago occupied happy, comfortable homes, are to-day homeless and homeless sufferers. They are hungry and almost naked when found, and in such numbers and so widely scattered that our best efforts and greatest resources fail to supply their immediate wants. Without speedy aid many will perish and many more will suffer and become exiles. Our people would do their utmost for their relief, but all our resources would fail to meet their necessities.

"We appeal to the charity and generosity of the American people. Send help without delay."

"E. C. Carleton, Mayor of Port Huron and Chairman of the Relief Committee; William Hartshorn, John P. Sargent, Charles Ward, Oliver D. Conger, Charles P. Beck, Peter B. Sanborn."

The sum of $10,000 has already been collected in New York for the relief of the Michigan sufferers, and additional subscriptions are pouring in.

Fires still raged in the woods north of Napanee, Ontario, on Sixth and Seventh days. Many families have been rendered homeless. A thirteen-year-old son of Lester Clark, of Kennebec township, was burned to death in the woods on Sixth-day of last week, while on a visit to a neighbor.

The captain of the steamship Hudson, at New Orleans from New York, reports that on the afternoon of the 5th instant, sixty miles southwest of Frying Pan Shoals, he fell in with the British ship Essex, timber laden, from Pensacola for London. The Essex was dismasted and abandoned; her decks were swept and her stowage gone.

There were 419 deaths in this city last week—185 of whom were 10 years of age or under—52 died of consumption, 33 of marasmus, 21 of cholera infantum, 25 of small pox and 18 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 115; 4's, 101; 4 1/2's, 113; 5's, registered, 115; 6's, 116; currency, 64, 132.

There was no essential change to notice in price of market; sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white at 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 1/4 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flax was firmer held, and there was fair inquiry from the home trade. Sales of superfine at $4.75 a $5; western and Pennsylvania extras, at $5.50 a $6; 200 barrels Minnesota extras, clear, choice, at $6.75 a $7; 300 barrels do. do. straight, at $7 a $7.50; 200 barrels Pennsylvania extra family, good, at $7; 500 barrels do. do. choice, at $7.25; 300 barrels Ohio do. do. choice, at $7.50; 150 barrels Minnesota patents, choice, $8; 200 barrels do. do. high grade, at $8.25; 100 barrels Wisconsin patent at $7.50; 200 barrels winter wheat patents at $7.75, and 900 barrels city mills family on private terms. Rye flour sells at 50 a $5.12 per barrel. Corn, at $1.25; 300 barrels Ohio sales have been reported. Feed was scarce and prices are firm. Sales of four cars winter bar, track, at $23.50 per ton; two of spring do. at $21 a $22 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was firmer. Sales of 6000 bushels No. 2 red at $1.35 a $1.41, as to quality and location; 2000 bushels do. at $1.30; 100 bushels do. at $1.44; 200 bushels do. at $1.41. Rye was scarce and in demand at $1 per bushel. Corn was firmer; about 9500 bushels sold in lots at 70 cts. for yellow, 69 cts. for mixed, 68 cts. for steamer, 68 cts. for No. 3, 68 cts. per bushel for rejected. Oats were unsettled; sales of 10,000 bushels at 49 a 50 cts. and rejected and mixed at 48 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 9th mo. 10th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 180; loads of straw, 47. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.40 to $1.50 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.30 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; straw, 90 cents per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand and prices were a fraction higher; 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 1/2 a 6 1/2 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were dull and lower; 14,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 1/2 a 5 cts., and lambs at 4 a 7 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Hogs were in demand at full prices; 4,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 9 a 10 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The plans for laying the proposed telegraph cable to Iceland have been completed, and the Chinese Madam, who laid many of the submarine Chinese and Japanese cables, says the work will be at once begun. It will start from a point in the north of Scotland, probably at a place called Thurso, and the estimated cost is $1,250,000.

From a parliamentary return recently made of the national debt of Great Britain and Ireland on the last day of 3rd mo. 1881, it appears that the total funded debt is £97,078,520 ($3,545,392,630), to which is to be added terminal annuities amounting to £34,988,435; exchequer bills, £5,162,800; exchequer bonds, £11,270,700; Treasury bills, £5,430,000; deductive to savings banks and friendly societies (11th mo. 20th, 1881), £23,900,541, showing a total of $770,745,002. From certain reductions are to be made—£29,900,000 for loans recoverable, and £3,976,582 for the purchase money for Suez Canal shares, which leave the net total £736,165,420.

The total number of "suspects" now imprisoned in Ireland is one hundred and seventy-five. There is reason to believe that tenacity in the north of Ireland and in other parts of the country are preparing to give the Land bill a fair trial.

Fresh shocks of earthquake have occurred at various parts of the Neapolitan province. Few persons have been killed, but many were injured, and serious damage has been done to property.

A 9th mo. 12th.—A landslide occurred last evening near the village of Elm, in the Canton Glarus. Two hundred persons were killed and thirty houses destroyed.

A meeting between the Emperors of Russia and Germany took place at Danzig on the 9th instant; much importance is attached to the occurrence. The Vienna correspondent of the Times says: The presence of Prince Bismarck and the Russian Foreign Minister, M. Giers, at the meeting of the Emperors, can but confirm the favorable impression caused by the proposed meeting, as it is considered a guarantee that even the few hints which these two statesmen pass together will be spent in the interests of peace and contribute to the consolidation of the political situation.

The National Zeitung affirms that Prince Bismarck, whom the Czar consulted about the condition of Russia, advised exiles and a financial and administrative reform.

Berne, 9th mo. 11th.—A ukase is published ordering, as anticipated, that this year's levy of recruits shall be 212,000, instead of 225,000.

The Jewish World states that Russia is at last taking active steps to suppress vigorously any further outrage on the Jews.

Constantinople, 9th mo. 12th.—In regard to Russia's claim against Turkey for war indemnity, the delegates of the Turkish bondholders remain firm and declare themselves incompetent to treat the question even directly.

A despatch from Cairo says: 4000 soldiers, with 30 pieces of artillery, have surrounded Abdin, the Khedive's residence. They ask for the assembling of the Notables and the dismissal of all the Khedive's Ministers. The troops also demanded a constitution and the increase of the army to 18,000 men. The British Controller went to the palace to confer with the Khedive, and to present the Khedive's letter to the British Consul. Finally the English Consul handed them a decree of the Khedive, accepting their demands and appointing Cherif Pasia President of the Council. The troops then cheered the Khedive and withdrew. It is thought in Cairo that foreign occupation of the country will be found impossible.

La Liberte says: Roustan states that the military occupation of the city of Tunis and some other points has become necessary. He recommends that the French force in the Regency be raised to 120,000.

A despatch from Tunis to the Times says: It is an ominous fact that the Arabs in the disturbed districts have resorted no farms for the coming season, and famine in the regency is therefore inevitable. The French are daily making enormous purchases of land and house property in all directions. Several rich Arabs, including the Prime Minister, are disposing of their estates.

FRIENDS SELECT SCHOOLS.

These schools, under the care of the three Monthly Meetings of Friends in this city, will re-open on Second-day, Ninth mo. 12th, 1881.

A limited number of children will now be admitted who are not members of our religious Society, whose parents may desire to have them educated free from the unnecessary but fashionable accomplishments, too common in many schools at this day.

The attention of Friends residing in the city and its neighborhood is invited to the fact that the trustees are modest and Friends belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, sending children to these schools, (also members), who may find the charges burdensome, can be fully relieved.

The principal schools will open for the new term under the care of John H. Billington and Mary Woodman, as Principals, both successful teachers of many years' experience. Facilities for illustration are afforded by a valuable collection of philosophical and chemical apparatus, minerals, and Auzoux's models of parts of the human system, &c.

The girls' school, on Seventh St., on Cherry St., and the Sixth and Noble Sts., will be continued under their former efficient management.

Further information may be obtained upon application to the Treasurer of the Committee,

JAMES SMEDLEY, No. 415 Market St.

RECEIPTS.

Received from Parker Hall, Agent, for Ezra Embree Kansas, $2.10, vol. 55; for Richard Chambers, Mo., $2.10, vol. 55; from Newell Hoxley, Mass., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Ellison, Mo., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Ballinger, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; for George Wood, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Owen Y. Webster Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from William Balderston, Pa., pe William H. Brown, $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Twining, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; for George B. Chamberlain, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from James L. Kie, Agent, O., for P. D. Dewees, Richard Penrose, Robert Milhous David Masters, Aaron Dewees, Samuel King, and Samuel Fawcett, $2.10 each, vol. 55; for Thomas Ball, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jonathan G. Williams for William Forsythe, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, and for James W. Smith, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from Phileas Y. Smedley, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Richard Mott, Agent, Io., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Mary Willson, Robert W. Hampton, Thomas E. Mott, Thomas Hoyle, Isaac Vernon and Joseph Embree, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph Masters, Kansas, per E. Russell Waring, $2.10, vol. 55; from Jesse Storer, Canada, per Joseph Waring, $2.10, vol. 55; from Owen Evans, Del., $2.10, vol. 55; for Richard M. Chambers, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55, from Henry R. Woodward, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; for Anna Meekeel, N. Y., per Alfred King, Agent, $2.10, vol. 55; from Robert W. Dodson and Joel Newell, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Joseph S. Middleton, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Lewis Embree, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Jonathan Chace, R. I., $2.10, vol. 55, and for Harvey Chace, $2.10, vol. 55, from Richard Hall, Agent, England, 10s., vol. 55, and for William Hall Joseph Hall, Susan Williams, Sarah Pearson, Thomas Williams, Josiah Thilpott, William Walker, Abraham Shield, Martin Liddet, William Wigham, John Little, John H. Walker, Lucy Ercroyd, Richard E. Brockbank, George Prior, Robert Biglands, and George M. Gundry, 10s. each, vol. 55, for Nancy Risdon, $2.10, vol. 55, for Jacob Whigham, 15s., for half per 54 and 55, and for Sarah S. Moss and Thomas Jackson 10s. each, vol. 55, for William Pickett, O., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua T. Ballinger, Agent, Pa. for Samuel S. Jones and Norris J. Scott, $4.20 each, No. 52, vol. 55, for Samuel Worth, Albina B. Carpenter, Phoebe Jacobs, and Lydia Embree, $2.10 each, vol. 55, for Anna Sharpless, $2.10, No. 52, vol. 55, and for John H. Sharpless, $1.50, No. 52, vol. 55; from Philip I. Dunn, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Benjamin Wiggins Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Eliza W. Reeves, City, $2.10, vol. 55; from George B. Allen, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; for Philip Carter, Md., $2.10, vol. 55.

Remittances received after Fourth-day morning, will appear in the Receipts until the following week.

CORRECTIONS.—In the account of Ellen Egan on page 35 of "The Friend," 1st column, 38th line, "humble member," read "honorable member;" in 45th line, for "encourage that motion," read "encourage it motion."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

THE WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, 10th mo. 31st, 1881. Parents and others intending to send pupils are requested to make early application to J. O. Chester Co., or to CHARLES J. ALLE, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

EVENING SCHOOL FOR ADULT COLORED PERSONS.

Teachers are wanted for Men's and Women's departments of this school, to be opened about the first Tenth month. Apply to Thomas Ekin, 400 S. Ninth St., Phila.; Thomas Woodman, 458 Marshall St., " Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine street, " Finley Hutton, 502 Marshall St., "

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE. Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M. A. Applications for admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at her residence, Hamorton, Chester county Pennsylvania, on the 15th of the Ninth month, 18 SARAH T. HARRY, aged 84 years, an esteemed mother and minister of Kennett Monthly Meeting of Friend

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, NINTH MONTH 17, 1881.

NO. 7.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Geikie's Life and Words of Christ.

(Continued from page 42.)

At the time when our Saviour began his teachings, the Pharisees were the most popular and influential class among the people of Israel. They were zealous adherents of the Law of Moses; and to the precepts which it contained their learned teachers and commentators had gradually added an immense multitude of subtle distinctions, and observances and rules growing out of them, which are often referred to in the Scriptures as the traditions of the elders and scribes. Their "righteousness" (so severely condemned by our Saviour) had degenerated into a strict performance of these outward forms, with little reference to the purity of the motives which actuated the heart. The religion of our Saviour was the reverse of this. In his instructions, forms and ceremonies were of no value, but all depended on the change of heart, the perception of the new birth. An irreconcilable animosity was speedily aroused in the Pharisees and their Rabbis towards Him, because the reception of his doctrines must inevitably destroy the reverence with which the people had regarded them, and overthrow or wholly complicated system.

Geikie says, that religion, with them, had become almost wholly a mechanical service, without reference to the heart. A man might be eminently religious in the Pharisaic sense, and yet utterly depraved and immoral. The teaching of the prophets which demanded inward godliness was slighted, and the study their writings almost entirely put aside for that of the legal traditions and of the Law. The desire to define to the smallest detail, at the Law required, had led in the course of ages to a mass of conflicting Rabbinical opinions, which darkened rather than enlightened each command.

As an illustration of the moral worthlessness of their ideas of righteousness, with all their reverence for the Scriptures, he who touched a copy of them was thereby made clean; because the skins, on which the red books were written in those times, might have been those of an unclean beast. Interpretations, expositions and discussions of all kinds were based, not only on every separate word, or on every letter, but even on every comma and semicolon, to create new laws and observances; and where these were not enough, oral traditions, said to have been delivered by God to Moses on Sinai, were invented. These traditions were constantly increased, till at last public schools arose for their study and development; and finally they were collected and preserved in the huge folios of the Talmud.

From the command of Moses to observe the Sabbath as a day of rest, the scribes had elaborated a vast array of prohibitions and injunctions. Lengthened rules were prescribed as to the kinds of knots which might legally be tied or untied on that day. The camel-driver's knot and the sailor's were unlawful. A knot which could be tied with one hand might be undone. A shoe or sandal, a woman's cap, a wine or oil skin, or a flesh-pot might be tied. A piteher at a spring might be tied to the body-sash, but not with a cord.

It was forbidden to write two letters on the Sabbath so they could be read together, unless it was on the dust or sand where the writing did not remain; but one letter might be written on one page of a book and another on a different page.

The quantity of food that might be carried on that day from one place to another must be less in bulk than a dried fig; if of honey, only as much as would anoint a wound; if water, as much as would make eye-salve.

It was forbidden to kindle or extinguish a fire on the Sabbath, to give an emetic, to set a broken bone. If one was buried under ruins, he might be dug for and taken out if alive, but if dead, he was to be left where he was till the day was over. For the toothache, vinegar might be put in the mouth if it was afterwards swallowed, but it must not be spat out again. A sore throat must not be gargled with oil, but the oil might be swallowed. No fomentations, &c., could be put to affected parts of the body; nor was it lawful on that sacred day to kill the troublesome parasites which sometimes infest the body.

In Exodus xvi. 5, it is commanded that food for the Sabbath be prepared on the Sixth-day, no doubt with the design that the servant should have a time of rest as well as her master or mistress. Hence the Rabbis raised the question whether an egg laid by a hen on the Sabbath could be eaten on that day. They decided it in the negative, if the hen was one kept to lay eggs; but if the hen was not kept to lay eggs, but designed for food, then its egg might be eaten.

One of the questions on which the Rabbis developed an almost countless multiplicity of rules, was that of "cleanness" or ceremonial purity and defilement. Uncleaness could be contracted in many ways; among others by vessels used in eating. In hollow dishes of clay or pottery, the inside might become technically unclean but not the outside; for it must be remembered that ceremonial and actual uncleaness had no necessary connection,

As only the inside could become unclean, flat dishes without a rim could not be regarded as having any inside, and so could not contract uncleaness. Broken dishes are clean, but the broken pot is unclean if large enough to hold a pomegranate. A chest or cupboard is clean if one of its feet is broken off. Everything of metal that has a special name may defile, except a door and its appendages.

The rules for purification included a discussion of the various kinds of water, the quantity to be used and the mode of its application; and involved an endless detail of casuistry. "So simple an act as the washing of one's hands before eating entailed the utmost care not to transgress some Rabbinical rule. The water could only be poured from certain kinds of vessels, it must be water of a special kind, only certain persons in certain legal conditions could pour it, and it was a momentous point that the water should be poured neither too far up the arm nor too low towards the hand."

The legal washing of the hands before eating was especially sacred to the Rabbis. "He who neglects hand-washing," says the book Sohar, "deserves to be punished here and hereafter." "He is to be destroyed out of the world, for in hand-washing is contained the secret of the ten commandments." "Three sins bring poverty after them," says the Mischna, "and to slight hand-washing is one." This washing must be done in the morning before touching anything, for evil spirits might have defiled the hands in the night. He who had been out of doors, needed to plunge his hands in water on his return, for he knew not what uncleaness might have been near him in the streets; he might have touched the clothes of a "common man," or of one of lower caste than himself.

The traditions and teachings of the Rabbis were held in high esteem by the Jews generally; and these teachers were themselves regarded with great veneration. It must therefore have been very surprising to the people, when our Saviour set at naught their rules, partook of food with unwashed hands, mingled freely with the common people, even "the publicans and sinners," allowed his disciples to rub out the ears of grain on the Seventh-day of the week, and healed those who were sick, without respecting the Rabbinical prohibitions. And it must have been very humiliating to those high professors to be told that they violated the laws of God by their traditions; and to be publicly arraigned as "blind guides," mere formalists who neglected "the weightier matters of the law," and hypocritical pretenders to holiness.

(To be concluded.)

One of the sweetest passages in the Bible is this: "Underneath are the everlasting arms. What a vivid idea it gives of the divine support. God knows our feebleness. He remembers that we are dust.

For "The Friend."

Westtown.

"Around thee, Westtown, lovely nature wears
A livelier rich; thy health-revering airs
Murmur of joy among thy noble trees;
That seem to hold sweet converse with the breeze;
Each leaf a whisper gives the passing wind,
Which onward flying throws response behind."

Autumn has laid no finger yet to sear;
In lovely freshness all things round appear,
Save where the caterpillar's web is spread,
Where round the branch in many a curious thread.
How beautiful the prospect round appears!
The shower has left the leaves in graceful tears."

A recent visit of a few days to this interesting institution of learning, has revived feelings of deep interest in its prosperity, accompanied by desire that it may continue in the future, as it has been in the past, to be conducted under a religious concern for the promotion of the best interests of the youth of our Society. It was, it is believed, this concern that led to its establishment about the close of the last century, and which it is hoped will ever be held paramount to all other considerations, viz: that of impressing religious truths on the hearts and minds of our young people, so that it may indeed prove to have been good seed sown in good soil, that will bring forth fruit to the praise of the great Husbandman in future years.

At the time of the visit there appeared to be prevailing throughout the large family a comfortable feeling; the new arrangement of Superintendent and Matron and other caretakers taking their meals with the pupils,—the boys and girls on opposite sides of the table—being apparently satisfactory. A suitable time of silence was observed both before and after meals (which was felt to be at times impressive); no improper conduct was noticed, indeed it was a pleasant sight to see relatives seated near together, giving to the occasion somewhat of a home feeling, and it was thought an appearance of innocent happiness was observable on many of the countenances of the children.

The present number of scholars is not nearly so great as is desirable and profitable; it should be borne in mind that the cost of boarding and educating 200, is much less relatively, than 150—which is about the present number. May we not hope that the attendance during next session will be larger: the accommodations are sufficiently comfortable, the food is good, the teachers competent and the surroundings pleasant; it is therefore much to be desired that the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should in an especial manner remember Westtown as a place presenting superior advantages for the religious as well as intellectual improvement of their children; and thus sustain and carry forward a concern that has long been felt by the exercised members of that meeting.

A walk over a considerable portion of the farm that has recently been drained, revealed the fact that the sum of money thus expended has proved to be a good investment, many acres of swampy land, much covered with water and tussocks, have been converted into tillable soil which has already yielded a fair return in good crops of grass, corn, &c. It was noticed, however, that in some places too many trees are growing on the surface near the drain, and fears were felt lest the roots, naturally seeking moisture, would penetrate between the tile and soon fill up the drains, unless the trees are removed.

On returning to the buildings through the boys' woods, we were agreeably surprised to find it intersected with numerous well-kept paths of some four or five feet in width. On trees near by were nailed neatly lettered boards bearing the names of the several walks, such as Serpentine Path, Centre Avenue, Ramble Walk, Sleepy Hollow, &c. We were informed that quite a number of hoes had been provided for the boys, who had evidently used them industriously, as the walks we traversed were clean and inviting. This is as it should be, and it was desired to encourage both teachers and pupils in all such laudable efforts to make Westtown an attractive place of study to which the minds of many may revert in after years with feelings of interest and affection. A donation of fifty shade trees from Fairmount Park Nursery, through Eli K. Price, has been made to the school, to be selected and planted this autumn.* Quite a number of acorns of different kinds, as well as other tree seeds, were received last year from the same source, which were planted and cared for by the late superintendent, who has also encouraged the growth of seedling maples, poplars, &c., in the south woods, thereby ensuring a perpetuity of shade and seclusion in that inviting portion of the grounds.

"As mused our sires and mothers, where to find,
A school of wisdom for the youthful mind,
Where useful knowledge might have ample space,
Yet in its culture leave free room for grace;
Where the scholastic discipline might tend
To meek religion,—high and holy end—
To seeking faith, Hope a picture drew,
And embryo Westtown passed before the view!
No air-built castle, conjured in a night,
To vanish at the rising of the light—
Slowly, as doubts and fears around it cast
A mist of uncertainty, rose its form at last—
Then Scattergood could his belief express,
'This is a vineyard that the Lord will bless!
Ah, He has blessed it! May his gracious care
Through all life's journey its loved inmates share;
May He ne'er weep for these, as when He told Jerusalem's children's fate in days of old.'

8th mo. 1881.

For "The Friend."

On Library and other Literature.

Whilst passing, on a Seventh-day afternoon recently, the well-known building on Fifth street, occupied until two years ago by the Philadelphia Library, I noticed quite a gathering of small boys, young men, and men grown, upon the steps and within the building itself. These people were dealers in the "Sunday papers," and other literature of the unimproving or pernicious sort, and were awaiting their weekly supplies. For, it grieves me to say, this historic building, used so long for the purposes of the library which Benjamin Franklin was mainly instrumental in forming, is now the distributing house where issue weekly millions of pages of very hurtful matter.

Reflecting upon this most unhappy substi-

* Eli K. Price was one of the early students at Westtown (1812), and now at the age of 84 years, his mind (clear and vigorous for that period of life) reverts to the scenes of his boyhood with feelings of interest, which is manifested by his remarks on the substantial manner. The right to dispose of trees from the "Park Nursery" arises from a legacy of $5000 left by André François Michaux, author of "North America Sylva," for the extension and progress of agriculture, and more especially Sylviculture in the United States. This legacy has been placed under the charge of the Park Committee on Trees, of which committee Eli K. Price is chairman, and who are donating trees, &c., to various Public Institutions.

tution, my mind reverted to that period in the life of Franklin—it is exactly 150 years ago—when the idea of a public library for the people of Philadelphia was formed, and the articles of association prepared by the Junto were signed, with high hopes of the possible benefits they were about to confer upon their fellow-citizens. One cannot therefore, suppress the feeling of sorrow and, I may say, of humiliation as well, when remembering Franklin's injunction as to the choice of books—"avoiding everything that could injure the morals of youth"—we the present corporation permitting this building to be made use of by those who are successfully compassing the opposite result.

There is no mistaking the deadly work—deadly to body and soul—directly traceable to very many of these publications, for the annals of our criminal courts now teem with details of the ruin that they work. It may serve the purpose, however, of impressing the seriousness of the evil upon our minds, I add (as a single instance) the self-convicting testimony of a lad of fifteen, who, a few weeks ago, in the city of New York, stabbed and killed a child of eight. He testified: "I went down Catharine street till I reached the gun-store just below Oak, where the boys all stand and talk about the Indians, and scout and things. While I was waiting for Sam, I took out the knife—it was only a common pocket-knife—and opened the blade. Then I went swinging around, showing the boy how to kill Indians, and how Buffalo Bill did it. Well, I was swinging around, when all of a sudden I struck something; the knife was stopped for a second, and then went into something soft. I looked down, and there was the little boy with his hands raised like he was praying, and my knife sticking into his breast."

A serious responsibility, therefore, attaches to those who are placed in the position of administering a trust, beyond a merely good financial exhibit and an appearance of progress and popularity. Examined by this rule, the Public Library of Boston, as has been shown, instead of being a most praiseworthy educational undertaking, had, through a systematic ignoring of the terms of its foundation, become an institution which was multiplying enormously the very evil which its projector had designed to lessen.* Furthermore, if we will receive the dispassionate testimony of some who are specially interested in the success of "Sunday-schools," we will find that out from the professing church itself has issued such a stream of fiction, hungerers as is saddening to contemplate. A writer in the New Englander, a minister, says "Nine-tenths, or more, of the contents of our Sunday-school libraries are 'story books.' Not a few of them are simply nothings, lacking the literary power and intellectual stimulus of a first-class novel, intruding enough religion to make them pass library committee, but read by the children for the sake of the story. It is certainly bad for a child's intellectual development to absorb

* Very recently a committee, appointed by the Boston City Council, has made inquiry into the management of this library. A clergyman who gave his evidence as to the character of the fiction, says he spent several days in a critical examination of the very large number of books in that department, and that he was amazed at the mass of pernicious publications which has been there brought together.

se tales week after week. There are in m, in spite of the fact that they are written for Sunday-schools, some of the merits we condemn in what we rightly call "pernicious literature." There are some of the same false views of life, some of the same experiences of success obtained by luck rather than by hard struggle. There is an "naturalness" often in the characters and situations; and there is error, by defect of excess, in even the religious teaching, which is the sole reason for being of this class literature. This excess of the story element is doubtless one of the gravest objections that can be urged against the Sunday-school system. That a child may read—uninstructed, because they are "library books"—in twenty-five to fifty such books each year, and keep up the practice for years either, is no small evil. It is the great evil of the whole system, and is to be deplored.

The Illustrated Christian Weekly, in an article (Sixth month 25th) upon the same topic, corroborates the above, saying: "We talk of what we know, and what any one can verify for himself at the first Sunday-school at which he may inquire," that "at nine-tenths of the books known as 'library books' are stories." * * "What is this mean? This; that if a child draws a book but once in two weeks, he reads twenty-five of them in a year. If there are several children in a family, they read each other's books as well as their own. The simplest arithmetical calculation will show under what a ceaseless wash of stories a child's mind is during his career in the Sunday-school. This, moreover, is to be noticed; the very teachers trust, undoubtedly. But the child very soon learns to read simply for the sake of the story. If the religious teaching of very closely woven into the structure of the narrative, it will be 'skipped' by readers in a hundred. So when we analyze down to the facts of the case, we have the Sunday-school libraries furnishing our children with a series of novels or novelettes—that is precisely what these books amount to when the more or less of religious teaching they contain is eliminated. The effect, it seems to us, must be more or less deleterious, if we may not say demoralizing, to the extent as regards character, to a very considerable extent as regards literary taste." Now, all that has been cited above, cannot be advanced as any plea against the maintenance of First-day schools, (and the subject of here broached), else the library in itself, in an educational institution, might be simply condemned. But, when we consider the fact that probably one-half the inmates of our prisons have been attenders of First-day schools (and in some localities the proportion is very much greater), there is, obviously, urgent occasion for an examination of the causes of the moral lapse or failure to take hold of religious instruction which statistics betoken. That a principal cause of the trouble may be referable to the development of a precocious taste for fiction, treble, whilst the reading of really good stories is given up, the attendance at the regular meetings for worship is also sought and escaped—does not seem to have ended the sober consideration which the vital importance of the subject demands.

J. W. L.

Prophecy of Francis Howgill.

[The following extract from Sewall's History has been sent for insertion in our columns at the dying request of our late valued Friend, Sarah B. Upton. It was to her a source of comfort, and she desired it might again be brought to the notice of others.—Ed.]

In this hot time of persecution Francis Howgill wrote and gave forth the following paper for the encouragement of his friends.—Sewall.

"The cogitations of my heart have been many, deep and ponderous, some months, weeks and days, concerning this people which the Lord hath raised to bear testimony unto his name, in this, the day of his power; and intercession hath often been made for them to the Lord, and a patient waiting to know his mind concerning them for the time to come, which often I received satisfaction in as to myself, but yet something I was drawn by the Lord to wait for that I might comfort and strengthen his flock by an assured testimony. And while I was waiting out of all visible things, and quite out of the world in my spirit, and my heart upon nothing but the living God, the Lord opened the springs of the great deep, and overflowed my whole heart with light and love; and my eyes were as a fountain because of tears of joy, because of his heritage of whom He showed me, and said unto me in a full, fresh, living power, and a holy, full testimony, so that my heart was ravished there with joy unspeakable, and I was out of the body, with God in his heavenly paradise, where I saw and felt things unutterable and beyond all demonstration or speech. At last the life closed with my understanding, and my spirit listened unto Him; and the everlasting God said, 'Shall I hide anything from them that seek my face in righteousness?' Nay, I will manifest it to them that fear me; I will speak, do thou listen, and publish it among all my people, that they may be comforted and thou satisfied.' And thus said the living God of heaven and earth upon the 28th of the 3d mo. 1662.

"The sun shall leave its shining brightness and cease to give light to the world, and the moon shall be altogether darkness and give no light unto the night; the stars shall cease to know their office or place; my covenant, with day, night, times and seasons shall sooner come to an end, than the covenant I have made with this people unto which they are entered with me shall end or be broken. Yea, though the powers of darkness and hell combine against them, and the jaws of death open its mouth, yet will I deliver them and lead them through all. I will confound their enemies as I did in Jacob, and scatter them as I did in Israel in the days of old. I will take their enemies—I will hurl them hither and thither as stones hurled in a sling, and the memorial of this nation which is holy unto me, shall never be rooted out, but shall live through ages, as a cloud of witnesses, in generations to come. I have brought them to the birth, yea I have brought them forth; I have nourished them, and they are mine. I will swaddle them and carry them as on eagle's wings; and though clouds gather against them, I will make my way through them; though darkness gather on a heap, and tempests gather, I will scatter them as with an east wind; and nations shall know that they are my inheritance, and they shall know I am the living God, who will plead their cause with all that rise up in opposition against them.

"These words are holy, faithful, eternal, good and true; blessed are they that hear and believe unto the end; and because of them no strength was left in me for awhile; but at last my heart was filled with joy, even as when the ark of God was brought from the house of Obad-Edom, when David danced before it, and Israel shouted for joy."—Francis Howgill.

The Honey-Bird.

A small grey bird with a reddish beak, the size of a sparrow, had flown alongside and round the wagon for the last mile of our trek, making a shrill hissing cry, and sometimes almost flying in the faces of the drivers; and I noticed that the boys were regarding it with peculiar attention and talking amongst themselves in reference to it.

On asking what caused the unusual interest of the boys in, to all appearance, a very common-place little bird, it was explained that this little insignificant visitor was the famed Honey-bird. Often and often had we heard tales of its marvellous instinct in pointing out the nests of wild honey, but we had always received them with a considerable portion of disbelief as travellers' tales.

As soon as the oxen were outspanned and the boys at liberty, three of them, armed with buckets, spades, and hatchets, set off towards the bird, which had flown to a neighboring tree as soon as it perceived that our attention was successfully attracted. A, and myself, to whom it was as strange an adventure as it was novel, accompanied the boys. As soon as we reached the tree the little fellow had perched on, it fitted on to the next, and then on again when we came up. Once it took such a long flight that we were unable to follow it.

The bird, however, after waiting for us a short time in vain, came flying back, uttering its shrill cry to let us know its whereabouts.

As if it had been warned by this not to proceed too far ahead of us, our guide now took very short flights, and, if there was no tree to rest on, took short circles in the air until we came up to him.

For nearly a mile this was kept up, and as the way grew more difficult and the bushes more dense, our own faith in the bird was rapidly giving place to irritation at what began to look very like a trick of the others at the expense of our inexperience.

However, the boys seemed so genuinely astonished at our doubts, that we still followed on.

At last the bird stopped altogether in a small clump of some dozen mimosa-trees, all growing within a few feet of one another.

When we came up to it, instead of, as heretofore, flying off in a straight line, it just flitted on to an opposite tree, remained there a few moments, and then back to its previous position. This was its signal that the nest was close at hand. The boys examined the trunks of the trees round most carefully, but could find no opening where the nest could be by any possibility be situated. The bird grew more and more angry and indignant at what it evidently considered our extreme stupidity, and flapped its little wings, and redoubled the shrill cries which it had ceased to utter while leading us to the spot. At last, losing all patience, it actually settled on a piece of the stem of one of the trees it had been persistently flitting backwards and forwards in front of. The boys now, paying more attention to this particular tree, perceived just above where the bird had perched a small hole, and round it a kind of cement. While we were watching a bee flew out, which made it certain that the nest was within the trunk. The driver of Woodward's wagon, who was an old hand at the work, at once climbed up the tree with a hatchet, and under his direction the others collected armfuls of dried grass. Taking a large handful of this he lighted it, and then struck with the hatchet at the mouth of the narrow hole.

At the first blow a quantity of mud, wax, and decayed wood fell to the ground, with which the bees had skillfully walled up a large portion of the decayed wood. Out swarmed a cloud of bees, and now his burning grass came into operation. As quickly as they flew out their wings were singed in the flames and they dropped helpless to the ground. A. and myself had retreated to a safe distance from the tree, but the boys stood close up, hardly caring if they were stung or not. In a very few minutes all the occupants of the nest were destroyed; but new comers were constantly arriving, which made close quarters anything but pleasant. Not much cutting was necessary, to lay bare a large portion of the combs, which were laid horizontally across the entire width of the hollow portion of the tree. The upper combs are always the freshest, and therefore the best, so we at once set to work to fill our three buckets with them. When these were all full to the top there was still enough honey left to fill at least another three or four, for the combs went down to the very bottom of the tree, as we discovered by forcing down a long stick. There was already more than enough honey for all our wants, and the boys were confident that they could obtain fresh supplies in the same manner as often as they cared to follow the birds, so we left the remainder where it was for the bees which survived our felonious attack. Before leaving we carefully fixed a comb filled with honey on the nearest bush, and our late guide flew down and commenced his well-earned repast as soon as we had turned our backs on the spot. The Kaffirs would much prefer not to take any honey at all, than depart with their spoil and not leave a portion for the bird. They firmly believe that if they thus defraud the bird of its just rights, it will follow them up, and at a future time, instead of leading them to honey, will entice them into the lair of a lion, or to a nest in which some deadly snake lies concealed.

It is impossible to explain the marvellous characteristic of the honey-bird, without eroding it with powers of reasoning which are almost human. No one who has once witnessed the manner in which the bird will persistently follow a wagon for miles, but will leave it and join the first man or men who leave the trek and evince a disposition to follow, can for an instant believe that the bird betrays the nest unconsciously. How the birds have acquired the knowledge that men desire honey, and that they have the power to gratify their desire by forcing open the hidden boards; how they calculate, as they assuredly do, upon themselves reaping the benefit of being accomplices and instigators of the theft; and how they have learnt to lose their natural fear of mankind and trust themselves almost within his grasp; how they are taught their various devices for attracting man's attention and leading him to the spots where the bees have made their nests; are questions which, perpetually discussed amongst those who, although, not scientific naturalists, have spent their lives observing nature, can never be answered or explained.—Sandeman's Travels in South Africa.

THY WILL.

"They assayed to go into Bithynia; but the Spirit suffered them not. And they passing by Mysia came down to Troas." (Acts vii, 7, 8.) "Furthermore, when I came to Troas to preach Christ's gospel, . . . a door was opened unto me of the Lord." (2 Cor. ii. 12.)

Our will no longer rules;

"Thy Spirit suffers not;"
But thou, oh, Christ, dost lead,
Thy peace is now our lot.

On earth thy Father's will
It was thy meat to do;
"Thy will, not ours be done,"
Is now our motto, too.

And while we yield to thee,
And pass Bithynia's shore,
Thy Spirit guides us on Through Troas' open door.
We walk this open way,
And find our work to be
The work that thou hast planned
And given us for thee.

We bow and worship thee,
Oh, blessed Son of God,
And tread with joy along
The pathway thou hast trod.
We count our loss our gain,
And meekly bear our cross;
Thou, Christ, art now our own,
All else is only dross.

MY NEIGHBOR'S BABY.

Across in my neighbor's window,
With the droppings of soap and lace,
I see "neath his drowsing ringlets,
A baby's innocent face.
His feet, in crimson slippers,
Are tapping the polished glass,
And the crowd in the street look upward,
And nod and smile as they pass.

Just here in my cottage window,
Catching the flies in the sun,
With a patched and faded apron,
Stands my own little one.
His face is as pure and handsome
As the baby's over the way;
And he keeps my heart from breaking
At my toiling, every day.

Sometimes, when the day is ended,
And I sit in the dusk to rest,
With the face of my sleeping darling
Hugged close to my lonely breast,
I pray that my neighbor's baby
May not catch heaven's roses all;
But that some my crown the forehead
Of my loved one as they fall.

And when I draw the stockings
From the little weary feet,
And kiss the rosy dimples
In his limbs, so dainty and sweet;
I think of the round garments
Some little children wear,
And that my God withhold them
From mine, so pure and fair.

May God forgive my envy;
I know not what I said;
My heart is crushed and troubled;
My neighbor's boy is dead!
I saw the little coffin
As they carried it out to-day;
A mother's heart is breaking
In the mansion over the way.

The light is fair in the window;
The flowers bloom at my door;
My boy is chasing the sunbeams
That dance on the cottage floor.
The roses of health are blooming
On my darling's cheek to-day,
But the baby is gone from the window
Of the mansion over the way.

PRAISE.

"Oh Lord I know that in very faithfulness the hast afflicted me."

For what shall I praise Thee, my God and my King,
For what blessing the tribute of gratitude bring?
Shall I praise thee for pleasure, for health, or for ease,
For the spring of delight or the sunshine of peace?

Shall I praise thee for flowers that bloom o'er my breast,
For joys in perspective or pleasures possessed?
For the spirit that heightened my days of delight,
And the slumbers that sat on my pillow by night?

For this should I praise thee; but, if only for this,
I should leave half untold the donation of bliss.
I thank thee for sorrow, for sickness, for care;
For the thorns I have gathered, the anguish I bear.

For nights of anxiety, watching, and tears,
A present of pain, a perspective of fears,
I praise Thee, I bless Thee, my King and my God,
For the good and the evil thy hand hath bestowed.

The flowers were sweet, but their fragrance is down;
They yielded no fruit, they are withered and gone;
The thorn it was poignant, but precious to me;
'T was the message of mercy,—it led me to thee.

Through Tickets.—A man, starting on journey, buys a through ticket, takes the car, and considers his part toward the accomplishment of the journey fully performed. In consideration of the money he has paid for the passage he is to be carried to his destination with all due speed and safety. His part there is to be no labor, no care, no looking out for danger; for all this is done for him by the employees of the railroad, as he is to pass the time as best he may, even the extent of finding fault with the management of the train.

Men sometimes join the church as though it were a special train for heaven. They pay their pew-rent as they pay railroad fare, regarding it as an equivalent for passage. They seem to have no thought that more than this is required of them. They take no part advancing the spiritual interests of the church or doing church work, or laboring for the conversion of souls, or in regarding the peace and the unity of the brethren; but they claim and exercise the right to find fault the affairs of the church are not managed according to their ideas of propriety, or the pastor does not preach to suit their taste or if they are not promoted to positions of prominence. They pay their annual percent, observe somewhat of the outward form of church membership, and think this secures them a through passage to heaven.

Such persons delude themselves. The church is no railroad train for heaven. No through tickets can be purchased by the pew-rent. There is no such thing as being "carried" the skies on flowery beds of ease, nor as being carried in any other way except by the giving mercy of God in Christ; and the soon all men learn this fact the better for the for the church, and for the world.—M. Dunham.

What is a "good sermon"? When people say to each other that they have heard a good sermon, they sometimes mean that it was well written, sometimes that it was el ently delivered, sometimes that it was a great and convincing statement of Bible truth. Praise of the preacher may include pretty much everything, from an acknowledgment that the sermon pleased your fancy, to a heartfelt recognition of the fact that it gave you spiritual help and sustenance. That is a good sermon which does thee good," said Matthew Henry; and we do not know that any later writer has invented a better definition.—S. S. Times.

Testimonies to the Truth.

It is a great mercy and kindness, that God hath been pleased to open the way of life and salvation unto the souls of many people, that this our day and generation were in great stress for want of the knowledge of it; and is knowledge is given unto us through the blessed appearance and revelation of the Father and Spirit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to which, my friends, blessed be the name of the Lord, we have been turned our day and generation. This is the message and testimony that God raised up his servants to bear among us in our day and age, who came in the Spirit and power of our Lord Jesus Christ, having been the instruments of God's mercy through faith in Him that died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. That blessed message and testimony which they bare among us, was in evidence and demonstration of the Spirit and power of the Lord Jesus; for they came to preach the gospel of life and salvation, and the way they took to preach the gospel to us in our day, was the same way that the holy apostle Paul in his day was sent to preach the gospel, who said, "We are sent of God to turn people from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God. The holy apostle proposed the end for which they were sent, to turn the sons and daughters of men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to the power of God, that they might receive remission of sins, and an inheritance among them which are sanctified through faith, which is in Christ Jesus.

O friends! this faith in Christ is a living faith, it is a faith of the operation of God, and worketh it in us by his own Spirit and power. There are many that pretend to have faith in Christ, that are strangers to the operation of the power and Spirit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and so do not know they are made partakers of that faith which worketh by love, that giveth them victory over the world, and preserveth them and keepeth them out of the evil of the world.

Now friends, it is my desire that you may run from darkness unto light; that you may believe in Christ, and walk in Him, that you may be sensible that the blood of Jesus Christ, the dear and blessed son of God, cleanseth from all sin, from all unrighteousness, and from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, that so the end of the labor, travail and testimonies of all the faithful messengers and servants whom the Lord hath raised up in this our day, and sent to turn men from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan to the power of God; that their labor and travail, I say, may not be in vain, that they may all come to believe in the light, that they may be children of the light and of the day, that so we may come to walk in the light. And then my friends, we shall all come to be brought into an heavenly fellowship; if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, the dear Son of God, cleanseth us from all sin. And this is a work that will be profitable for all to know, seeing no unclean thing shall ever enter into the kingdom of God.

Friends, our justification is indeed in and through and by the Lord Jesus Christ, for his sake, not our own. Anything that we have done or can do, will not have a tendency to make our peace with God, seeing that we can do nothing ourselves that is acceptable and well pleasing to God. Therefore we cannot in the least (as hath been unjustly charged upon us) disesteem or put a light esteem on what the Lord Jesus Christ hath done for us, in his own person, without us, nor upon what, by his own power and Spirit, he hath wrought in our hearts. But we believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, both as to his outward appearance, as He was God manifest in the flesh; and also, in his inward and spiritual appearance in our souls. We believe in Him that hath appeared by his light, and grace, and truth in our hearts, and we know the effectual working and operation of his divine power to sanctify, and cleanse, and purify our souls; and thereby we come to have a real sense of the benefit and advantage, that the souls of the children of men have in and by the death, sufferings, resurrection, and ascension of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Till people come to believe in his spiritual appearance, by his light, and grace, and truth in their hearts, and to receive Him, and entertain Him, and let Him have a place in their souls, that He by his power may purge away sin and transgression; while men remain rebellious and stubborn, and will not let Him in, when He stands and knocks at the door of their hearts, that He may come in and sup with them, and they with Him; when men rebel against his heavenly light within them, and turn away from his divine grace and holy Spirit, and turn the grace of God into wantonness, lasciviousness, and run into uncleanness, drunkenness, pride, envy, malice, and bitterness, and into those things that are abominable and evil in the sight of the Lord; these men have no real advantage or benefit by the death and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the satisfaction and atonement he hath made for our sins, by that one offering and sacrifice of Himself; and they do not truly know the blessed end and design of his appearance and coming into the world. For this purpose was the son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil, that He might finish transgression and make an end of sin, and bring in everlasting righteousness.

My friends, the end of the working of the invisible power and Spirit of Christ is, that He may have a place in all your hearts, and that you may entertain Him; for the Lord will draw a line of judgments upon all that go under the profession of Christianity, and own what the Lord Jesus Christ did without them, but will not receive Him, entertain Him, and believe in Him, as He doth spiritually appear, and shine into their hearts by his divine light, grace and Spirit.

My friends, remember the sore judgments, miseries, calamities and distress that came upon the Jews, because of their rejecting Christ in his outward appearance in that prepared body, in which He came to do his Father's will; they would not own Him in his bodily appearance, but rejected Him, and set Him at nought, they crowned Him with thorns, and crucified the Lord of life and glory. He said unto them: "Except you believe that I am He, ye shall die in your sins; and if ye die in your sins, whither I go you cannot come." And thus He spake to Jerusalem: "O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not; behold your house is left unto you desolate, for I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." He tells them of the calamity and distress that should come upon them and overtake them, and so it came to pass, because they rejected the love of God, which in Christ Jesus was extended to them, when He would have gathered them, and brought them into a state of reconciliation and peace with the living God; but they would not.

Now, my friends, in this day of Christ's inward and spiritual appearance, you have had the testimonies of those that have been sent to you in the name, and power, and Spirit of the living God; and yet many will not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, nor receive Him inwardly and spiritually appearing in their hearts, nor give way to Him, nor wait and attend upon Him, to do that work in them and for them, which they cannot do for themselves: What work is that? The work of sanctification. For none come to be justified freely by the grace of God, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, as the Apostle speaks, Rom. iii. 24; but they are also sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, and made partakers of the divine nature. So that it is absolutely necessary for us to know Christ's power and Spirit, to renew and sanctify our souls, and purify and cleanse us.

(To be continued.)

Fred. N. Charrington.

Fred. N. Charrington was the eldest son of a partner in the firm of Charrington, Head & Co., the wealthy brewers, whose large brewery is one of the most prominent objects in the East End of London. An interest in a well-established brewery in London is a fortune. Dr. Samuel Johnson, Lexicographer, was an executor of the will of his friend Thrale, the brewer, and observed on the day of the sale: "Sir, we are not selling a lot of vats and boilers; but we are offering the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice."

The father of F. N. C. had offered him a course at one of the Universities; but as he intended to engage in his father's business, he thought it best not to embrace the offer.

He was brought up in the Church of England, and drew from the Prayer Book the lesson that "baptism" had made him an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven. But having been led to seek for close communion with God, his heart was opened to labor for others. He began a night-school, while occupying his days at the great brewery. The pupils were rough, ragged, degraded; the work was hard and repulsive. But he kept on, the enterprise all the time growing on his hands.

As he went to his school of an evening, he had to pass a number of public houses; gathered about the doors and within, he saw crowds of drunken fathers and mothers and ragged starving children. And over the door he read in flaming letters:

CHARRINGTON, HEAD & CO.'S ENTIRE.

In the ragged school he saw and heard enough to convince him that drink was the cause of a large share of the woes which he was trying to remedy. His conscience became enlightened; he told his father that he could no longer be connected with the brewery.

It is not easy for Americans to estimate the spiritual courage of this step. In England, brewing is as legitimate and honorable an employment as any on the Island. At Oxford, I saw the steam and smoke coming out of a window on the premises of one of the Colleges; I asked my guide what that meant. He said: "It is the College brew," and then he added that "Brazenose," the name of one of the Colleges was derived from "brazen-house," the ancient name for brewing-house, because the College was located on the site of a brewery. All the Colleges pride themselves very much on the character of their beer and ale. The brewers form a very influential class. They own and control the public houses, which (as in America) are a source of great political power. I doubt if there is as much money invested and as much money made in any other line of business as in brewing and distilling with their branches. Every political measure must be considered in its bearing on the brewers. In his "Budget Speech," Gladstone spoke with much respect of "this great industry," and of "the Burton brewers, to whom we are indebted for providing us with one of the most delightful beverages that ever was produced since nectar went out of fashion." A great many brewers sit in Parliament.

For this young man of twenty-three to forego wealth and to declare that he could not have anything to do with the business, was an act of wonderful moral heroism. His decision was a painful surprise to his father; but he accepted the decision, and ultimately left his son a maintenance, which has enabled him to devote all his time to the service of humanity, though of course he needs help to carry on his large operations.—Condensed from the Nat. Bapt.

For "The Friend."

The "Uncertain Riches."

The influence which the love of money or the thirst for riches exerts over the susceptible minds and hearts of men cannot easily be estimated. It is a desire so congenial to our fallen natures, that it presents, perhaps, one of the strongest temptations to our being drawn aside from the pursuit of life's great object—the attainment of "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." There is much contained in those precepts of Holy Scripture: "Trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy." "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them." "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase." Christian watchfulness and humility—those safeguards of a religious life—are not likely to be promoted, either by the pursuit or the acquisition of wealth. Whereas, "Godliness is profitable unto all things"—whether prosperity or adversity be our lot—"having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

The corrupting worldly influence which is brought to bear upon the very impressible minds of young persons by the living practice, the early and continually operating lesson, that to obtain riches and with their too coveted concomitants, notoriety and honor, are the great end for which this life was given, is likely to be very misleading and prejudicial alike to their present and eternal welfare. If this class see those around them eager and fervent in the chase for, and toiling early and late in sacrifice to their idol, the love of money, will it not have the effect to induce in their hearts the same dangerous disregard of heavenly reproofs and precepts, the same insatiable longing, the same idolatrous pursuit of that which the Apostle Paul has represented as "a root of all evil?"

Is there not ground to fear that amid the flood-tide of prosperity that is setting in upon some, there is danger of their forgetting their own littleness and nothingness; danger of overlooking the great uncertainty of riches; and danger, too, of their settling down in self-indulgence, and in the love of worldly ease, decoration and display? Alas for the prevailing excuses, the pride and luxury of this age! An age in which the speech, represented as coming from our Arch-enemy during the time of the early Friends' cruel persecution, has too close application, viz: "You persecute the Quakers and put them in prison, and that keeps them low and humble, and out of my reach; let them alone, as they are a moral and industrious people, there will be a blessing on their labors, and they will grow rich and proud, build them fine houses and get them fine furniture, and lose their humility and become like other people; and then I shall have them." Is not the truth of this prediction—come from what alleged source it may—too fully verified? Is demonstration wanting to prove that, sadly forgetful of what we should be here, even "strangers and pilgrims" in a world that lieth in wickedness, our hearts are much set upon the good things of this life, instead of, primarily, upon that kingdom, obtained only through submission to the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ that crucifies to the world, and ever leads into the narrow way of "low self-denial and watchful restraint."

The assuring language of the dear Saviour was, "Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all things needed shall be added unto you." This precious declaration is no less true now, than when it first fell from the lips of our great Lawgiver and King. There can never be a pursuit so productive of the true riches—of a peace, and joy and recompense, which passeth the understanding of the natural man, and which the world can neither give nor take away—as the whole-hearted pursuit of true religion. This, in its immediate effects, no less than in its ultimate consequences, is calculated to, and does satisfy all the desires of the heart and mind in the willing and obedient; and so preserves in the steady cultivation of a watchful, lively frame, and in the filial dependence upon an ever-present, eternal arm, as the danger is much lessened of being insensibly beguiled by the spirit of the world or of losing that tenderness of conscience, which is the ground of a close walking with God unto our eternal redemption.

Business, to a proper extent, is beneficial and necessary; but not the excess of it, or the intense application and attention which some give to it, and this to secure, not needful food and raiment—remembering that "godliness with contentment is great gain"—but riches affluence, the ability to make a show, notoriety, and greatness among men;* forgetting that

"Wealth heap'd on wealth, nor truth nor safety buy; The dangers gather as the treasures rise."

Oh! for grace to take warning and sit loose to the world and its uncertain, perishable riches; and so to number our days as to apply our hearts unto that wisdom and freedom, which consists in obedience to the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus as the one thing needful.

"Put thou my tears into a bottle," is the touching prayer of the Psalmist. He who notes the sparrow's fall will not overlook the eyes that weep. The Psalmist probably alludes to a custom which still prevails in Persia as of old. They bottle up their tears in the following manner: As the mourners are sitting around and weeping, the master of ceremonies presents each one with a piece of cotton wool, with which he wipes off his tears. This cotton is afterward squeezed into a bottle, and the tears are preserved as a powerful and efficacious remedy for reviving a dying man after every other means has failed. It is also employed as a charm against evil influences. The practice alluded to was once universal, as is found by the tear bottle, which are found in almost every ancient tomb for the ancients buried them with their dead as a proof of their affection.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Camp-Meeting Backsliding.—A Methodist paper (The Christian Advocate) commenting on this subject says, that much backsliding occurs at most camp-meetings, and so much at some as to neutralize their effects for good.

"Where the spirit of the occasion is that of an excursion, and two tides are contending, the tide of frivolity and the tide of devotion, and the former prevails, then much backsliding is sure to follow."

"In any case the listening to and comparing many preachers, the great sermons delivered by men of high repute, great efforts made by ambitious young men, the hearing of solemn appeals without corresponding efforts, whether of sinners to repent, or of Christians to grow in grace, or lead their friends to Christ, may have an unfavorable effect on the divine life. Many return with deadened sensibilities to their homes."

"But of all the dangers to which Christians are exposed, the most insidious is that of mingling speculation in lots with high religious fervor—a hymn-book in one pocket, and a diagram in another, ready to be produced alternately, or as occasion may require; to spirit of exhortation, and of bargain and sale at the same time struggling for utterance!"

* A pious English writer of the last century, in setting forth, somewhat ironically, the amount that, some appeared to be their ideal of a sufficiency of "filthy lucre" with their measure of faith, thus sheweth: They wish to secure about fifty thousand pounds as a standing fund. Then about ten thousand more for contingencies, as a rainy day or the like. Then ten thousand more to educate their children upon. And when they thus have accumulated some seventy or seventy-five thousand pounds, they can set up and contentedly live upon faith.

To this we add the remark, that open air meetings, such as were often held by both Friends and Methodists in their early days, are frequently blessed of the Lord. Yet when they were able to procure houses to meet in, so situated as to accommodate the people, the necessity for such outside gatherings in great measure ceased. The novelty and excitement attendant on a camp-meeting, and the unsettling effects of claims on the attention by surrounding objects, are calculated to hinder rather than promote that mental calmness which is a favorable condition for hearing the voice of the Redeemer as He speaks to the soul.

Persian Jews.—There is a great awakening among the Jews at Hamadan, Persia. Forty years ago, believers, besides women and children, though some of them are now deterred in confessing their faith by fear of persecution. Five men have been received into the church. It is of no ordinary interest to know that close by the reputed tomb of Mordecai the Great, a company of the children of Israel should be meeting regularly twice a week to examine the Law and the Prophets, and to consider the Christian faith.—Baptist Weekly.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Trees Attractive to Butterflies.—A. E. Bush, San Jose, California, writes: "I have been in Monterey, and was fortunate enough to find the 'Butterfly-tree' or trees, as there are many of them. These trees are the Monterey pine (Pinus insignis, Dougl.), and are probably over one and a half feet in diameter, and completely covered with live butterflies. To that there are as many butterflies as leaves on the trees, would not be a very great exaggeration. I saw them in the morning when it was cool and they could not fly very well, and picked up a dozen from the grass in five seconds. A lady resident informed me that for the twelve years she had lived there, the appearance had been the same."—Am. Nat.

Habits of the Blue-Jay.—I have often thought there is one marked difference between the blue-jays of Western New York and Pennsylvania, as I knew them when a boy, forty years ago, and ours here in Iowa. Those days there were still deep woods in that region, where great groves of pine and black oak had never been disturbed by the woodman's axe. These dark recesses were favorite resorts of the blue-jay. Our jays are, for the most part, almost half domesticated, coming to our barn-yards and corn-cribs, and pecking themselves in a bold, confident way, robbing the nest of a hen or a duck, as easily as they perpetrate the same depredations upon the robins and thrushes. Some years ago, so tame are they here, a little daughter of a friend of mine saw a blue-jay busily picking at some object, doubtless a ear of corn. Approaching stealthily she stepped her hands upon his sides and captured him!

It is amusing to see them eat a kernel of large western corn. They cannot swallow the grains whole, and are compelled to break them. This they do with powerful strokes of their bills, while holding the grain on the ground or other hard substance with one foot. These strokes came down as systematically as a blacksmith hits a hot iron with his hammer.

It seems to me this difference in the habits may be largely due to the scarcity of timber in this region, which makes it a necessity for them to live near the abodes of men.—C. At-drich, Webster City, Iowa.

In the upper part of Sonoma county, Cal., a railroad track crosses a deep ravine upon the upright trunks of tall trees, which have been sawed off upon a horizontal line. In the centre of the ravine a firm support is furnished by two huge redwood trees which have been lopped off seventy-five feet above the ground.

Dried Fruit.—An enormous increase in the evaporated fruit business is taking place in western New York, the recent legal decision that there is no monopoly of the sulphur process of bleaching having had a stimulating effect upon the industry. The opinion of American experts is, that the fruit can be dried by the evaporator cheaper than by sunlight, and the product is immeasurably better. A single New York firm last year evaporated twenty thousand bushels, and bought fruit evaporated by others equivalent to three hundred thousand bushels. Of this a London house took one hundred and sixty tons, and has doubled its order. The growers throughout New York State are preparing to develop the foreign market for this product. Each evaporator will dry one hundred bushels of apples a day. Girls are employed at the work, and earn from sixty cents to a dollar a day. After the apples are pared and sliced, which is performed at one operation, they are bleached by exposure to sulphur fumes for about an hour; afterwards they are evaporated, and the double process keeps them edible for an almost indefinite period.—Farmers' Union.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 24, 1881.

Before this paper reaches the eyes of our readers, they will have heard of the decease of our late President, James A. Garfield, which occurred about 10.30 p. m., on the 19th inst., near Long Branch on the coast of New Jersey.

This issue of the murderous assault on this estimable man has been for some time fore-shadowed by the gradually increasing symptoms of constitutional derangement, and the failure of strength. But though not unlooked for by many, perhaps most, intelligent observers, it nevertheless brings with it solemn feelings; and the hearts of thousands, we believe, have been lifted up to Him who ruleth over the children of men, with desires that He would care for our nation, and cause even the wrath of man to praise Him. It is the blessing of the Lord that is the only foundation for the happiness and prosperity of any people. Where a people do not abide under the fear of Him who pulleth down and setteth up at His pleasure, there is nothing that will keep them in the paths of self-restraint, and prevent the growth of corruption and selfishness; and these eventually lead to the overthrow of liberty, and to national suffering.

The Prophet Isaiah declares that when the judgments of the Lord are on the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness. If the people of the United States, and those of other nations who have sympathized with them and with the family of our murdered President, should learn a lesson of righteousness from this event, this afflictive dispensation will indeed prove a blessing to them. It ought to teach us to be more cool and moderate in our political efforts; and especially should it unite all parties in an earnest effort to remove from the contingencies of constantly recurring elections, the tenure of the numerous subordinate offices controlled by the Executives of the United States, and of the States individually.

The profound sympathy which the shooting of President Garfield has excited in all parts of the country, has strongly tended to bind together the inhabitants of the different sections; and thus to promote that unity of feeling which ought to exist between the various portions of a nation, and which is peculiarly important to a people scattered over such an immense range of territory as the United States possess.

Many also have learned to realize more fully than heretofore, that nations as well as individuals are dependent on Divine protection.

The composure and resignation which the President has manifested during his illness, have endeared him to the hearts of many. We hope that he was prepared for the solemn change which awaited him at the living. If it is his blessed experience to have exchanged an earthly mansion for one of those prepared in Heaven for the followers of the Lord Jesus, there is no cause to mourn for him.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On Saturday the 16th instant, President Garfield had a chill, followed by fever, and a profuse perspiration. This was regarded as a symptom of further disintegration of the affected lung. A daily recurrence of the chill and fever followed, with progressive loss of strength, until the evening of Sunday, the 19th instant, when the President passed away at thirty-five minutes after 10 o'clock. About twenty minutes before his close, he called attention to a severe pain in the left chest, which was thought to be of cardiac origin, and to have been a symptom of the immediate cause of death. Chester A. Arthur took the oath of office as President of the United States, at his residence in New York, the same night.

General Hancock will detail a special court martial to try Sergeant Mason, who attempted to shoot Guitau. Additional reports from the burned region in Michigan show that whole families have been left entirely destitute of clothing; that between Fort Austin and Cass City people have nothing to subsist on except potatoes dug from the ground, and corn roasted by the fires. Within thirty miles of Cass City 125 families were sleeping in the fields, with no cover whatever, some being so stripped that they were ashamed to show themselves, and have sent one of two persons to obtain supplies for three or four naked families who were huddled together.

The smoke from the forest fires in Michigan, has covered Lake Huron from one end to the other, and sailors report that navigation is rendered very difficult in consequence, and in many cases vessels have taken shelter in convenient harbors, their masters fearing to proceed. Despatches from East Tawas and other points on the Lake Huron coast state that the whole country is enveloped in blinding smoke, and that the heat is almost unbearable.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 1, 1881.

NO. 8.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

See, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
P. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Negotiations with the Ute Indians.

In The Council Fire for the Ninth month, B. Meacham describes his conference with the Utes on the Uintah Agency in Utah, retelling the settlement among them of their Indian brethren from White River. It was understood that some dissatisfaction existed, the Agent of the Uintahs was evidently apprehensive of trouble in the future. The Indians who wandered into the Commissioners' camp, frequently spoke of their chief 'Tabby,' on whose arrival some understanding would be had with regard to the business matters. The account says:—

'We had been in camp ten days when Tabby returned from Salt Lake City, where he had been, probably, for counsel with his Indian friends, when he made his appearance in our camp at the head of a delegation of Uintahs, who had left their harvest fields to be in attendance upon the head of the Utah Utes when he should speak for his people.

This delegation came in a body, all united, and without the accompaniments of usual Indian forms of parade. Except for their color and an occasional lock of long hair, they were not unlike ordinary farmers.

Tabby was introduced by some of his followers, and, after shaking hands and all were seated, an Indian announced that 'Tabby was to talk.' Nearly all the Uintahs talked and understood more or less of the English language, yet none of them are really competent interpreters. Realizing the necessity for a correct understanding of what should inspire, we insisted on having the best interpreter possible. The Indians were unanimous in naming one of their number, known as 'Yank.' Yank being some distance away, we sent for him. Meanwhile Mr. French brought a hot coffee, canned fruits, ginger snaps, crackers, corned beef, &c., which were taken of with great pleasure by our dark-skinned visitors.

Chief Tabby is a man of perhaps seventy years of age, wears a small white mustache, large in size, and with a great deal of dignity and personal presence. Upon the coming of Yank, the chief said:

'I came to pay my respects to you and you know that my heart is all right toward Washington,' meaning the Department, 'and all people. I have kept the words given me many years ago by Washington, and I have done all that I was told to do. Washington told me to make a farm and learn to live like white men, and I have done it. I have not learned very fast, but I have done the very best I could, and now I have wheat growing; I have corn growing; I have watermelons growing, and I have something to live upon. You may tell Washington that I have kept his law.

"Now, I do not say that the White River Utes shall not come here, but I want to understand about this money they are getting. My people have killed no white men, and they get no money and but few goods. I came here to get an understanding of this matter. I do not say it is not right, but I don't know how it is, and that is what I want to know. I am not afraid to talk.'

"This speech was delivered with an earnestness that made it interestingly eloquent, and it demanded a plain, intelligent answer. For twenty years we had heard the same puzzling proposition made by peaceable Indians: 'Why do you give money to Indians who kill your people?' This is the way nearly all peaceably-disposed uncivilized Indians think and talk upon this subject. I had met this ugly proposition before, and I felt the responsibility of the hour."

"Relying upon a Higher Power for wisdom, and upon the good sense of these half-civilized people, after a few preliminary remarks and compliments upon Tabby's speech and the general appearance of the Uintahs, I told them that there was no subject that I was afraid to talk about. We had been sent here from Washington to pay money to the White River Utes and to hunt up homes for them. The money is not given to the White River Utes to pay them for killing Agent Meeker and other white men. That is a mistake. The Government never pays anybody for going wrong. The White River Utes did wrong in killing white men, and the Government punishes them for it by taking their country from them. The money they get is very small pay for such a country. It is the Ute who pays for killing men. He loses the country his father gave him and he can never get it again. He is now a man without a country. He can call no place his home. He is a wanderer; an orphan. He is like a child without a father. The Government pitied him, notwithstanding his crimes, and in charity gives a few dollars to every one each year to help him along. Washington said: 'These people must have some place to live.' He looked around and saw this beautiful valley. He saw that there was more land than the Uintahs could use. The Uintahs had kept peace with white men and they are, nearly all of them, farmers. They were a long way ahead of the White Rivers. They are friends. The Uintahs are good people and know how to make a living by farming. They can show the White Rivers how to work their horses in wagons and plows. Then Washington said: 'The Uintahs are far ahead of the White Rivers; we must give them some wagons and harness, plows and mills and schools and all these things, until they are up even with the Uintahs.'

"The White River Utes did not come here to take your farms. They will take land that you cannot use. We want you to work right along and not turn back. You must not feel badly about the White River Utes getting money and beef and flour, and new wagons and plows, and all these things. These are all they will have to show for all that great country which they lost by fighting. I have told you now all you asked to know. If there is anything more you want to ask about, I am ready to tell you. All Indians must come into the white men's road. Some of them are slow coming, but they will come in a few years. There is no other way to live in peace. All must have one law, one religion, one school. All were made by one God, and all are children of one Father.'

"Not a word was missed. Every Indian seemed to understand all that had been said. Once more Tabby arose as his people turned their eyes upon him. He began with great deliberation, but with unusual animation. His eye kindled and his face lighted up with a smile as he talked, giving his speech an agreeable emphasis. There was no mistake in his meaning. He said: 'I have heard all your words, and I understand them. I shall not lose them. They fill my heart full, I want you to tell Washington that I am glad I came here to find out about paying money to the White River Utes. I see it different from what I did before I came. I understand what I did not understand. Tell Washington that it is all right to give money to the White River Utes. It is all right for them to come here. Tell Washington that I have been holding back because I did not know how it was, and I have not made the White River Utes welcome. Now I will send word for them to come and share our land with us. Tell them, me nor my people will turn back. Now that we understand everything we will go ahead farming, and we will show the White River Utes how to plow and cut grain. Tell him our hearts are all right now, and that everything is all right. Tell him all this for me.'

"This speech met with a hearty approval by all present, but the old man was not through. He turned now toward his own, and not in need of an interpreter, he broke out in impassioned speech of great power and of some minutes' length.

"Our interpreter, Yank, was too intensely interested to translate for us as Tabby spoke, but with a motion of his hand said, 'By and by, I tell you.' When Tabby sat down, silence followed for some minutes. At length Yank remarked, 'Now, I tell you. He said, "I am an old man, not long you will see me here. I feel that I am nothing. I cannot make a blade of grass grow; I cannot make a leaf grow; I cannot make the land, I cannot make the flowers. The white man cannot make these things. Only one person can make them—the One who lives above. He made everything—the grass, the leaves, the water to run and the mountains. He made all kinds of men. He put us here and sent the white men here. He wants us all to live like brothers. We have worked a long time, try hard to get up to the white man. He is still ahead of us, but we are coming up to him. We will not turn back, we will not make war on any people, we will help the White River Utes, we will keep all that we have heard, we will go back to our farms and save the wheat, and then we will have time to all come back and talk a great deal and find out many things we want to know. We will get everything well understood, so that there shall be no blood on this ground. We have had things made plumb and straight, and we are satisfied no blood will fall upon this land on account of these people coming here. The eyes of the One who lives above are upon us, and we will not make them ashamed of us. He will watch out for us. We will not fear that He will deceive us. My people, I am an old man, I shall never talk much more.

"This is substantially Tabby's speech to his people. Nowhere have we seen more thoughtful dignity than in this meeting. We felt a cloud roll off and could laugh at a warning we received from Ashley valley, twenty-five miles east, a few hours later, to the effect 'that the Indians have given all white men two weeks' notice to leave the country.'

"Another mile-stone has been passed and we are thankful that peace reigns and promises to reign over the designs of all evil-minded persons until we can all, without regard to race or color, say, 'This is our country, our home,' with one God and one law over all.

A. B. M.

"Cintah Agency, Utah, Aug. 14th, 1881."

Testimonies to the Truth.

(Concluded from page 53.)

When we come to believe in the inward and spiritual appearance of Christ, and to know the work of sanctification, we cannot have a slight esteem of, nor disbelieve or undervalue, what the Lord Jesus Christ hath done for us in his person; but we shall come to find the benefit, gain, advantage and profit of it redounding to our souls, through that one offering, when He offered himself, through the eternal Spirit, as a lamb without spot. He offered himself once for all, and we have the benefit of it when we come to receive Him, live in obedience to Him, and answer his requirements, and walk in the Spirit; and then as the Apostle saith: "If we walk in the Spirit, we shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh, for all that is in the world, the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world, and the world passeth away, and the lust thereof, but he that doth the will of God abideth forever."

Therefore see to it, you that make a profession of it, see that as you have received the Lord Jesus Christ you walk as He walked, that you live in the Spirit and walk in the Spirit, and not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; that you live not in malice, envy or bitterness, and so grieve the good Spirit of God, and bring a burthen upon the souls of the righteous.

We that are come to the sight and vision of heavenly things, and have the mysteries of the kingdom of God opened to us, are come to be partakers of the gift of charity, which is a more excellent way; if this be wanting, all is wanting. What doth the Apostle say? "Though I speak with the tongues of men and angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal; and though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have no charity, I am nothing; and though I bestow all my goods to the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profits me nothing."

These things have been often said and declared to you, friends, and I have now this general testimony to give, in the dread and fear of the Lord God; they that love God above all, will love their neighbor as themselves, they will love those that are the friends of God and of his people; nay, it is a duty incumbent on them, a new commandment, saith our Saviour, "I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." And we are not only to love one another, but to love our enemies; thus our Lord Jesus Christ commanded us, Mat. v. 44, 45. "But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven, for He causeth his sun to shine on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

Now, my friends, that you may keep in this love of God and love to one another, is the desire and breathing of my soul, that so your faith may stand not in the wisdom of men's words, but in the power of God. This power will bring down every high thought and imagination into subjection and obedience to Christ, that we may walk before Him to all well-pleasing, that when we come to die, we may lay down our heads in peace, and be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless; and, at the end of our days, we may receive the end of our faith, the salvation of our immortal souls.

Friends, to the grace of God I commend you, the Lord God of life preserve and keep you; that you may be safe in the hands of God, and abide under the shadow of his wing, and be surrounded with his almighty arm, who hath hitherto preserved us in all our solemn meetings and assemblies, when the enemies of God's truth have risen up against us; the remembrance of it should be sweet and pleasant to us, when the floods of the ungodly were mustered up against us, and sometimes hauled us out of our meetings to gaols and prisons, for bearing testimony to the truth of God in our day. O the sweet and comfortable presence of the Lord that then attended us! and, blessed be his name, He waited to be gracious to us, and did work manifold deliverances for us. Praise and glory be given to the eternal and Almighty God, whose Divine power and providence hath brought a calm over the nation, so that now we enjoy our meetings without trouble and molestation. Oh that that we may be sensible of the wonderful love and mercy of God to us!

And, Friends, it greatly concerns us to be careful in the whole course of our lives, that we may not give any occasion for the obstructing or hazarding of the present peace and liberty we enjoy. O! there should be a serious care and tender regard to God's glory and the honor of his great and excellent name; and also, a care and concern for the reputation of our religion, and religious societies, that none may have any occasion of just ground to bespatter and reproach us, and render us odious to the government under which we live.

Blessed be the name of the Lord, for the freedom and quiet seasons we enjoy, and that are continued by the mighty arm and power of the Lord; let all our souls bow before Him and let us walk and live in a continual subjection to his Divine wisdom and will, that our souls may be all bound up in the bundle of life, that we may serve the Lord with sincerity and perseverance to the end of our days, that then an abundant entrance may be ministered to us, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.—John Vaughton, 4th mo. 1st, 1694.

For "The Friend."

Inconsistencies of War.

Quest. What is it that makes a man a murderer in the eye of the world, the crime to be expiated by hanging on the gallows?

Ans. To kill one of his fellow-men.

Q. What constitutes a man a hero, and to have his name heralded from land to land and from shore to shore?

A. To slay thousands of his fellows on the sanguinary field of savage warfare.

Q. Is it either right or expedient, that the laws of men should supersede those of God who saith, "Do not kill?"

A. No: Peter and John when examined before the people and elders of Israel, "answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye."

The taking of oaths is not a Christian institution. We inherit it from Pagan times. Greeks and Romans swore by all the gods in the calendar. The Hebrews may perhaps be claimed as examples, but He whose authority, most weighs with us did not think so. Attempts have been made to reconcile the practice of judicial swearing with the injunction "Swear not at all," but they cannot be regarded as successful. The judicial oath is an instance of the way in which the State has always made free with religion for its own purposes, the general result being that while much harm has been done to religion, very little good has accrued to the State. A religious man must surely feel distress when he thinks of the extent to which the highest sanctions of religion are profaned! thousands of instances every day, the "S help you God" issuing glibly from the lips of attorneys, magistrates, clerks, and court criers under circumstances almost precluding an idea of reverence. The Supreme Being thus pressed into our legal machinery as matter of convenience, and is practically treated as a legal fiction, except in cases of perjury. As for perjury, it is committed every day in the Divorce Court, and no a tant is or can be made to prevent it, public opinion maintaining that there are circumstances in which a man would commit a breach of honor if he hesitated to swear falsely. Can anything be done to arrest this deterioration of public morals? One thing at least we can do. We can put an end to profanity.—Manchester Times (Eng.)

For "The Friend."

"Truthful Singing."

Taking up a paper sometime ago, the writer's attention was arrested by an article with the above title; although a part of it was on off, he felt interested in what was left, and thought it might profitably be introduced in the notice of some of the younger readers of "The Friend," who may sometimes indulge the pleasing, but it is feared seductive practice of singing hymns, and who may never have thought of the subject in the light in which it is here presented.

"Ella," said Julia to her friend, as they walked home together from the lecture, "Why don't you sing that last hymn? It would have suited your voice exactly."

Ella was silent a moment, and then replied, "To tell the truth, Julia, I could not sing that hymn; I wish I could; I wish I felt such ardent longings for heaven, such an assurance reaching there; I know such feelings are right, but I am afraid I do not possess them."

"But do you never sing words that you do not actually feel?" asked Julia, adding, "the hymns are all good; we ought to feel what they express, and it does not seem as if it would be wrong for any body to sing them."

"But, Julia, would you be so insincere as to do so to one for whom you did not care at all, and tell her how much you loved her; or to profess to another how much you wished to see her, when you would be very sorry to receive an invitation from her?"

"Certainly, I should call that very deceitful," answered Julia, who was really a sincere friend.

"Well, then, dear Julia, it is just for this reason that I cannot sing all hymns, it is not sufficient that I ought to feel so. I cannot sing."

"I'm fettered and chained up in clay,

I struggle and pant to be free;

I long to be soaring away

My God and my Saviour to see;"

because it would not be true in my case, and should add to the sin of lacking a right thing, the worse sin, of professing a feeling which I have not. I hope I am a Christian; I feel that I do love the Saviour; I am trying to follow Him; if it were God's will, I trust I could be willing to go; but I cannot say I would be taken away now; and dare not say in the presence of the heart-searching God, who desireth truth in the inward parts, words which I cannot say from the heart."

Ella stopped, having already said more than was her wont, and Julia, to whom all this seemed to be a new idea, was silent until they reached her home. She was not, like her friend Ella, a Christian, though she was a girl of good principles and religious education. She had sung without much thought the hymns given out that evening, although they expressed the ecstasy of Christian rapture, the utmost devotion of love to Christ, the most intense longings to depart and be with Him. The tunes were sweet, Julia loved to sing and that was all; but now, what Ella had said struck her with force. That very evening she had sung—

"Jerusalem my happy home,
Sweet land of rest for thee I sing," &c.

Here the paper was torn off, but there is sufficient to show that it brought thoughtfulness to the mind of the young girl to whom it was addressed.

In reading the lives of members of our own Society, who have been brought out of other religious professions, we frequently find that their minds were arrested early in their religious experience with the importance of giving up the practice of singing words that they were not in condition truthfully to adopt. George Fox said, when the priest advised him to sing psalms, "I was not in a state to sing, I could not sing." It is said of John Thorp, that the evening before his decease he related to his family the following circumstance of his early life: "When a boy about fourteen years of age, my attachment to music and singing was such that when walking alone in the lanes and fields of an evening I frequently gratified myself by singing aloud, and indulged therein even after my mind became uneasy with the practice, until in one of my solitary evening walks, when in the act of singing, I heard as it were a voice distinctly say, 'If thou wilt discontinue that gratification, thou shalt be made partaker of a much more perfect harmony.'" So powerful was the impression then produced, that he added, he never afterwards indulged in the practice.

Jno. Gratton* says of his early religious experience, "My sorrows increased upon me, and when the people sung psalms in the steeple-house, and I have been there, I durst not sing the same saying of David as they did, it would have been a lie in my mouth, for I saw I was not in the condition David was in, nor could I sing it truly as my song, and if I had I should have said or sung a false thing as to myself." In the account of Love-day Henwood, published in "The Friend," vol. 51, we find her experience on this subject. "She had formerly been very fond of singing hymns, joining in it, as she believed, with the spirit and the understanding also, and up to the time of her application for membership, had not clearly seen the nature of Friends' testimony respecting it. But about this time the unfoldings of Divine Light on her understanding gave her entirely new views on this subject. A few weeks before this, she says, I delighted much in it. I sometimes took the hymn book and thought I would find a hymn for the girls to sing, but have been obliged to shut the book again, and at last I felt a liberty to tell them what my views of singing then were. Being one day down stairs I heard the girls laughing, and sensibly felt that I would rather at that time hear them laughing than singing a hymn, for in this they acted in their own character, but in singing hymns they would be, though unconsciously, mocking the Most High God." It is related of our late beloved friend H. Regina Shober, that one of the first practices which she felt herself conscientiously restrained from uniting in, was the singing of the congregation as a part of public worship.

Quotations on this subject from the writings of those who have in their day been shining lights in our Society, and have finished their course with joy, might be multiplied.

* Friends' Library, vol. 9.

Enough, however, has been said to show how they were led by the Holy Spirit to entirely relinquish the practice of music in all its forms, and may perhaps arrest the attention of some of our dear young friends who have thought there was no danger in it. May we all, older and younger, be incited to watch over our conduct even in what are esteemed by some as little things; and that we may do nothing to place a stumbling block in the way of honest inquirers after truth, or before the children of our own people, whose tender minds might be hurt by seeing those whom they esteem better than themselves, encouraging or permitting such indulgences in their families. "Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." Jer. vi. 16.

For "The Friend."

"In our Quaker City it is so obviously proper to enforce the law against carrying concealed deadly weapons that even a partial enforcement would be much better than the general neglect into which the subject has fallen in this locality during the last twenty years, when probably the influence of the civil war, and the demoralization always inseparable from war of any kind, gave impunity to the practice of carrying such weapons and of handling and using them recklessly."

"It seems to us that the whole tone of the American press needs to be raised and dignified, that the men by whom our newspapers are controlled need to take a higher view of the responsibilities of their position than appears in many instances to be the case at present. They need to cultivate a keener sense of personal accountability, and to realize more effectively the range of the power which they are so often tempted thoughtlessly to exercise."

It was gratifying to meet with the above short editorials, clipped from a city newspaper of recent date. How desirable to see the suggestions contained in both, and particularly those in the latter, carried out into ruling, consistent practice!

We oftentimes recall the manner of measuring ministers adopted by a good man in his day, viz: by square measure. Which, by the way, is no less applicable to editors in their hardly less responsible but very influential position. Thus, said the sage measurement, to: "I have no idea of the size of a table, if you only tell me how long it is; but if you also say how broad, I can tell its dimensions. So when you tell me what a man is in the pulpit, you must also tell me what he is out of it, or I shall not know his size."

Selected for "The Friend."

Backbiters, and Conceited People.

Above all thing, my dear children, as to your communion and fellowship with Friends, be careful to keep the unity of the faith in the bond of peace. Have a care of reflectors, detractors and backbiters, who undermine and undermine brethren behind their backs, or slight the good and wholesome order of Truth, for preserving things quiet, sweet and honorable in the church. Have a care of novelties and airy changeable people, the conceited, censorious and puffed up; who at last have always shown themselves to be clouds without rain, and wells without water; who will rather disturb and break the peace and fellowship of the church, where they dwell, than not have their wills and ways take place. I charge you in the fear of the living God, that you carefully beware of all such: mark them as the apostle says, Rom. xvi. 17, and have no fellowship with them; but to advise, exhort, entreat and finally reprove them.—The Advice of William Penn to his Children.

For "The Friend."

"Who is the King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle, He is the King of glory."

He, the good Master, is indeed strong and mighty in battle; He does indeed fight for us. When our little bark is almost ready to sink, then are the everlasting arms underneath to support, and to keep us from sinking. Oh what a good Master! After such a conflict as this is over, how precious it is to feel his love and to receive the "oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

This state is for those that fear the Lord, and endeavor, with all the ability they possess, to maintain their faith in the spiritual battle they have to pass through for their purification. These will come to experience that "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength." He is pleased at times to give us this spiritual strength, is willing, as it were, to come and sup with us. We cannot command these things ourselves, but we must keep up a daily watch; not only daily, but oftener than the returning morning must our minds be turned to these better things, which ought to be the chief object of our lives. "We must love the Lord with all our heart, and all our mind, and all our strength," then I believe He will not be wanting on his side, but will be with us in a manner we cannot know, if we let our minds drift into an easy, lukewarm state. And we will find, too, that He will oftentimes bring precious passages of Scripture to our remembrance, much to our comfort.

But we will come to experience that there must be a giving up of the whole heart; a half-way work will not do. We must give up everything, and be willing to follow Him whithersoever he leadeth, although it may be in the way of the cross, and we may think we cannot do the things that are required. Yet we will come to see, if we are faithful, that there will not be more put upon us than we are able to bear; neither all at one time, but gradually; for He deals gently with his children—his little ones. And we will find that hard things will be made easy and bitter things sweet, and it will come to be a pleasure, rather than otherwise, to follow Him in the way of his leading.

Are there not some who have arrived at the years of maturity, and still find their time to be swiftly passing away, who have once known the candle of the Lord to shine upon them, and have tasted of his goodness, but have let the things of the world come in between and mar the work on the wheel? Is it not time for such to take heed to the still small voice, which is still pleading with them at times, ere it is too late? for we read in the Scriptures of truth, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Awful indeed the language!

If any of my readers are sliding into this state, may you be induced to take warning by these Scripture words. Attend at once to what is made known to you; let not another opportunity pass by unheeded. So that you may know the Lord's marvellous light to be shining upon you and working in you, to your great comfort and satisfaction. And then, with his help you may be enabled to "Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."

Selected.

TRUST AND DISTRUST.

Distrust thyself, but trust His grace;
It is enough for thee!
In every trial thou shalt trace
His all-sufficient.

Distrust thyself, but trust His strength;
In Him thou shalt be strong;
His weakest ones may learn at length
A daily triumph-song.

Distrust thyself, but trust His love;
Rest in his changeless glow:
And life or death shall only prove
His everlasting flow.

Distrust thyself, but trust alone
In Him, for all—for ever!
And joyously thy heart shall own
That Jesus faileth never.

—Frances Ridley Havergal.

Selected.

THE BETTER LAND.

I know not where that city lifts
Its Jasper walls in air,
I know not where the glory beams,
So marvellously fair.

I cannot see the waving hands
Upon that farther shore,
I cannot hear the rapturous song
Of dear ones gone before;

But dimmed and blinded earthly eyes,
Washed clear by contrite tears,
Sometimes catch glimpses of the light
From the eternal years.

There is a rapture of the soul,
The joy of sins forgiven,
For Christ the Blessed reigns within,
And where He is—is Heaven.

Selected.

CHERISH KINDLY FEELINGS.

Cherish kindly feelings, children,
Nurse them in your heart;

Don't forget to take them with you,
When from home you start;
In the school-room, in the parlor,
At your work or play,
Kindly thoughts, and kindly feelings,
Cherish every day.

Cherish kindly feelings, children,
Toward the old and poor,
For you know they're many blighting
Hardships to endure.

Try to make their burden lighter,
Help them in their need,
By some sweet and kindly feeling,
Or some generous deed.

Cherish kindly feelings, children,
While on earth you stay;
They will scatter light and sunshine
All along your way.

Make the path of duty brighter,
Make your trials less bitter,
And whate'er your lot or station,
Bring you happiness.

—M. A. Kidder.

Shop Heroes.—Brave deeds are done in shops and forges. Some years ago a German laborer in the Fort Pitt foundry had some melted iron poured accidentally into one of his shoes.

He was carrying at the time one side of a vessel filled with liquid iron. If he had dropped it he would have endangered the lives of his comrades and set fire to the building. If he had set it down he would have spoiled a casting weighing 130 tons.

The man walked steadily to the pit into which the molten iron was to be poured, and did not let go the handle of the vessel until his duty was done. He had that melted iron in his shoe about one minute and a half. It did not take him as long to get his shoe off, but who can imagine the torture and the length to him of that minute and a half?

For every splendid act of heroism done on the battle-field a hundred are done in shops and quarries, and on the storm-tossed ocean.

An Important Discovery.

When Dr. Jenner a hundred years ago observed the effectiveness of vaccination for small-pox in human subjects, it was not suspected that he was on the track of a discovery reaching to a great number of diseases among men and brute animals. At the late meeting of the International Medical Congress, in London, that most eminent chemist—perhaps in the world—Pasteur, of France, showed an audience some important experiments. Professor Pasteur, it must be remarked, is the great student of fermentation. He has rendered important services to the French brewers by his observations and study of the causes and course of fermentation in yeast; also to French wine growers by investigating the phylloxera which blights their grapes; to dairymen likewise by his teachings on milk fermentation; and now he comes to the service of the farmer and stock-raiser for the protection of their cattle against disease. He described his experiments to an audience in St. James' Hall of doctors from all parts of the world, but they concern equally the farmer's wife who raises poultry for the market. He first showed how to vaccinate for cholera in chickens. The word vaccinate, which properly belongs to the cow and cow-pox, may do well to be used to express the process, as otherwise each species of animal disease would require a name to itself to convey the meaning. Pasteur himself says vaccinate, whether he is talking about chicken cholera or a plague among horned cattle, swine, sheep or horses. A fine glass rod is dipped in the blood of a fowl which is dying of chicken cholera. The drop of blood obtained is then placed in a vessel containing a prepared fluid, which has been boiled and rendered perfectly clear. In a short time, this "culture vase," as Pasteur calls it, begins to swarm with tiny organisms, having the form of the figure 8; it grows turbid with them. Taking one of these tiny forms again on a glass rod, and dropping it into a second vessel of clear fluid, the same ferment and generation goes on, and this experiment may be repeated from vase to vase, until the hundredth or the thousandth colony is reached, always with the same effect.

The curious part of the experiment is that if you take a healthy fowl and put under its skin a drop from any one of these vases, even the furthest from the first, it will die of chicken cholera, precisely as it will if you put under its skin a drop of blood from an infected fowl. At any point in this propagation the results are the same. How then is he to vaccinate?—that is, vaccinate safely, as a preventative? Professor Pasteur found that by leaving an interval of time between the passing of these tiny germs from one vase to another the small organism changed quality. Instead of being passed directly has been done as soon as they showed themselves, a week, a fortnight, or month was allowed to go by, before the germ from the swarming vase was dropped into another. Each one of these successive steps produced the same appearance of living things. But each prolonged interval of time the disease communicated grew weaker when put into a fowl. If it killed eight out of ten from a vase, it would kill but five out of ten from the next, and so on in reduced proportion, till finally a vase was reached that did not kill any. The fowls would show symptoms of illness, but recover. In other words they tested the poison, got through with it and threw it off. Now for the strange but most instructive part of the story. A drop of infected blood from the chickens that had died of the cholera had no longer any fatal effect on these vaccinated fowls. They were infected against the disease, though they were taken up in chicken houses with it and exposed to it for a year.

What process had the difference been effected in the virus matter? All the minute germs—"microbes," Pasteur calls them—are alike in form and alike in propagating themselves; but those which were carried off—rushed through, as one might say—as ordinary contagion is carried,—were venous and deadly. Those "microbes" that were longer kept in each little vase, because one of them was transferred to another, had been exposed for that length of time to the small quantity of air which was each stopped vessel. The oxygen of the air had thinned out, in some way, the disease. With each transfer and each interval of "airing," the force of the poison grew weaker, until finally it became a protective for the chicken from the very plague of which it had been once a part. The first series of the germs, born all about the same time in the dozen vases, might be regarded as so many or twins and triplets, all very much alike. Others, coming at longer intervals, were the grandchildren and great-grandchildren with less of the family trait about them. Force was dying out.

We have spoken of these little figure 8's as though they were individuals, and so they even though the region they fasten upon is small range of a chicken's life. But this need man has studied the epidemics among animals to learn from them the secrets of antipestilences. This is readily seen to more importance when carried a step further, as Pasteur has carried it, to the milder fever in cattle, in sheep and horses. France, of late years, animals to the value of millions of dollars die annually of this. The similar range of experiments with the poison blood of splenic fever went through similar results. Here the germs are thread-like form, and, unlike the little figure 8's of the chicken cholera, these did not die of old age. Buried animals, that were underground for twelve years, were found to communicate it, and it was shown that such poisons could be brought to the surface again by earthworms. "In this," said Pasteur, "we may find the whole origin [cause] of the disease, inasmuch as animals swallow these germs with their food." It would certainly follow from this that all animals dying of pestilential diseases should be burned and not buried. The process of vaccinating cattle for splenic fever is a little more intricate to follow than those of preparing the "microbes" of chicken cholera, because of some difference in the germs themselves, and too abstruse to follow here. But the methods were somewhat similar. Out of fifty sheep which were at one time placed at Pasteur's disposal for testing this, twenty-five were vaccinated with the "thinned out" or attenuated virus. A fortnight afterward the whole fifty were inoculated with the poison of splenic fever, directly from the blood of a dying animal. The twenty-five vaccinated sheep resisted the disease; the others died in fifty hours. It is hardly necessary to say that a new business on the farms is growing out of this field of investigation, and in the departments around Paris, Professor Pasteur's assistant in a fortnight vaccinated more than 20,000 sheep and a large number of horses, in districts, of course, where the epidemic prevailed.

Sir James Paget, one of the most distinguished British physicians, in thanking M. Pasteur on behalf of the Medical Congress, said that, while Dr. Jenner was mobbed, and had to fight vehement opposition for seeking to benefit human beings, Professor Pasteur's investigations for the benefit of property, flocks and herds met with no opposition. The remark may be carried further, to say that experiments upon animals, conscientiously conducted, are putting our doctors on the origin of some at least of the diseases that flesh is heir to. We may not be called upon to be vaccinated for diphtheria, scarlet fever, typhoid or other disease in advance. No man need make a Mithridates of himself or his household, by arming his family with counter poisons, from big to little. It would be quite sufficient to have the fact established that, in the presence or neighborhood of such dangers, protection might be secured, as it now is from small-pox by Jenner's plan.—Public Ledger.

From the San Jose Weekly Mercury, California.

An Error Corrected.

ED. MERCURY:—Noticing in yesterday's issue of the Mercury a reference to the Shaker community, in which they are termed "Shaking Quakers," thus confusing them with the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, I wish to correct an ignorant and popular error in regard to these two sects, so totally different and distinct in their social life, mode of worship, religious views and customs, and other characteristics, rendering the Shakers in many respects a very peculiar people. They are not an outgrowth of "Quakerism," and they have never laid claim to the name "Quaker," or been known by intelligent people as being in any wise identified socially, civilly or religiously with the Society of Friends. The latter denomination derived the name of "Quakers" from their cruel persecutors and defamers in England about 250 years ago; the term was given in derision, but we are not ashamed of it—indeed, rather like it—for it has become synonymous on two continents with civil and religious liberty, and while the Society of Friends hold tenaciously to the faith of their fathers, among whom may be mentioned the zealous and fearless George Fox, Pennsylvania's first Governor, William Penn, Robert Barclay, the learned author of the "Apology," an unanswerable argument in defence of our doctrines and principles, Pennington, Whitehead, Dewsbury, and many other luminaries in our Society in that early day, bold, faithful men, who battled long, and it may be added, successfully, for freedom of conscience, the fruits of whose labors we, as a Society, are now enjoying, and it is not too much to say the civilized world owes them a debt of gratitude for their prolonged and arduous self-sacrificing struggle in defence of right and justice; and while we would not reflect on the Shakers or any other sect or association who worship a Supreme Being in accordance with the dictates of their own peculiar views, yet we strongly object to being coupled with any other body of people with whom we have no affinity. We recognize in all races and creeds a universal brotherhood; we also hold that men and women everywhere are equal in the sight of our Heavenly Father, and are alike objects of his compassionate regard; and as Christian believers, we advocate the gospel teachings that they are all one in Christ Jesus our Lord, we make no distinctions on account of race or sex.

JOHN BELL.

San Jose, Cal., 9th month 1st, 1881.

The Worm at the Root.

"There he is! Do you see?"

"Yes, sir. Why, he's a little fellow to do so much mischief."

"Well, he has done it all."

The trouble was that one of Farmer Judkin's favorite trees seemed likely to die. He could find no reason for it. The tree was yet young, and ought to be in its prime for years to come. The soil about it was rich, so that it could not be starving. There were plenty of warm rains that season, too, and it could not be want of moisture that caused it to droop. Yet somehow it had not been doing well all summer. It started off lively enough in the spring-time, but soon it seemed to grow discouraged. Some of its branches were now almost bare, and many of its leaves were yellow and ready to drop.

The farmer was very fond of his trees. It worried him to see one of them sickly. He thought at first that its bark had been injured by rabbits gnawing at it, but when he looked, he could see no mark of such damage. He then thought that the soil might be losing its richness, and he scattered manure about its roots; but still the tree continued to droop. "There must be a worm at work here," said the good farmer. "I must see about it."

So he took a knife and carefully scraped away the soil at different points around the base of its trunk, and after a little while he found the fellow. It was but a little worm, and yet he was the cause of all the trouble with the beautiful tree. When anything hurts a tree's roots, all the branches are affected by it.

It happened that the farmer's son, who stood by when the worm was found, had not been doing quite right for some time. He was a bright, manly young fellow of about fifteen. He had formerly been very attentive to his duties, fond of his home and of his studies, industrious, kind-hearted and ambitious to excel. But for several months there had been a gradual change coming over him. He had less interest in his studies than before; he was inclined to spend his evenings away from home; he was not so kind and gentle as he used to be to his sisters, nor so respectful toward his parents.

It had given the farmer a great deal more pain to see this change in his son than to see his favorite tree drooping. He had found the cause of the trouble in the tree, and he thought he knew what the trouble was with the boy. There was a worm at his heart too. He was yielding to a secret sinful habit, and it was injuring all his life. The loving father spoke very softly and tenderly, and there were tears in his eyes as he said:

"Do you know, my son, that every time I have seen this tree since it began to droop, it has made me think of you? Until recently your life has been very beautiful, just as this tree was in the early spring, but for some time there has been a change. I have seen things in you that have made me very sad. Your loveliness seems to be fading just as the leaves of this tree have faded. I am not going to say anything more about it, but I want you to think of it yourself, and to try and find out what is the cause of the change. Perhaps there is a worm at your heart. If I had not found this worm and removed it, this tree would soon have been altogether destroyed. One sin eating away in the heart and allowed to remain, will in time destroy the most beautiful life.—Nat. Banner.

Egyptian Royal Mummies.

Thirty royal mummies have been discovered in the "Gate of the Kings," near Thebes, in Egypt. Travelers who ascended the River Nile as far as Luxor remember the long narrow defile at the end of which the tombs of the kings are situated. It has long been suspected that there was probably some great excavation. There were rumors of an untold treasure to be revealed to any one who could procure a firman from the Viceroy permitting him to search, and with a very heavy sum for backsheesh in addition. It may be asked why, if this cavern was known to exist, the natives did not penetrate to it; but it must be remembered that the Arabs are extremely superstitious, and also that they had no mechanical appliances for removing great weights from a gallery two hundred feet long, and a secret passage leading to a pit thirty-five feet deep. But some one, bolder than the rest, made the venture in June last. The discovery was made too late for much profit to be got out of it, for the tourists had ceased passing up the Nile valley.

Daoud Pasha, the Governor of the district, had his attention called to the abundance and cheapness of the objects with which the antique market was suddenly flooded. On inquiry the deep pit was pointed out to him. With commendable promptitude, he telegraphed for Herr Emil Brugsch, the assistant curator of the Bonlark Museum. Every Egyptologist must envy Herr Brugsch for the good fortune which awaited him when he arrived in the Bab el Malook. He must have felt it difficult to believe his eyes. The thirty royal mummies which he found, as he could read at a glance, were those of all the most illustrious monarchs of the most glorious epoch of Egyptian history. There lay, side by side, Queen Hatsasot, King Thotmes III., and King Ramesses II., the great Sesosiris himself. Of kings of minor note were nearly all those of the Eighteenth Dynasty, together with the father and the grandfather of Ramases, and his daughter Maunnege, whose name is new to us. But here the reports may be in error, and the name may be an unusual form of Maunnotem, the grandmother of Pinotem.

The earliest mummy found is that of Raskenen, a king of that obscure dynasty which preceded the Eighteenth and which is sometimes reckoned as the Thirteenth and sometimes as the Seventeenth Dynasty. The latest royal mummy is that of Penotem, the third king of the Twenty-third Dynasty, who reigned about one thousand years before the birth of Christ. In addition to the royal mummies, a multitude of objects bearing cartouches will throw great light upon the succession of these kings. A "cartouch" is the name applied by Champollion to the elliptical ovals on ancient Egyptian monuments, and on papyri, (the manuscripts written on membranes of the papyrus plant) containing groups of characters expressing the names or titles of kings or Pharaohs.

The tent of King Penotem, made of embroidered and colored leather, was found. It was covered with hieroglyphs, which will probably clear up some historical difficulties as to the priest-kings of Thebes.

The significance of this remarkable discovery will be of a double character. Our knowledge of a brilliant period of Egyptian history will be greatly increased by the direct evidence of inscriptions and papyrus-rolls; moreover, some record may be found of the circumstances which led to the concealment in one place of so many of the illustrious dead, whose tombs had already been prepared for them in the Valley of the Kings. How came they to be placed in this cavern? It is more than probable that some great and terrible disaster was impending when the priests of each deceased king—for every king was reckoned as a god—hurriedly took the precious bodies from their original tombs, where they lay too much exposed, and placed them in the secret cavern where they have now been found. Dr. Brugsch thinks that there was a great Assyrian attack upon Egypt, which caused the concealment of these, the most precious of the royal remains of Egypt.

This remarkable discovery is also expected to throw light on that most interesting, but most obscure period, when the petty kings of the South commenced their struggles with the Shepherd Kings of the North, and when the first of a line of Pharaohs who "knew not Joseph" arose to drive out the foreigners.

Many valuable rolls of papyrus have been found with these royal mummies. There is hardly any question respecting the great middle period of Egyptian history, including the Captivity and Exodus of the Israelites, which may not receive its answer through this amazing discovery.—Nat. Bapt.

There are times when a man ought to sit down and face an open question of duty and its dangers. There are times when a new enterprise ought to be looked at in the light of prudence and caution. But when a certain course is decided on as the right one, when duty has been made plain, and a legitimate enterprise is already fairly undertaken, then the less there is of cold calculation as to relative gains or losses, or as to the advantages or disadvantages of pressing forward or of holding back, the better. In doing right, or in being right, an uncalculating spirit is a vast deal better than a calculating spirit.

The following story was told me by the gentleman to whom it happened. He had a butler who fell into habits of intoxication. After threatening him several times with dismissal, the gentleman was compelled, after a very gross case of drunkenness, to send him away. The man implored him to give him a character which would enable him to obtain another place; but this Mr. S. conscientiously refused to do. Time after time, the butler was on the point of obtaining employment but was rejected, when the silence of his master, on the matter of sobriety, betrayed the reason for his dismissal.

At last, the man much impoverished and driven to the wall, wrote a piteous letter to Mr. S., vowing that, if he would but once recommend him, he would take the pledge, and adding that, if he be refused, he had resolved to make an end of himself, as he had no further hope of earning his bread. The master was greatly disturbed by this appeal and only by most painful effort held to his duty of veracity; for weeks afterwards, feigning in every newspaper to read of some tragedy connected with his unfortunate servant.

Years passed, however, before he heard of him again, and then he received a letter from Australia. The ex-butler had become a prosperous and sober man, and wrote to thank his old master for the firmness wherewith he had refused his entreaty. "Had you sent me sir," he said, "to another place, I should have fallen again under the same temptation. You compelled me to break away from my old life, and I was saved." It is an offence to bear false witness in favor of our neighbor, as well as against him.—Cobb's Duties of Women.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Methodism in Germany.—There has been some antagonism manifested of late in Germany, by the State Churches, to the spread of Methodism. In Bavaria a law has been passed putting some restrictions on their religious services. Near Wurtemberg, an attempt was made to break up an open-air meeting that had been advertised to be held on 22nd of 5th month last, in a grove near Freudenstadt. A meeting of the civil and ecclesiastical authorities issued the following interdiction:

"As the holders of the Methodist meeting have received no permission from either the secular or spiritual authorities of the parish, the United Council regard their conduct as unauthorized intrusion upon the territory of others, which has been strictly prohibited by recent legislation on Forestry. The rise of the Methodist sect endangers our ecclesiastical peace. We will not permit the Grunthaus Frutenhofer District to be abused by the spectacle of an American religious fanaticism. The Parish Council energetically prohibit the brutal intrusion of Methodist sectarians in our forest, and we are also opposed to the disturbing performances of the Methodists generally. Therefore concluded: 1. Our paper must not announce an open-air meeting of the Methodists again; 2. The police prohibit said meeting of Methodists, either in the forest or open air."

In consequence of this decision, the meeting was held on private grounds, near the place originally designed.

Large Bequest.—A woman named Lapsle

New Albany, Ind., has left about $300,000 the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Disestablishment.—Another ecclesiastical establishment is doomed, that in the island of ylon. Lord Kimberley has made the announcement that the existing ecclesiastical subsidies in that part of our Empire were to be withdrawn, the withdrawal, however, to be done gradually, but to be completed at the end of five years. All who know anything of Ceylon know what a curse these subsidies have been. There are only 10,000 Anglicans in the island—the population of which is two and a half millions—and yet they have had a bishop, an archdeacon, four principal chaplains, and several junior chaplains, subsidized by the government to the extent of £14,000 a year. The clergy of the Presbyterian Church have also been subsidized. Now that these gentlemen are to be reduced, politically, to the rank of Nonconformists, we believe it will be better for the cause of peace and quietness, and better, too, for the progress of that religion which establishments always retard rather than help.—Baptist (London). There is a peculiar religious sect in Russia which is characterized by rare purity of doctrine and practice, endeavoring to live in the best possible conformity with the letter of Scripture. No member is permitted to possess any property beyond the frugal needs of existence. Purity and chastity are among their first requirements. It sufficiently describes the brutal character of the surrounding population to say that the followers of this sect have been subject to much suffering and persecution.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Novel Mode of Catching Fish.—As E. F. F. was travelling in South Africa, the party encamped one night by a stream with several fine deep pools, which looked as if they must be full of fish. He says: "In vain I tried them with various tempting baits; at last, our patience being exhausted, we determined to resort to a poacher's trick much in vogue in rivers where no one ever fishes. The apparatus is very simple. Just a flask of powder, with a long hollow reed containing a fuse, fixed into the mouth of the flask, and a cork, and firmly lashed over with tow and grease, to prevent any moisture penetrating to the powder. This was placed in the pool; and to keep it in its position, as the pool was too deep for it to reach the bottom, we fixed two pieces of board across to the top of the reed. The flask was now some three feet below the surface, the top of the reed and fuse high and dry, and supported by the boards.

As match was then applied to the fuse, and the poachers retired to watch the effects, the fuse took so long to burn that we began to think it had gone out, when the whole pool seemed to fly up in a shower of foam; and finally, as it again subsided, the bodies of the slain appeared on the surface, and were left a little lower down, where the stream was shallow. The yellow fish are the usual ones, as the barbel and eels generally lie buried up in the deep slime, and escape the force of the concussion. The bodies of the fish show no marks of violence, and they will recover and swim off unharmed."

Do Bees Injure Fruit?—The editor of the Lancaster (Pa.) Farmer has been watching his grape-vines, and gives the following as the result of his observations:

"No opinion seems to be more generally prevalent than that bees tear open the outer skins of grapes, plums, peaches, and other fruits, for the purpose of feasting on the sweet juices within. Because they are found on these fruits in the act of committing a trespass, they are condemned without a hearing, or any consideration whatever. It is most commonly said they sting the fruit. This is the result of sheer ignorance.

"On the grapes of a vine growing in my yard hundreds of bees were literally swarming, their home being in a neighbor's yard not twenty paces distant. We sat hour after hour watching closely the proceedings of the industrious insects. There was not a single raceme on the whole vine but was visited by dozens of bees, who examined every grape on it in search of a bursted one whose juices were accessible. After a most careful search, and finding none such, they would immediately leave and continue their search elsewhere until the berry they desired was found. On all the defective fruit clusters of bees were gathered, but we failed utterly in detecting in a single instance anything like an attempt at trying to tear open a perfect berry."

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 1, 1881.

The Christian Worker of 8th mo. 25th, comments upon some editorial remarks on the subject of prayer, which appeared in our columns under date of 8th mo. 20th. After quoting the teaching of our Saviour that "men ought always to pray and not to faint," and the corresponding exhortation of the apostle, "Pray without ceasing," it says:

"If, then, we are to pray without ceasing, can we not, at stated times, give vocal utterance to our petitions. If we have enough of the Spirit to pray acceptably to God in secret, have we not enough of it to pray vocally in our families? In the prayer which Jesus taught his disciples it is said: 'Give us this day our daily bread,' 'this' implies, we think, unmistakably that this is to be a daily prayer. Daniel prayed three times a day, we presume at stated periods, and the Lord heard and honored his prayers. Peter and John went up to the temple to pray at a stated time."

We believe all Friends can unite in the belief that prayer is an indispensable duty; and that every true Christian must live in that state of mind in which his heart continually turns to his Heavenly Father, seeking in filial submission for a knowledge of his will, and strength to perform it; and for ability to offer up to Him the sacrifices of thanksgiving.

So far as the Apostle's command to "pray without ceasing" is of daily and hourly application, we believe it refers to this devotional frame of mind, and not to the utterance of words of prayer. Such utterance is of no value unless it be immediately prompted by the Spirit.

The Christian Worker enunciates a true doctrine when it says: "We do not believe that any man can really pray to God without the Spirit, whether it be secretly or vocally." But we think it errs in supposing that a Christian can command that measure of Divine assistance which is presupposed, when vocal prayers are determined upon beforehand at stated times. The Spirit bloweth where it listeth; and many have experienced that its sensible presence is often withheld, so as to humble us under a sense of our own dependence and helplessness.

The Society of Friends has ever maintained the doctrine, that the ability to approach the Lord in availing prayer comes from his Spirit, that of ourselves we are unable to do it, that therefore we must wait upon Him in reverence and retirement of mind for knowledge and strength to pray aright. It has from time to time proclaimed its belief, that those prayers, "which," as Robert Barclay says, "man sets about in his own will, and at his own appointment, which he can both begin and end at his pleasure, do leave undone as himself seeth meet," "are now to be denied and rejected and separated from."

Hence, the advices issued by our Society press upon us the importance of retirement of mind, of waiting upon the Lord in Spirit, that we may be qualified to pray unto Him. The London Printed Epistle of 1821, says: "There ought to be no relaxation in the great duty of watchfulness unto prayer."

Robert Barclay, in speaking of those who have set times for praying and showing the mistake which such make, says, that prayer is two-fold, inward and outward. "Inward prayer is that secret turning of the mind towards God, whereby, being secretly touched and awakened by the Light of Christ in the conscience, and so bowed down under the sense of its iniquities, unworthiness and misery, it looks up to God, and joining with the secret shinnings of the seed of God, it breathes towards Him, and is constantly breathing forth some secret desires and aspirations towards Him. It is in this sense we are so frequently in Scripture commanded to pray continually, which cannot be understood of outward prayer, because it were impossible that men should be always upon their knees, expressing words of prayer; and this would hinder them from the exercise of those duties no less positively commanded.

"Outward prayer is, when as the spirit, being thus in the exercise of inward retirement, and feeling the breathing of the Spirit of God to arise powerfully in the soul, receives strength and liberty, by a superadded motion and influence of the Spirit, to bring forth either audible sighs, groans or words, and that either in public assemblies, or in private, or at meat, &c."

"Because this outward prayer depends upon the inward, as that which must follow it, and cannot be acceptably performed but as attended with a superadded influence and motion of the Spirit, therefore cannot we prefix set times to pray outwardly, so as to lay a necessity to speak words at such and such times, whether we feel this heavenly influence and assistance or no; for that we judge were a tempting of God, and a coming before Him without due preparation."

As we are writing principally for members of the Society of Friends who are supposed to believe in its doctrines, we may be excused from going further into this subject. But we would recommend to those who feel the need of further information, to read carefully the 11th Proposition of Barclay's Apology "concerning worship."

We have received a communication from Iowa, written before the decease of our late President, which refers to the prayers offered by many thousands (we doubt not with great sincerity) for his recovery, if consistent with the Divine will.

The tender feelings of our correspondent have been awakened for the wretched criminal who was the instrument of the Evil one in bringing so much distress upon the nation. In view of the awful situation of one who is left to his own wicked devices, and who does not experience his sins to go beforehand to judgment and to be blotted out, on sincere repentance, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus; she feels that he also needs the prayers of the righteous. And she brings to view the forgiving spirit of our Saviour, who enjoined his followers to love their enemies, and who prayed for the forgiveness of his executioners.

That "The way of the transgressor is hard" is abundantly shown by the experience of this miserable man, confined in the cell of a prison, and tormented in mind by fears of personal violence, as well as by a guilty conscience.

CORRECTION.—In our last number (7) the printer neglected to change the date of issue in the heading. It should have been 9th mo. 24th, instead of 9th mo. 17th. We hope none of our readers will be inconvenienced by the mistake.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The remains of President Garfield were removed from Long Branch on Fourth-day the 21st inst., to Washington, where it lay in state in the rotunda of the Capitol until 5 o'clock on Sixth-day the 23d. They were then taken to Cleveland, Ohio, and on Second-day were taken to Lake View Cemetery and placed in the vault, where they will remain under guard until the grave is ready to receive them. The relations between the nation's friends, and of sympathy for the bereaved family, were general from nearly all parts of the country, and also from foreign parts, Great Britain more especially. Much real religious feeling was also apparent, and the desire widely pervaded the people that the dispensation might be a means of reforming much that is evil among us.

Dr. D. S. Lamb, of Washington, who, as an expert, was called upon to perform the surgical part of the autopsy on the body of President Garfield, said to a newspaper reporter in Washington, that the preliminary report of the examination "showed three things—the location of the lesion, the error of the first diagnosis, and the fact that the President did not suffer from pyæmia." Dr. Bliss said that "in the light of the facts revealed by the autopsy, there never was a chance of recovery."

President Arthur has issued a proclamation calling for a national fast, to be observed, on the 10th day of Tenth month, at 12 o'clock noon.

The hostile Indians in Arizona are surrendering to the military.

Owing to the continued drought, the wood fires in Northwestern New York are still spreading, and causing great destruction. Much of the soil being peat, the fires burrow to a depth of two or three feet, and the crops and railroad ties, as well as trees, fences, telegraph poles, and farm buildings, have been destroyed. The burning district lies along the railroads between Buffalo and Rochester, and Buffalo and Batavia.

A tornado struck Elmira, New York, at half-past four o'clock First-day afternoon. It lasted only two minutes, but in that time nearly every street was rendered impassable by fallen trees. The Rathbone House, the Palace car shops, and a number of other buildings were unroofed, two church-steeple, and dozens of chimneys were blown down, and several brick buildings "had holes blown clear through them, scattering the bricks in all directions." No lives were lost, and only one person, a man who was blown from his buggy, is reported seriously injured. A torrent of rain fell and much damage throughout the city by entering the houses, the pipes being incompetent to carry it off. It is said the storm was preceded by an earthquake shock.

The streets were full of people when the tempest burst, and great consternation prevailed.

A tornado, accompanied by terrific rain, thunder and lightning, passed over Quincy, Illinois, on Seventh-day afternoon, destroying property to the amount of $100,000, killing four persons, and injuring thirteen others. The track of the tempest was two miles wide, and the streets of Quincy are strewn with the debris from buildings damaged or destroyed. The city of Quincy, Ill., is a city of 10,000 people. Pa., was destroyed by fire about midnight First-day night. All the students escaped. It originated in the dark-room used for photographic processes in the Sixth month last, since which time it has not been opened. An explosion preceded the issuing of flames from the building. All the out-buildings were also destroyed. The damage is roughly estimated at $350,000, the burned building and its contents being insured for $150,000. The Board of Managers decided to retain the present organization, and to continue the business of the college as soon as proper quarters can be obtained.

At two o'clock in the morning of the 20th inst., Washington time, Professor Barnard, at Nashville, discovered a bright telescopic comet. It is in seven hours forty-six minutes right ascension, and thirteen degrees twenty-eight minutes north declination, with a daily motion of three degrees northeast. Professor Swift, of Rochester, at one o'clock the same morning, caught a view of the long expected Encke's comet near Beta Aurigæ. Four comets are now visible by the aid of telescopes in the sky.

A mine of semi-bituminous coal, resembling cannel, has been opened on the Rio Grande, about twenty miles above Laredo, Texas. The coal, it is said, "is easily lighted with a match, and will burn until entirely consumed." About 300 tons have been taken out, and a branch railroad is being built from Laredo to the mine.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health, states that 340 deaths occurred in this city last week, 67 more than during the corresponding week of last year, and five less than during the week ending 9th month 17th, 1881. Of the whole number 162 were males and 178 females; 47 died of consumption, 24 of marasmus, 20 of convulsions of the kind of Healy's Markets, dec.—U. S. 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.

Cotton continues quiet. Sales of middlings are reported at 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white at 7½ & 8 cts. for export, and 8½ & 9 cts. for home use. The market is in fair request and firm. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7.37½ & $7.75 for clear, and at $7.75 & $8.25 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $7.25 & $7.50; western do. at $7.25 & $8.25, and patents at $8.25 & $9. Rye flour is steady at $3.25 & $3.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat in fair demand, and prices were a fraction higher. Sales of 5000 bushels red at $1.46. Rye is firm at $1.10 for Pennsylvania. Corn is in steady demand and a shade higher. Sales of 9000 bushels, including yellow, at 73 & 74 cts.; mixed at 73 cts. and rejected at 71 & 72 cts. Oats are in good demand and higher. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including white at 47½ & 49 cts., and rejected at 46 & 48 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 9th day 17th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 340; loads of straw, 43. Average prices for the week: Hay, $1.15 to $1.35; straw, $1.50 to $1.60; 100 pounds; mixed, $1.25 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; Straw, $1.10 to $1.15 per 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—The Scottish Chamber of Agriculture have drafted a scheme for a land bill for Scotland, providing for an adjustment of rent by arbitration, a regulation of farms, and for power in a tenant to sell his holding.

A Dublin correspondent of the Times says: "There is a prospect of a splendid harvest, but the general aspect of the country is such as no loyal man can look upon without the deepest concern."

A dispatch to the Times from St. Petersburg says the ukase just issued is a confirmation of the autocratic principle, which is specially referred to at the end of the document, and is a practical application of the dictatorial regime.

Marston, a member of a well-known publishing firm, who has been ill, died at his residence on Sixth-day afternoon, at 7½ o'clock. He was 71 years of age. He was a member of the African explorer, died Congo river, Seventh month 4th, in which the writer says he was seriously sick all through Fifth month—so seriously that on the fifteenth day of his illness he gave, as he thought, his last orders to his European companions, but the crisis passed, and he is now strong and healthy.

Bombay, 9th mo. 25th.—A report has been received here that Ayob Khan was defeated by the Amerians, and has fled to Herat, abandoning his guns and baggage. The desertion of two of his regiments decided the action. The Amerians have not yet entered Candahar, but the city is defenceless.

Bush fires are still raging in the Nipissing district of Ontario, doing great damage. The fire, in a portion of the French river and the Muscogee districts, are described as "fearful."

The bush fires in the country around Kingston, Ontario, have been extinguished by heavy rain.

There were 358 deaths from yellow fever at Bridge-town, Barbadoes, during Eighth month, in a population of 37,000. The fever was increasing at last counts.

RECEIPTS.

Received from W. A. Boone, Pa., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua L. Harmer, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joseph G. Evans and Samuel A. Willis, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Jason A. Hibbs, La., $2.10, vol. 55; from John S. Lowry, City, $2, vol. 55, and for John S. Lowry, $2.10, vol. 55; from Amy J. Brooks and Mere H. Jones, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Jason Perse and William Masters, Or., per James R. Klu Amer, $2.10 each, vol. 55; from George Stokes, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; for Margaretta J. Mercer, Hannah W. Harry, and Mary Ann Wickersham, Pa., $2.10 each, vol. 55, and B. Frank Wickham, Neb., $1.05, to N. 27, vol. 55; from Miriam French, Or., $2.10, vol. 55; from William B. Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Joshua Taylor, Mich., $2.10, vol. 55; from Stacy Haines, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from George F. Wood, N. Y., $2.10, vol. 55; from Thomas Driver, Cal., $2.10, vol. 55; from Rebecca P. Brooks, City, 2, vol. 55; from Amasa L. Negus, Or., $2.10, vol. 55; from Charles Jones and Mary Ann Jones, Gin., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Dr. S. Mason McCallin, City, $2, vol. 55; from Samuel Morris, Pa., $2.10, to N. 27, vol. 56; from Edward Richie, City, and Edward B. Richie, N. J., $2.10 each, vol. 55; from Mary and Edith L. Fox, Pa., per J. T. Ballinger, Amer, $2.10, vol. 55; from Jan H. Pickering, N. J., $2.10, vol. 55; from Lloyd H. Baderton, Md., $2.10, vol. 55, and for George Baderton $2.10, vol. 55.

CHANGE OF TIME.

By direction of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends the meetings for worship held at Media, Pa., on an after 2d of Tenth month, will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning, both on First and Fourth-days.

WESTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee who have charge of this institution met in Philadelphia on Sixth-day, 9th month 30d at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Admissions and the Committee on Instruction met on the same day, at 9 A. M.

The Visiting Committee met on Second-day, Second-day evening, 9th mo. 26th. For the accommodation of this committee, conveyances will be in waiting at Street Station on the arrival of trains which leave Philadelphia at 2.30 and 5 P. M.

WM. EVANS, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

THE WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, 10th mo. 31st, 1881. Parents and others intending to send pupils are requested to make early application to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Sup't., (address, Westtown, Or., Chester, Pa.), or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

DIED on the 9th of 7th mo., 1881, at Ocean Beach, N. J., JANE S. COMFORT, aged 68 years, a member at overseer of Frankfort Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was finally attached to the original doctrines and practices of our religious Society, and the patient quietness of spirit which marked her last illness, at her peaceful close, afford to her relatives and friends the consoling belief that she is forever at rest.

—, at his residence, on the morning of the 13th 9th mo. 1881, JOHN L. LEMER, an esteemed member a elder of Norwiche Monthly Meeting of Friends, Oct. aged 90 years, 3 months and 6 days. This dear Friend came into the Society of Friends by conviction in early life; and was, by the assistance of Divine Grace made helpful to the Society in many ways; and was faithfully attached to its principles and testimonies, and was a true and devoted member of our Society. His close was peaceful, like one quiet falling asleep.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 8, 1881.

NO. 9.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Music in Friends' Houses.

There is a possibility of seeing errors into which we may have almost insensibly slid, and, at the same time, there may be wanting sufficient resolution or strength to emanate ourselves from the unholy thralldom. In other words, as the poet represents, "may "See the right, approve it too;

And yet the wrong pursue."

These thoughts have especial application to the subject of music now being treated of when we look all around, and especially when we consider the talent of influence over others responsibly committed to us, with the inane which will be looked for by all heaven's eyes, it is truly a matter of wonder that members of religious consideration in our Society do not see and realize the waste and expense there is in this amusement, ostensibly taken up to delight the senses and to pass away the tediousness of time.

Whenever the writer has gone into families where the piano or other instruments of music formed a part of the household appliance, there has always been noticed conformity to the world in other branches of our testimonies; such as fashionable furniture, gaudy in apparel, or richness of adornment set off with pearls or jewelry, &c., so that would be difficult to decide which was cause and which was effect—whether the worldly spirit introduced the piano, or the piano was the exhibition of the worldly spirit.

The testimony of this Society has ever been distinct such superfluity and such pastimes; and upon that testimony being recently repeated and confirmed by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, one, at least, of its members had his instrument removed from his house, as was a due deference, and praise-worthy descension; and which, there is no doubt, added its reward of peace. If so be there are others who are almost prepared for a like vision, yet who lack resolution thus to carry into consistent practice a clearly conceived requisition of our Discipline; or, if any of us who yet so in league with spirit of the world as vainly to try "To pacify things in their nature discordant," to make the gratifications and pleasures of sense harmonize with the holy self-denial and heavenly example of our blessed Lord and Lawgiver; may these duly ponder the contaminating influence they are exerting over their children, over their families, over those that visit them, with, also, as respects the Church, the fearful rebuking record, "He that breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him."

The great proportion of youthful life which indulgence in this amusement swallows up, causes it to be the fruitful source of more mischief than is usually suspected. Moreover, as has sometimes been the case, defects in domestic knowledge, in social duties, in general literature, are attributed to and excused, because of the alleged priority of claim of this absorbing "accomplishment," as it is called. The grave consideration that our time is not our own, but that it, with our talents, our influence, and our all, have to be accounted for before an omniscient and just Judge, who, without respect of persons, will require a strict account, should surely induce the serious inquiry whether an amusement which fills up no inconsiderable portion of life's little span, is not calculated rather to starve out better feelings and resolutions than to promote them! Whether an unwise devotion to such stimulating but unsubstantial entertainment without a due equivalent of moral good, with all its alleged symphony and attractiveness, does not leave the heart weaker and more a prey to the illusions of fancy and the beguiling temptations of the world!

The expensiveness of pianos is another serious objection to them; when so much more useful applications of the money might be made. In 1861, the annual sale of these in the United States was estimated at from twelve to fifteen millions of dollars.

Those whose hearts are allied to the world, and who have an itching ear for musical entertainment, will not be likely to give much heed to remarks like these, calculated to depreciate and strip of its enchantments one of their favorite idols; but the hope is cherished that the voice of the Church will be listened to and heeded, as admonitively conveyed in the testimony:—

"We would renewedly caution all our members against indulging in music, or having instruments of music in their houses, believing that the practice tends to promote a light and vain mind, and to disqualify for the serious thoughtfulness, which becomes an accountable being, hastening to his final reckoning. When we consider that our days pass swiftly away, and that our time is one of the talents committed to our trust, for the employment of which we shall have to render an account in the day of judgment, it becomes us to be living as strangers and pilgrims upon earth, seeking a better country, and to be diligently using it for the great end for which it is lent to us, even in working out the soul's salvation in fear and trembling, and not in vain amusements or corrupting pleasures, but striving that 'whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we may do all to the glory of God;' that 'God in all things may be glorified by us, through Jesus Christ our Lord.'"

"The spirit and language of the discipline forbid the use of music by Friends, without any exception in favor of that called sacred; and in order to produce harmonious action on this subject throughout the subordinate meetings, the Yearly Meeting instructs them, that those members who indulge in the use of music, or who have musical instruments in their houses, bring themselves within the application of this Discipline, viz: 'And if any of our members fall into either of these practices, and are not prevailed with, by private labor to decline them, the Monthly Meetings to which the offenders belong should be informed thereof, and if they be not reclaimed by further labor, so as to condemn their misconduct to the satisfaction of the meeting, it should proceed to testify our disunity with them.'"

For "The Friend."

Opium Trade in China.

A letter from Li Hung Chang, a Chinese statesman, to the Secretary of the Anglo-Oriental Society for the suppression of the opium trade, contains some striking passages, which can scarcely fail to touch the consciences of some of the English people, whose government has long stood in the way of the efforts of Chinese statesmen to repress the serious evils flowing from the use of opium.

The letter says: "Opium is a subject in the discussion of which England and China can never meet on common ground. China views the whole question from a moral standpoint; England from a fiscal. England would sustain a source of revenue in India, while China contends for the lives and prosperity of her people. The ruling motive with China is to repress opium by heavy taxation everywhere; whereas with England the manifest object is to make opium cheaper, and thus increase and stimulate the demand in China.

"With motives and principles so radically opposite, it is not surprising that the discussion commenced at Chefoo in 1876 has up to the present time been fruitless of good results. The whole record of this discussion shows that inducement and persuasion have been used in behalf of England to prevent any additional taxation of opium in China, and objections made to China exercising her undoubted right to regulate her own taxes—at least, with regard to opium.

"I may take the opportunity to assert here, once for all, that the single aim of my Government in taxing opium will be in the future, as it has always been in the past, to repress the traffic—never the desire to gain revenue from such a source. Having failed to kill a serpent, who would be so rash as to nurse it in its bosom? If it be thought that China countenances the import for the revenue it brings, it should be known that my Government will gladly cut off all such revenue in order to stop the import of opium. My Sovereign has never desired his empire to thrive upon the lives or infirmities of his subjects."

The Widow of Shiloh.

A REMINISCENCE, BY BENSON J. LOSSING.

In the bosom of a stately forest, and not far from Pittsburgh landing on the left bank of the Tennessee river, in Hardin county, Tennessee, stood a modest meeting-house at the beginning of April, 1862. It was the place for the public worship of the little Shiloh church, and seemed to be, as its name implied, a "peaceable" retreat for an ark of the covenant, while war raged elsewhere. Yet Gilgal was as "peaceable."

This meeting-house was very small, built of unhewn logs, and had three small windows and a door. Its seats were rude slabs; its pulpit was a deal table, on which lay a small Bible and hymn-book; its organ was the divine human voice; and the preacher was as plain as his surroundings. He taught a Sunday school of a dozen girls and boys of mixed colors, and gave spiritual comfort to a widely scattered congregation.

On Sunday morning, April 6, 1862, neither preacher nor Sunday-school pupils were there, for thousands of armed men—defenders of their country—were at Shiloh. General Sherman's division lay just back of the meeting-house; and between him and the river were the tents of many regiments. The night had been rainy, but the firmament was bright at dawn. There was no suspicion that an enemy was near; no one imagined that within sixty minutes that beautiful forest just changing to "living green" with delicate leaflets, would be filled with sulphurous smoke, and the songs of the mocking-bird and cuckoo be exchanged for the awful chorus of battle.

At daybreak, while many officers were slumbering, others were dressing, and others were eating breakfast, and the arms and accoutrements of soldiers were strewn around in disorder, the wild cry of flying pickets rushing into camp,—"The rebels are here!" followed by the scream and crash of bomb-shells and cannon-balls, and the whistle of bullets as they flew on deadly errands through the tents and the forest, heralded a terrible battle that raged more than thirty hours. The Confederates had crept silently up from the direction of Corinth, during a dark and rainy night, and surprised the National Army. During that fierce conflict the logs of Shiloh meeting-house were thrown into a confused heap. Round shots and shells had shattered many vigorous oaks; and almost twenty thousand men killed or wounded were laid upon the altar as a human sacrifice to the demon of horrid war.

Just four years later I visited that dreadful battle-field. Again the delicate young leaflets heralding the coming summer were softening the rugged winter aspect of the forest. I had traveled all the previous night in a railway coach from Meridian to Corinth, in Mississippi; had spent the forenoon in the latter border village (then surrounded by dismantled military earth-works), visiting points of interest, and had journeyed in a light carriage from Corinth to Shiloh, eighteen miles, with a young Confederate ex-soldier as driver. He had fought in the battle with Hardee, was acquainted with the localities of the conflict, and was an intelligent guide; yet he was puzzled sometimes at forks of the road to determine the right way, for the heavy heel of war had trodden down farm-houses, fences, groves, and other landmarks, and left a path of utter desolation the whole distance. Even the little hamlet of Monterey was no more.

The roads had been badly washed by rains, causeways across swamps were broken, and it was twilight when we reached the ruins of the poor widow Ray's dwelling, not far from Shiloh meeting-house. It was at the parting of the ways leading to Pittsburg and Hamburg landings. From Monterey to that point we had seen only a few dilapidated log-cabins, and were wondering, as the night was coming on, where we should find supper and lodging, when a woman on a gaunt gray horse, with a six-year-old boy seated behind her on the horse, came down the Hamburg road and turned into the Pittsburg road. We hailed her, and asked:

"Can you direct us to the nearest house where we may find entertainment for ourselves and our horse for the night?"

"My house is much the nearest one—only two miles ahead," she answered; but I have nothing fit for entertaining gentlemen."

"We want only shelter, and a little food to-night and in the morning," we said.

"You are welcome to what little I can give," she replied. "Follow me," and she started her horse off on a brisk trot.

It was dark when we reached the dwelling of the hospitable woman. It consisted of two small log-cabins not a rod apart, in open woodland. We were greeted by several wondering children on our arrival, the eldest, a boy of fourteen, taking care of our horse. We found we were near the centre of the battle-ground of Shiloh, and close by the spot where McClelland had his camp when the conflict began on Sunday morning.

We remained outside in the soft evening air and light of a young moon while the good woman prepared supper. She lighted her only lamp, a small, flat, tin dish with a little oil and a bit of candle-wick in it, raked away the ashes from some embers, and mixed some corn-meal with water into paste, and baked it on a board before the fire. Our supper was spread upon a small pine table, and we were seated, one upon a half-bottomed chair, the other upon a rough box, while six really pretty children, half naked but tidy, stood around their mother. Then, for the first time, we fully saw the face of our hostess. She appeared to be less than forty years of age, with a sweet, sad countenance serene with the spirit of resignation. There were many traces of early beauty in her face and form. She and her boys and girls seemed to be struggling for the right to live.

When we had finished our supper of bacon and corn-bread without butter, with coffee without milk or sugar, and the children had been put to bed somewhere, our kind friend gave us a brief account of her life. She came from Illinois, and was a school teacher in southern Tennessee a few years, when she married an excellent young man. They joined their financial means and bought the tract of land on which she was living. Being mostly covered with woods they struggled hard but hopefully in clearing and cultivating a part of the soil. They were healthy and happy. Children blessed them; and, in time, they had four of them in the Sunday-school of Shiloh church, of which she and her husband were members. They were the chief teachers in the Sunday-school. There was a day-school a mile away, to which they sent their older children, for the mother had not time to educate them properly herself.

They prospered in a small way and the future appeared promising. Then a cloud appeared in the serene firmament of their lives. It grew rapidly until it darkened their household. The husband, exposed to a cold rain-storm, was seized with pulmonary consumption. He lay sick and sinking all winter, and when, in March, 1862, the National troops began to gather in their neighborhood, he was struggling with the last enemy of mortals. On the first of April an officer from McClelland's camp, from his native town in Illinois, advised her to move from the neighborhood, as a battle might occur there. Her husband was too ill to be removed with safety, and they remained praying earnestly that the dread evil might be averted. When, on Sunday morning, the Confederates suddenly attacked Sherman and Prentiss, the same kind officer proposed to assist the family in removing to a place of safety, and offered an ambulance for the use of the sick man.

"My poor husband was dying," said the widow, "and it was too late. When the cannons began to roar, and the battle was evidently drawing nearer, we all hovered around the bed,—the six children and I,—and prayed earnestly for protection. At length a bomb shell carried away the upper part of a tree near the house, and the fragment fell heavily on the roof. A moment afterward a cannon ball went crashing through the house, passing out over the bed whereon my husband lay. I thought the next ball would slay my children, and my heart failed; but in a moment I felt sudden strength. I remembered how, with God's help, the three Hebrews passed through the fiery furnace of the Babylonian king untouched, for the angel of the Lord was with them, and felt sure the same merciful hand would save us. I rose from my knees to tell my husband of my hope and faith, but his spirit had taken its flight."

"O sir," continued this stricken widow, "was so full of the joy given me by my faith that my children's lives would be spared, that I could not weep! I felt so sure of safety that I no longer felt fear, and I calmly prepared my husband's body for burial, with the help of a good Christian colored woman, who had remained with me, for she loved us both."

All that day and until late in the afternoon of the next day the battle raged furiously, and almost incessantly, and cannon-balls went plunging and fiery shells went screaming in all directions through the woods; yet no another touched that dwelling, conserved, as it was, by a Christian's death as a Christian's prayer of faith. When the battle ceased, and the Confederates, defeated, moved toward Corinth, some Union troops assisted in burying the body of the departed soldier of Christ.

"My husband died, but my children were spared," said this widowed mother; "but God only knows what will become of them in this desolated country, without a school church. Our meeting-house is a pile of logs; our school-house was burned for fuel;

a little farm has been swept clean of everything that was valuable, and I have no one to help me but that good boy,—God bless him!—who is only fourteen years old." Then her blue eyes beamed with emotions of joy, when she said: "But I must not forget the words of the Psalmist: 'I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread.' God will be my husband and the father of my little flock."

I was conducted to a bed in the little cabin separated from the one in which we had supper and conversed, and I was soon sleeping soundly. I awoke at dawn. My first, half-startling impression was that I had heard a distant polishing boots; the next moment I discovered that it was the sound of pigs tramping the floor of my bed-room, rubbing against the timbers. I found, also, that in an adjoining room our horse was stabled. Before the sun arose I was out on that battlefield upon which I had slept. In every direction the trees were scarred, splintered, bereft of branches by shells and balls, and everywhere fragments of cast-off accoutrements might be seen. The morning was brisk in its stimulating air, its glowing radiance, as the rays of the sun shot through the timbered forest, and the matin songs of numbered cuckoos and scores of mocking-birds.
Then, the night before, I sat in that dingy in, listening to the tale of woe from our old hostess, and looked upon the sweet, sad and that lonely, suffering, educated and noble woman, with her six pretty girls and her made utterly desolate by the war, I could only find a space in my heart for propriety towards those who had caused it.
The sleep, the exhilaration of the sweet morning air, the repose of the spirit promoted the songs of birds, the ministrations of the beauties of nature, and especially the recollection of the beautiful spirit of forgiveness which pervaded the utterances of faith in the love and justice of the bereaved mother, heightened the prayer, spontaneously, rather, forgive them; for they knew not that they were doing."

"Let the dead Past bury its dead."

Our morning meal was similar to our supper, with the addition of a boiled chicken and the tender onion-tops as a relish. We then went over a greater portion of the famous battle-ground from Pittsburg Landing to Shiloh meeting-house, and returning to our lodging-place, and amply remunerating our good woman for her entertainment, bade farewell. We hastened back to Corinth, strong horse taking us to the village in order to allow me to proceed eastward in the train to Iuka Springs.

It is more than fifteen years since I slept the battle-field of Shiloh. The question often comes to my mind, "How fares it in the good widow of Shiloh and her boys girls, all men and women if living?" The answer is silent.—S. S. Times.

I will govern my life and my thoughts as the whole world were to see the one and the other; for what does it signify to keep anything a secret to my neighbor, when God (who is the searcher of our hearts) all privacies are open?"

Politics and Morality.

In his capacity as an ordinary citizen, any man has a right to hold (free from inquiry by others) any religious or non-religious opinions that he chooses; and his private life, so long as it does not lead to a violation of the country's laws, is a matter between himself and God only. But when a man asks his fellow-citizens to place him in authority over them as a legislator, the position is altered.
Opinions affect character. Character affects action. It is idle to suppose that a bad man can be trusted to be a good law-maker. Had honor and uprightness entered more into the composition of our National Legislature, the subject of the shameful opium traffic with China would not have been treated almost exclusively on the degrading and unrighteous ground of expediency on our part, much as thieves would debate the expediency of restoring property they had stolen.

In regard to every Christian citizen, it is not only his right—it is his duty—to extend his inquiry to the moral fitness of any candidate who seeks his suffrages, and to refuse to support a morally bad man, no matter what political views he may profess. The righteousness which exalteth a nation cannot be promoted by ungodly men. Nor can their position if elected be neutral. If they do not promote righteous government, they will retard it. It cannot be right to help to place a bad man in power.

But it may be asked—In cases where both opposing candidates are ungodly men, but one professes certain political views with which a Christian elector accords, is he under such circumstances to withhold his vote?
Certainly, even although the absence of that vote might decide not merely that particular election, but the advent to power of a political party. Under no circumstances is it permissible for a Christian to do evil that good may come of it. Let him do his duty, and leave the result to God. Let him do his duty, un-swayed by considerations of expediency, and leave the issue of events to Him who overruleth in the affairs of men. Where both candidates are unrighteous men, it is not for the Christian citizen to "choose between two evils." He may not make a choice of evil.
It is for him to withhold his hand from both.
—A. S. Dyer in British Friend.

"To Bathy Monthly Meeting, First mo., 1821.

"Dear Friends,—I trust that none of my dearly beloved Friends will attribute the brevity of this letter to anything short of the true cause; neither absence nor distance have in any degree lessened my love or diminished my regard for you.

"Can the children of the bridegroom fast while the bridegroom is with them? As long as they have the bridegroom with them they cannot fast. But the days will come when the bridegroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days."

"To you who have experimentally witnessed the truth of this saying of the Saviour of men, it is unnecessary to say more than that these days are my days; the days are indeed come when strippedness and weakness are all that I seem to possess. Should there be any of my dear brethren and sisters alike circumstanced, it is with me to say, for the encouragement of such, (although destitute of myself of any claim, and totally unworthy of partaking thereof,) that if this humiliating, though purifying dispensation be patiently abode under, the result will be unspeakably glorious.

Mourning will be turned into joy; the painful, and, perhaps protracted fast will become a precious and delightful feast, even "a feast of fat things, of wine on the lees, well refined;
'know ye what I have done to you?' will be sensibly understood; and a language will be excited by gratitude and love similar in kind to that of Simon Peter, when the dear Master silenced his objections by explaining the terms of apostleship, 'Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head.'

"The tree of the field sustains no injury by the wintry season's rest, on the contrary, it is invigorated, if sap remains in the root. So the foregoing dispensation, if the precious life remains, however low and hidden it may be, tends only to strengthen and establish the humble Christian more firmly in the heavenly vine; and when the spring of life and love is permitted to return, buds and blossoms will again appear, and new fruit will be brought forth by these chosen ones, which will lastingly remain, to the praise and glory of the great and good Husbandman and their own eternal peace.

"Let me remind my dear friends, of every age and class, that another year hath passed swiftly over our heads; this intimation is accompanied by an earnest desire that as days are multiplied and years increase, an increase of heavenly treasure may be ours, through an increasing knowledge of the only true God and his Son Jesus Christ.

"I remain your affectionate friend,

"DANIEL WHEELER."

A Lion Encounter.—During the early part of David Livingstone's sojourn in Africa, when located as a missionary among the Bakata, the village was much annoyed by a company of lions, which leaped into the cattle-pens by night and destroyed their cows.
They even attacked the herds in open day, which is an unusual occurrence. The effort to be freed from these dangerous animals is thus narrated by Livingstone himself:

"It is well known that if one of a troop of lions is killed, the others take the hint and leave that part of the country. So, the next time the herds were attacked, I went with the people, in order to encourage them to rid themselves of the annoyance by destroying one of the marauders. We found the lions on a small hill about a quarter of a mile in length, and covered with trees. A circle of men was formed round it, and they gradually closed up, ascending pretty near to each other.
Being down below on the plain with a native schoolmaster, named Mchabwe, a most excellent man, I saw one of the lions sitting on a piece of rock within the now closed circle of men. Mchabwe fired at him before I could, and the ball struck the rock on which the animal was sitting. He bit at the spot struck, as a dog does at a stick or stone thrown at him; then leaping away, broke through the opening circle and escaped unhurt. The men were afraid to attack him, perhaps on account of their belief in witchcraft. When the circle was re-formed, we saw two other lions in it;
but we were afraid to fire lest we should strike
the men, and they allowed the beasts to burst through also. If the Bakata had acted according to the custom of the country, they would have speared the lions in their attempt to get out. Seeing we could not get them to kill one of the lions, we bent our footsteps toward the village; in going round the end of the hill, however, I saw one of the beasts sitting on a piece of rock as before, but this time he had a little bush in front. Being about thirty yards off, I took a good aim at his body through the bush, and fired both barrels into it. The men then called out, 'He is shot, he is shot!' Others cried, 'He has been shot by another man too; let us go to him!' I did not see any one else shoot at him, but I saw the lion's tail erected in anger behind the bush, and, turning to the people, said, 'Stop a little, till I load again.' When in the act of ramming down the bullets, I heard a shout. Starting, and looking half round, I saw the lion just in the act of springing upon me. I was upon a little height; he caught my shoulder as he sprang, and we both came to the ground below together. Growing horribly close to my ear, he shook me as a terrier dog does a rat. The shock produced a stupor similar to that which seems to be felt by a mouse after the first shake of the cat. It caused a sort of dreaminess, in which there was no sense of pain nor feeling of terror, though quite conscious of all that was happening. It was like what patients partially under the influence of chloroform describe, who see all the operation, but feel not the knife. This singular condition was not the result of any mental process. The shake annihilated fear, and allowed no sense of horror in looking round at the beast. This peculiar state is properly produced in all animals killed by the carnivora; and if so, is a merciful provision by our benevolent Creator for lessening the pain of death. Turning round to relieve myself of the weight, as he had one paw on the back of my head, I saw his eyes directed to Melalwe, who was trying to shoot him at a distance of ten or fifteen yards. His gun, a flint one, missed fire in both barrels; the lion immediately left me, and, attacking Melalwe, bit his thigh. Another man, whose life I had saved before, after he had been tossed by a buffalo, attempted to spear the lion while he was biting Melalwe. He left Melalwe and caught this man by the shoulder, but at that moment the bullets he had received took effect, and he fell down dead. The whole was the work of a few moments, and must have been his paroxysms of dying rage. In order to take out the charm from him, the Bakatia on the following day made a huge bonfire over the carcass, which was declared to be that of the largest lion they had ever seen. Besides crunching the bone into splinters, he left eleven teeth wounds on the upper part of my arm.

"A wound from this animal's tooth resembles a gun-shot wound; it is generally followed by a great deal of sloughing and discharge, and pains are felt in the part periodically ever afterward. I had on a tartan jacket on the occasion, and I believe that it wiped off all the virus from the teeth that pierced the flesh, for my two companions in this affray have both suffered from the peculiar pains, while I have escaped with only the inconvenience of a false joint in my limb. The man whose shoulder was wounded showed me his wound actually burst forth afresh on the same month of the following year. This curious point deserves the attention of inquirers."

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

For "The Friend."

"AM I MY BROTHER'S KEEPER?"

In 1783, a family of Friends, consisting of parents and seven children, moved into the city of Philadelphia from Virginia. The arrival of this family amongst Friends "awakened a care and tender concern on their account, particularly respecting the children, who if not especially guarded and watched over, would be exposed to various temptations in the city where vanity and many evils were sorrowfully prevalent." So, some of the most weighty Friends of the Monthly Meeting were appointed to have a care over them, viz: Samuel Emlen, Samuel Smith, Samuel Hopkins, Charles West, and Henry Drinker. Ay, noble the deeds that our fathers have done, Unsuslled on pure in their wisdom and truth,
But few can outvie with this record of one
Guarding and guiding the innocent youth.

Fresh from the freedom of forest and hill,
From breezes and scenes that to nature belong,
Little they'd reck of the danger and ill
That lurks in the city's vast tumult and throng.

There the song of the syren floats out on the night,
And sin stalks abroad in the glare of the noon,
Temptations assail, until wrong seemeth right,
And pleasure's enchantments weave bright webs of doom.

Alone and unaided, the true from the false
They scarce could discern 'mid the glitter and show,
Their senses led captive by tinsel and dross,
Might note not the worthless hidden below.

In "letters of gold," let this act be enrolled
On our annals of time for posterity's gaze,
The care that has shielded the lambs of the fold
From the jaw of the wolf in the earlier days.

And is it designed by the Father of all
The righteous unheeding should journey along,
Ignoring the weak who may stumble and fall,
Where the hand of a brother 'd make valiant and strong?

And we who are least, with no might of our own,
Have a call and a mission we cannot evade,
From the low haunts of sin to the steps of the Throne,
Our paths intersected with others are laid.

As the ripples spread out when a pebble we send
On the water, all silent and placid before,
So the waves of our influence round us extend,
Only to break on eternity's shore.

Tho' the zeal of our fathers seems waning to-day,
There are hearts still as warm in the cause as of old,
Intent to be found as true guides on the way,
To gather and lead to the Heavenly Fold.

Selected.

THE PLANTING OF THE APPLE-TREE.

Come, let us plant the apple-tree,
Cleave the tough greenward with the spade;
Wide let its hollow bed be made;
There gently lay the roots, and there
Sift the dark mold with kindly care,
And press it o'er them tenderly;
As round the sleeping infant's feet
We softly fold the cradle-sheet,
So plant we the apple-tree.

What plant we in this apple-tree?
Buds, which the breath of summer days
Shall lengthen into leafy sprays;
Boughs, where the thrush, with crimson breast
Shall haunt and sing, and hide her nest;
We plant upon the sunny lea
A shadow for the acorn'd bow,
A shelter from the summer shower,
When we plant the apple-tree.

What plant we in this apple-tree?
Sweets for a hundred flowery springs
To load the May-wind's restless wings,
When, from the orchard row, he pours
His fragrance through our open doors;
A world of blossoms for the bee,
Flowers for the sick girl's silent room,
For the glad infant sprigs of bloom,
We plant with the apple-tree.

What plant we in this apple-tree?
Fruits that shall swell in sunny June,
And redden in the August noon,
And drop, when gentle airs come by,
That fan the blue September sky;
While children come with cries of glee,
And seek them where the fragrant grass
Bereaves their bed to those who pass,
At the foot of the apple-tree.

And when, above this apple-tree,
The winter stars are glittering bright,
And winds go howling through the night,
Girls whose young eyes o'erflow with mirth
Shall peel its fruit by cottage-hearth,
And guests in prouder homes shall see,
Heaped with the grape of Cintra's vine,
And golden orange of the line,
The fruit of the apple-tree.

The fruitage of this apple-tree,
Winds and our flag of stripe and star
Shall bear to coasts that lie afar,
Where men shall wonder at the view,
And ask in what fair groves they grew;
And sojourners beyond the sea
Shall think of childhood's careless day,
And long, long hours of summer play,
In the shade of the apple-tree.

Each year shall give this apple-tree
A broader flush of rosy bloom,
A deeper made of verdurous glow,
And looser, when the frost winds lower,
The crisp brown leaves in thicker shower.
The years shall come and pass, but we Shall hear no longer, where we lie,
The summer songs, the autumn's sigh,
In the bough of the apple-tree.

And time shall waste this apple-tree.
Oh, when its aged branches thrivel,
Thin shadows on the ground below,
Shall shadow and force and iron will Oppress the weak and helpless still?
What shall the tasks of mercy be,
Amid the toils, the strife, the tears
Of those who live when length of years
Is wasting this little apple-tree?

"Who planted this old apple-tree?"
The children of that distant day
Thus to some aged man shall say;
And, gazing on its mossy stem,
The gray-haired man shall answer them:
"A poet of old times,
Born in the rude but good old times;
'Tis said he made some quaint old rhymes
On planting the apple-tree."

William Cullen Bryant.

How to Look at Things.—I went to see a lady once, who was in deep trouble and in much darkness on account of the great afflictions which had come to her. She had fallen into deep melancholy. When I went in she was working a bit of embroidery, and as I talked with her she dropped the side of it and there it lay, a mass of crude work tangled; everything seemed to be out of order.

"Well," said I, "what is this you are engaged at?"

"Oh," she replied, "it's a pillow for a lounge. I'm making it for a Christmas gift."

I said, "I should not think you would waste your time on that. It looks tangled without design and meaning," and I went on abusing the whole bit of handwork, and belittling the combinations of colors, and so on.

"Why, Mr. P.," she said, surprised at my sudden and abrupt change of the subject, "which we had before been talking, and the persistence with which I had opposed her work—" why, Mr. P., you are looking at the wrong side. Turn it over."

Then I said, "That's just what you are you are looking at the wrong side of God's workings with you. Down here we are looking at the tangled side of God's providence; but He has a plan—here a stitch, there a movement of the shuttle, and in the end a beautiful work. Be not afraid; but be believing. Believe Him in the darkness; believe Him in the mysteries. Let him that walketh in darkness, and seeth not the light, yet trust in the Lord.—Christian Observer.

For "The Friend."

Western Friends in Court.

Much interest having been manifested respecting the late suit at Indianapolis, the following statement has been prepared for the information of our readers.

Catharine Mulloy was a Friend residing within the limits of White Lick Quarterly Meeting, a branch of the Western Yearly Meeting, the latter held at Plainfield, Indiana, by her last will and testament made shortly before her decease, and dated 9th mo. 29th, 1868, she made among others the following bequests:

"I will and bequeath to White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, five hundred dollars ($500.00), to be applied, at the discretion of said Quarterly Meeting, for the relief of suffering humanity, more especially for the benefit of the freedmen and refugees of the South."

"I will and bequeath to White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, one thousand dollars ($1000.00), to be applied, at the discretion of said Quarterly Meeting, to the education of our children."

The meeting accepted these bequests, and appointed Allen Hadley to receive and hold them subject to its direction.

In the year 1877, a separation took place in Western Yearly Meeting, which subsequently extended into White Lick Quarterly Meeting, both bodies, in each case, claimed to be the only legitimate Yearly and Quarterly Meeting of Friends. As at the time of the suit, it was mutually agreed by the parties that they should be distinguished by the names of "Orthodox" and "Progressive," these terms will be employed here.

Allen Hadley was associated with the Orthodox Friends. A demand was made upon him by the Progressive White Lick Quarterly Meeting, to transfer the funds in his hands to certain trustees appointed by that body to receive them. This he refused to do. Suit was accordingly brought against him; whereupon he asked that the Orthodox Quarterly Meeting, through its trustees, should be made a party thereto, and summoned to answer as to its interest. It being so ordered, the cross-complaint of the defendant, White Lick Quarterly Meeting, was heard; also the plaintiff's answer and the reply of cross-complainant. He latterly stated that the faith of the society was embodied in the declaration issued by the eight Yearly Meetings of the Society of Friends in America in 1830. The case was fought before Judge Ralph Hill, of the Circuit Court of Marion county, Indiana, sitting at Indianapolis, and commenced on the 29th day of Eighth month last. Both sides elected by a trial by court, though either of them might have required the other to submit the case to a jury.

In the evidence presented, it was agreed by both sides that there was but one religious society of Friends; and that up to the year 1877, there had been but one Western Yearly Meeting of Friends. In that year two reports were presented to the said Western Yearly Meeting, both of which purported to come from Plainfield Quarterly Meeting, which was one of its branches. The claims of the two bodies were referred to the Representatives from the other Quarterly Meetings as a committee; who afterwards reported in favor of recognizing the Progressive Plainfield Quarterly. After a minute accepting the report had been made by the Clerk, two Friends invited such of those present as were favorable to joining the Orthodox Plainfield Friends in holding Western Yearly Meeting upon the original basis of faith and practice, to withdraw with them to a house in the neighborhood. Only one Representative beside those from Plainfield, with a number of other members, accepted this invitation. After holding their meeting as proposed, they adjourned to the meeting-house at Sugar Grove, about two miles south of Plainfield. Since 1877 these Friends have continued to meet at the same place annually up to the present year.

Only two witnesses were examined by the Progressives. They took the position that they represented the regularly organized Western Yearly Meeting set up by Indiana Yearly Meeting in 1858, and also the regular White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends. That their Yearly Meeting in 1877 had the regularly appointed clerk. That its sessions had adjourned and met from time to time, and that it has continued to do so annually. That it has corresponded with, and been acknowledged by the same Yearly Meetings as those that the undivided Yearly Meeting had corresponded with previously to 1877. These Yearly Meetings, it was asserted, comprised, with the exception of Philadelphia, the entire Society of Friends the world over. The Quarterly Meeting of White Lick, having its old clerk, received the reports of their Yearly Meeting, and had ever since continued its connection therewith. That it was consequently the only legitimate White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends. They claimed that they have about 13,000 members, while the Orthodox have only about 700.* That they have 14 Quarterly Meetings, while the Orthodox have but 2. And that the latter have attached a Monthly Meeting to one of their Quarters composed of some of the members of Indiana Yearly Meeting residing in the State of Ohio, which was done without the consent of Indiana Yearly Meeting.

The views of Barnabas C. Hobbs, one of the witnesses, who stated that he was a minister and had acted as clerk to the Yearly Meeting in 1877, will be shown by the answers to several questions brought out under cross-examination. In regard to the basis on which the Society stands, its faith and usages, he testified: "It is united upon membership in one respect and upon fellowship in another. It has a doctrinal basis as well. These are all the elements that make up its organization."

Ques. "Is that doctrinal basis well defined?"

Ans. "Not very perfectly defined. It is defined in a very limited way."

Q. "Can a man find out what it is?"

A. "Yes; so far as the definition is concerned. Beyond that he cannot find it out, because there is not a fullness of Christian faith. It is not possible among men to find one."

*The Orthodox Friends claim nearly 1200 members.

Q. "Have they their regularly established authorities and exponents of their faith and doctrine?"

A. "Not exactly so. There is no body set apart for that purpose. They embody liberty of conscience and belief in the apostolic succession in the proper sense of the term."

Q. "The Yearly Meeting has its regular confession of faith published in the Discipline; and that has been regularly the confession of faith for the Society from its rise until now."

Q. "It had that regular confession of faith before any separation in 1877?"

A. "Yes, and since. It had its doctrines."

Q. "Now you may state what that confession of faith was."

A. "It is a pretty difficult question for me to tell the whole thing herein. I have never committed it to memory. I can tell whether it is sound if any body can state the doctrine, but I am not able to recite the confession of faith all through. I can refer you to the Discipline."

Q. "Is the correspondence the only bond between them, or is there one of faith and doctrine between the various Yearly Meetings?"

A. "There is a correspondence as the accompaniment of the organization. They recognize a common faith and doctrine."

Q. "Where is that common faith and doctrine to be found?"

A. "It is to be found in our confession of faith and in our Discipline."

Q. "Is there anything outside of the Discipline that you might look to to find that faith and doctrine. Have you any recognized authorities or authors, or published works?"

A. "Not as a standard authority."

Q. "There is none at all?"

A. "No."

Q. "You say that the Society of Friends, as a body, has no standard authority governing the whole body?"

A. "Not such as it has agreed upon, or mutually upon. There are books that are read with much instruction and edification. In one sense they would be called standard authorities, but they have never been unitedly agreed upon or held up as such to the world. It is only by common consent and not by any Society authority."

Q. "Has it not always been by common consent in the Society of Friends to which you have belonged, that the Society recognized and obeyed without controversy, the authority of Robert Barclay, George Fox, William Penn and others?"

A. "No. I would not say that we have ever taken any man's book this side of the Apostles as the standard. We have our doctrines from the Bible itself."

He mentioned three doctrines which were fundamental in the Society of Friends, viz: "Inspiration of the Scriptures," "The Divinity of Christ;" "The presence of the Holy Spirit." "The distinguishing features of the Society are found in their church worship. In recognizing in a fuller and more complete sense the rights of women to take part in the ministry of the church, and to bring them up to an authoritative equality in a certain sense in church government." In its doctrines upon the subjects of peace and war; of slavery; "the disuse of the ritualistic form of worship; in the observance of rites and symbols in the supper and baptism, accepting the spiritual inspiration of the Scriptures as a true one on that subject. There may be other distinctive features which I do not now call up, but these are some of the principal ones which distinguish us from other denominations." He was reminded of the testimony against oaths which he acknowledged having forgotten to mention.

The witness might very properly have stated that the "inspiration of the Scriptures, the Divinity of Christ, and the presence of the Holy Spirit," were fundamental principles of the Christian religion—for they are believed by most Christian sects. But it is remarkable that it did not occur to him to state what has always been understood to be the great distinguishing doctrines of Friends. Those, it is well-known, are Universal saving Light, Perfection, and that recognition of the true Headship of Christ in his Church, which asserts Him to be the Dispenser of the gifts of Ministry, Oversight, Discernment, and all other spiritual gifts. These He bestows upon individuals whom He qualifies to receive them and to exercise them only as He directs, so that the body may be edified.

(To be continued.)

Selected for "The Friend."

John Jay.

His character (says Webster) is a brilliant jewel in the sacred treasures of national reputation. Leaving his profession at an early period, yet not before he had singularly distinguished himself in it, from the commencement of the Revolution, his whole life, until his final retirement,* was a life of public service. A member of the first Congress, he was the author of that political paper which is generally acknowledged to stand first among the incomparable productions of that body: productions which called forth that decisive strain of commendation from the great Lord Chatam, in which he pronounced them not inferior to the finest productions of the master states of the world. John Jay had been abroad, and had also been long entrusted with the difficult duties of our foreign correspondence at home. He had seen and felt, in the fullest measure, and to the greatest possible extent, the difficulty of conducting our foreign affairs honorably and usefully, without a stronger and more perfect domestic union. Though not a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution, he was yet present while it was in session, and looked anxiously for its result. By the choice of this city (New York) he had a seat in the State Convention, and took an active and zealous part for the adoption of the Constitution. On the organization of the new government, he was selected by Washington to be the first Chief Justice of the United States; and surely the high and most responsible duties of that station, could not have been trusted to abler or safer hands. It is the duty, one of equal importance and delicacy, of that tribunal to decide constitutional questions, arising occasionally on State laws. The general learning and ability, and especially the prudence, the mildness and the firmness of his character, eminently fitted John Jay to be the head of such a court. When the spotless crinne of the judicial robe fell on John Jay, it touched nothing not as spotless as itself.

R.

*We may remember that John Jay voluntarily abandoned political life, much against the wishes of his constituents, in order that he might devote his time and attention to things of greater moment.

From the "British Friend."

Balaam—A Mixture.

In a former treatise I spoke of two teachers—the one leading into all error, the other guiding into all truth. The one leading out of darkness into light; the other leading out of light into darkness. Hence the mixture which so wonderfully prevails in the religious world; because it proceeds from discordant sources never to be harmonized.

I believe that ever since our first parents listened to the lying spirit, and partook of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, that good and evil have had an opposing existence of "enmity" in the world; and that the heart of every man witnesses, at times, something of the antagonistic strife or warfare occasioned by this enmity, until he is redeemed from it, and created anew in Christ Jesus. This redemption, or freedom from that mixture which Balaam so strikingly displayed, I believe, is only by obedience to Him whom Balaam, as also our primeval parents, disobeyed. And for this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil.

And so far as this work, through faith and obedience, is done in us, so far we are freed from the mixture of good and evil which was brought into the world by sin. Then shall be witnessed, by every individual soul, the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning Him who came "to finish transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and bring in everlasting righteousness," that He might be anointed as the Most Holy, ruling and reigning in un-mixed purity in every heart.

So "let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, for he is faithful that promised," &c. (Heb. x. 22-25.) Let us "behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Let us "keep our heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." Not the issues of life and death from the same fountain. No. If the heart be kept pure, the Gospel stream which flows from it, or through it, from the pure fountain, will be pure also. No mixture there, as there was in the teachings and conduct of Balaam. "Doth a fountain send forth, at the same place, sweet water and bitter?" It cannot. And the teachings of the present day, which partake of this character, are leading the blind astray, far from the meek and heavenly kingdom. The votaries of this spurious religion are "calling evil good, and good evil; are putting darkness for light, and light for darkness; and bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter. They are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight." "Strangers have devoured their strength, and they know it not." They profess to be servants of God, but in works deny Him.

"In speculation's field they roam abroad,
And in dead works forsake the living God;"

and run greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, loving the wages of unrighteousness, and the honors and promotions of the world. But how was it with poor inconsistent Balaam? Did he die the death of the righteous? or was his last end like theirs? But how amazing the sublime language that Balaam, who appeared at times to be under the guidance of the Star of Jacob, could utter—not to be surpassed by any of the true prophets of God! In what condition, however, was his heart? Was it not deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked? Was it not in his heart to curse the true Israel of God, whom he was constrained to bless?

How is it with some in more modern days? How was it with Caiaphas, an enemy of our blessed Lord? Was he not constrained to utter a noble prophecy concerning Him, not knowing what he said? How is it now in our boasted age of progression and reform. We may speak "with the tongues of men and of angels," but, "if we have not the spirit of Christ we are none of his." Our intellectual speaking may please the ear of the natural man, but the spiritual man that has an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches, will not be edified by all "the enticing words of man's wisdom." They will be no more to him "than sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal."

We may, like Balaam, use high-flow language, with all the smoothness of eloquence so as to be highly esteemed among men, and yet it may all be an abomination in the sight of the Lord, because it is an attempt to rob God of that glory which alone belongs to Him; and to quiet the conscience of the hearers, so as to yet remain in the mixture short of being redeemed from all iniquity and purified by the Spirit of the Lord. I know we have the treasure of the ministry "in earthen vessels," but I believe the vessels should be so purified from the defilements of the earthly or fallen nature as not to corrupt the pure gospel stream that flows through it. When we have experienced a change from a state of nature to a state of grace—a change from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to the power of God—we shall find we are free from the mixture of good and evil, because all things will become new, and all things of God, from whom the mixture never sprang. But it sprang from the very one, and would willingly lead all its votaries to him, whether they be teachers or whether they be hearers.

Oh, for a pure and undefiled religion—upheld by a pure and unmixed ministry—which proceeds from the Living Fountain—ever from Him in "whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

Of what avail is it for us, like Balaam, to desire that we might die the death of the righteous, while we are deliberately living the life of the unrighteous, and going on in open opposition to the command of God, as he was?

"Obedience is better than sacrifice." Yet Balaam under the guise of religion, and in solemn mockery, could in his mixed condition pretend a sacrifice to the God of Israel. Though the wages of unrighteousness were uppermost in his corrupt heart, yet he could presumptuously imitate in his offerings the sacrifices of Israel to that God whom he was wilfully disobeying. But we are told that "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord." Yet how many appear willing to keep up the form, though, like Balaam, yet in the mixture and destitute of the power.

What signifies the form when the spirit has departed? How was it with Saul? He forced an offering without waiting for the authority, and without "making supplication unto the Lord."

But to return to Balaam. I have brought him to view in this article merely as being the strongest instance which we have on record of the strange mixture of good and evil in the unregenerate heart of man. May we all profit by it and seek in time a return, through the only door, to that unmixt purity which man first had in Paradise with God. Then we shall die the death of the righteous and our last end will be like his.

D. H.

Dublin, Indiana, 6th mo. 30th, 1881.

The Sioux and the Poncas.—The language and conduct of the Sioux chiefs in regard to restoring the land of the Poncas might be taken as an example to the superior race. They were offered money by the Government to give up the lands which had been assigned to them, but refused it with a touch of savage nobility. It is needless to say that this land formerly belonging to the Poncas, which has come into possession of the whites, has not been delivered up, and is not likely to be. The Poncas have been pitted to the extent of loston eloquence; but powerful as that has been, it has not reached the effect of White Hunter's speech to Secretary Kirkwood on his offer of money: "No, my friend; that is not what I want. You told me yesterday I ought to have pity on these poor Poncas. If I have pity on them, I am not going to take their money. We give them the lands they need." General Harney, whose experience with the Indians in both fighting and treaty-making has been one of uniform success, has said that there was never a treaty between the Indians and the whites that was observed by the former until it was broken by the latter; and such evidences of a manly and honorable spirit as that exhibited by the Sioux toward the Poncas are proof that we ought to be able to get along with each a race in peace and harmony, by the practice of a reasonable good faith and observance of the natural laws of equity. At any rate, the contrast between the conduct of the Sioux and the whites toward the Poncas, is not edifying or consolatory to the superior race.—Prov. Journal.

Nut-Pine, Digger-Pine (Pinus Sabiniana).—The first coniferous tree met by the traveler in ascending the range from the west is the nut-pine, remarkable for its loose, airy, typical appearance, suggesting a region of pines rather than cool, resinous pine-woods. No one would take it at first sight to be a pine or conifer of any kind, it is so loose in habit, and widely branched, and its foliage is thin and gray. Full-grown specimens are from forty to fifty feet in height, and from two to three in diameter. At a height of fifteen or twenty feet from the ground the trunk usually divides into three or four main branches, about equal in size, which, after starting away from one another, shoot straight up and form separate summits; while the hooked subordinate branches aspire, or radiate, or droop in loose ornamental sprays. The slender, grayish-green needles are from eight to twelve inches long, loosely tasselled, and inclined to droop in handsome curves, contrasting with the stiff, dark-colored trunk and branches in a very striking manner. No other tree of my acquaintance, so substantial a body, is in its foliage so thin and so pervious to the light. The sunbeams sift through the leafiest trees with scarce any interruption, and the weary, heated traveler finds but little protection in their shade.

It grows only on the torrid foot-hills, seeming to delight in the most ardent sun, heat, like a palm; springing up here and there singly, or in scattered groups of five or six, among scrubby white-oaks and thickets of ceanothus and manzanita; its extreme upper limit being about four thousand feet above the sea, its lower about from five hundred to eight hundred feet.

The generous crop of sweet, nutritious nuts which it yields makes it a great favorite with Indians and with bears. The cones are truly magnificent, measuring from five to eight inches in length, and not much less in thickness, rich, chocolate-brown in color, and protected by strong, down-curling hooks which terminate the scales. Nevertheless, the little Douglas squirrel can open them.

Indians gathering the ripe nuts make a striking picture. The men climb the trees like bears and beat off the cones with sticks, or recklessly cut off the more fruitful branches with hatchets, while the squaws gather them in heaps, and roast them until the scales open sufficiently to allow the hard-shelled seeds to be beaten out. Then, in the cool evenings, men, women and children, with their capacity for dirt greatly increased by the soft resin with which they are all bedraggled, form circles around their camp-fires on the bank of some stream, and lie in easy independence, cracking nuts, and laughing and chatting, as heedless of the future as bears and squirrels.—From the Coniferous Forests of the Sierra Nevada, in Scribner for Ninth month.

Religious Items, &c.

For "The Friend."

Disturbance of Religious Meetings.—A case under the law on this subject has recently been decided in the Supreme Court of New York. At a Methodist Episcopal meeting in Western New York, a person who was not a member spoke at a Love-feast, who as Excise Commissioner signed licenses for dealing in spirituous liquors. Such signing is contrary to the discipline of the Methodists. The Commissioner had spoken on previous occasions, and had been warned by the pastor in charge not to repeat the act. At this time he was arrested by a Justice of the Peace and fined $10. The case was carried up to the Supreme Court, which has affirmed the constitutionality of the law, and the conviction before the Justice. The Christian Advocate points out the following bearings of the decision:

First. A disturber of a religious meeting may be arrested by a Justice who is present when the disturbance occurs, and a summary trial had, and the defendant punished.

Second. A person not a member of a Church has no right to take part in the meetings of said Church except by courtesy, and if objectionable to the Church, and forbidden by the pastor to take part in the meetings, is amenable to the law as a disturber if he shall take part afterward.

Third. Under these circumstances the speaking at all is a disturbance, no matter how proper the speaking may be in itself.

Agricultural Fairs.—We are glad to observe that a correspondent of The Christian Advocate calls attention to "the games of chance, intemperance, and horse-racing" connected with many of the Agricultural Fairs, "to the great detriment of many professing Christians who persist in attending them." He says:

A resolution passed by one of the leading Conferences of our [Methodist] Connection, expressing in well understood terms its disapproval of the course of members of our Church who attended these places where the objectionable features mentioned prevailed, is distinctly remembered by the writer. And we believe the same truth needs to be reaffirmed with greater emphasis, that our members need not be mistaken concerning our disapprobation of their presence where the most spiritual of our members have no desire to go, and where those members who are already worldly-minded go, only to become colder in their religious life. We are well aware that the evils spoken of will not apply to all sections of our country; but that these evils are so frequently found in connection with these gatherings as to make it necessary for Christians, who would maintain their integrity, to wisely discriminate between those which promote the public welfare and those which undermine the social and religious life, is the profound conviction of many who never wish to be found where the Master cannot come.

Russian Mennonites.—The London Friend has received information of the safe arrival at Tashkent in Asia, the capital of Russian Turkestan, of the Russian Mennonites who had intended to settle there. They are about 1000 in number, and think they have a promise from the Russian Government of exemption from military service for fifteen years. About 14,000 of these people are believed to have removed to the United States and British America.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 8, 1881.

A correspondent in Ohio expresses his fears lest the attention of the members of our Society should be too much engrossed with literary culture and educational training. He does not condemn the acquisition of knowledge, provided it is kept within proper limits; but quotes these expressions of Mary Capper to illustrate his feelings: "I am one of those who mark the boasted march of intellect with a jealous fear. The refinements of our day seem, in my view, to draw the mind from under the cross of Christ."

He who would be a faithful follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, must submit his whole life to the Divine government. There will be times, when the earnest pursuit of knowledge and intellectual culture, as well as the diligent prosecution of outward business, will be felt to be duties. These will, with the Divine blessing, often prepare man for more extensive usefulness in whatever fields of labor the Lord designs to employ him. But the accumulation of wealth, whether of the intellect or in an outward sense, must not be the primary concern. To do the Lord's will must be the governing rule of our lives. All will acknowledge, that this rule does restrain men in their pursuit of riches; and that the command of our Savior is of imperative obligation—"Seek ye first the kingdom of Heaven, and the righteousness thereof."

This command applies with equal force to every employment of our time and energies. Those who have obeyed it in sincerity, have found that they were not at liberty to pursue their mental cultivation, in the ordinary sense of the word, without restraint. They have learned that the eager pursuit of knowledge

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 15, 1881.

NO. 10.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

John Evans.

For "The Friend,"

John Evans of Gwynedd, Penna., was born in Denbighshire, in the principality of Wales, the year 1689, and arrived in Pennsylvania with his parents in 1698, under whom he received a pious education. He was a man of good natural understanding, and favored early in life to see the necessity of a diligent attention to the voice of Divine wisdom, to establish and preserve him in peace with God; and a steady adherence to it he became honorable in religious Society, and eminently respectable in the Church of Christ. In the 23d year of his age, he appeared in the ministry of the Gospel, and his department therein was as became a mind sensible of the great importance of the service. He had a far engaging manner of delivery, was deep in heavenly mysteries and plain in declaring them; and being well acquainted with the Holy Scriptures he was made skilful in opening the doctrines therein contained, and was enabled to draw lively and instructive similes from the visible creation. He travelled through most of the Northern Colonies in the service of Truth, and several times through Pennsylvania. He was often drawn to attend general meetings, funerals and other public occasions, particularly the adjacent meetings for their first establishment, over which he did a tender fatherly care as a good shepherd kindly heed to the flock; and the Great Shepherd of Israel blessed his labors, and afforded him at times great satisfaction and comfort. The latter part of his time the visitation of a decension of many from the life and power of Truth, frequently made sorrow and deep lamentation his portion. His labors were fervent with the youth, in much love and zeal, that they might come to know God for themselves, bow their necks to the yoke, and lay their shoulders to the work, saying: "that their remembering their Creator in the days of their youth would be as marrow to their bones."

It was indeed his great joy to behold the agreeable fruits of righteousness, and his efforts for the promotion thereof made him honorable amongst men of various ranks and professions, and his testimony generally acceptable to them. In the support of our Christian discipline he was zealous, active and unflinching, and favored with qualification to advise in difficult cases which seldom failed of succeeding. His testimony was close against hypocrisy and an outside show of religion only, but full of paternal tenderness to the afflicted, weak or diffident in spirit. Of sound judgment and deep in Divine experience, yet modest and condescending, and being favored with the descending of the Father's love that at times appeared to clothe him as a mantle, he had an open door in the hearts of his friends and an ascendancy over the spirits of gain-sayers. He was a zealous promoter of visiting Friends in their families, was many times engaged in that weighty work, and his labors were awakening and useful; often employed in visiting the sick, the widow and the fatherless and others in affliction. On these occasions he was seldom large in expression, but his silent sympathy and secret breathings for their relief were more consolatory than many words. A considerable part of his time was spent in assisting widows and in the guardianship of orphans, which, though laborious to him, was of much advantage to them. Deeply sensible of the importance of love and peace to civil and religious society, he was diligent in promoting them both by precept and example, and successful in restoring harmony where any violation of it appeared. His conduct and conversation in private life were exemplary, and implied an inward, close inspection into the secret operations of his own heart.

He was apprehensive of his approaching end for some time before his last illness, and told a friend "he should not survive one year," who admired he was so positive; but he made no further reply than "See what will follow." In his public testimony, also, he frequently said, "He had but an inch of time to treat with us." In the first part of his illness, he went to some meetings, one whereof was large, and he was favored with strength to speak in a powerful and instructive manner to the youth, for whose welfare his desires were ardent. His disorder was slow and lingering, wherein he was favored with his understanding almost to the last; and although at some seasons he was much concerned on account of the gloominess of the times in religious and civil affairs; yet in general, he possessed a very great degree of calmness and serenity of mind, with a perfect resignation to the will of God, whether life or death should be his portion. On the day of his departure, observing his wife troubled, he said with a cheerful countenance, "I am easy, I am easy," and desired her to be easy also; indeed it appeared the Lord had strengthened him on the bed of languishing, and made all his bed in his sickness. Thus having served God in his generation, he departed the 23d day of the 9th mo. 1756, aged 67 years; having, we hope, put on the beautiful garment of Christ's righteousness, and entered the wedding-chamber of the bridegroom of his soul, and enjoys the reward of his faithful labors. He was buried the 25th day of the same month, in Friends' burial ground at Gwynedd.

* Ellen Evans.

John Evans to John Pemberton.

2d mo. 2d, 1754.

My Dear Friend,—I have had the pleasure to see many if not most of thy letters written to thy worthy parents, as also some of those to thy brothers; and in the reading of them I have been comforted and revived, not only with respect to the matter contained in them, but likewise in the agreeable, sensible frame and disposition of mind thou appeared to me to be in, having a right sense and idea of the state of the churches among whom thou and thy dear companion labor, I believe, faithfully; and though you may be often baptized for the dead, and many weights and burdens you may have to bear, ready perhaps at times to be discouraged, and to faint by the way, dear hearts, be not dismayed or discouraged; though you may have to go through the fire, it shall not kindle upon you, and through the waters of many tribulations, yet shall you not be overwhelmed; but hope shall be as an anchor sure and steadfast, that will enable to ride out the most violent storms that Satan or his agents will be able to raise.

Dear John, my mind at divers times has been comforted on thy account, and in a nearer manner united to thee than I can well express, considering how rare it is in these days of fleshly ease and carnal security, to find a youth so devoted, dedicating his time to the service of truth. Go on and prosper, say I; let the dead bury the dead; follow thou the Captain of thy salvation; those that love Him more than father or mother, friends or relations or any temporals whatever, are worthy of Him; to these He is a present help in times of greatest difficulty and most exercising trials, and arms them with Christian fortitude and patience, that no blast will shake them, being established on the sure Rock of Ages. This I hope thou hast in a degree experienced, and prepared in good measure to receive the sorrowful tidings of the removal of thy worthy father from works to rewards. I sympathize with thee with all my heart, and breathe to God thou may be supported to carry it with Christian patience and resignation of mind; there is no cause of sorrow on his account, the loss is ours—his family in particular, and the Church in general—he hath discharged faithfully to both; he was a pattern of piety and virtue, temperance, meekness and charity. In short, his path was as a shining light; his death is as much lamented, and his Christian course of life as much commended as any I ever was acquainted with; but all we may say or think will add nothing to him; he is safe and well, but the remembrance of his Christian, exemplary life, ought to excite survivors, especially his immediate offspring, relations and intimate friends and the Church in general, to follow his footsteps in the like moderation and composure of mind. Suffer not, my dear friend, the suggestions of Satan to insinuate, as if there was out of thy place not to return sooner, and then thou might have seen thy parent before he went. I hope and believe all is well,—will be well. We are sometimes apt to doubt the dispensation while we are under the exercising; yet after we are carried through we behold and bless the hand that has directed and ordered in his wisdom for the better. I remember when I first went to New England to visit Friends, I was very young and weak in the ministry, and suffering at times so great that I concluded I was altogether wrong in stirring from home; but after my return, oh! the sweet peace and comfort that filled my breast, that I was wallowed in, on the right and on the left hand that Satan could not touch me. In time, this Sabbath was over; I must descend from the mount again, return to labor and be exposed to further trials, and I doubt not but there will find thy accounts in tarrying, though thou art sure to meet with renewed sorrow when thou returns on account of the removal of thy worthy parent.

I would have written a few lines to thy dear companion, whom I dearly value and love in the truth, but I am so poor at extending in this way. Please to give my truly near and dear respect to him, and please to accept of the same, in a truly sympathizing manner on the present occasion.

From thy real friend,

JNO. EVANS.

Is Wine Safer than Water?

BY H. C. TRUMBULL.

Some years ago I was riding in an open wagon over the plains of California, with three men who before were strangers to me. The day was hot and the road dusty. At noon-time we stopped at a wayside tavern for dinner. The dinner consisted chiefly of boiled pork, boiled potatoes, and boiled beans. One of my companions, not less than sixty years of age, ate of the pork and beans as if he were laying in a week's provisions. After dinner we were again on our tedious ride. Under the hot sun and in the jolting wagon my heavily-laden seat-mate was taken with cramps. As he writhed and groaned in pain, it never seemed to occur to him that that pork and those beans were proving too much for him. Oh no! it was the water which had done the mischief. "Dear me!" he groaned out, "I wish I hadn't drank any of that water at dinner. It's almost killing me. I declare I'll never drink any more of the water, without a touch of brandy, as long as I'm in California. It really isn't safe." And that man's idea of the perils of water-drinking away from home is a good illustration of the general feeling on the subject among travellers in our own country and abroad.

While at Florence, in Italy, I was remonstrated with by a kind-hearted lady who sat next me at the dinner-table, because I ventured to drink cold water as at home. She assured me that there was no safety there except in wine-drinking—even the guide-books emphasized that fact. Moreover, she told me pathetically of the serious effects of water-drinking in Florence by one and another who had for a time dared brave its risks. I then noticed that I and my travelling companions were the only persons at that well-filled table who did not drink wine. I saw enough of my fellow-boarders in their eating, and I knew enough of them in their modes of living, to know that drinking cold water was not the only danger to which they were exposed in Florence, and that wine-drinking would not by any means prove a guard against their every bodily peril. In their minds, it was not the unsettled life they were living; not the fatigue of sight-seeing, day after day; not the exposure of the night air, and the drain on their nervous force by their late hours and their unaccustomed variety of food, that was a cause of any physical disturbance they might have experienced; no, no, it was "the water," that was at the bottom of their every fear and risk. And I happened to know, moreover, that the water there at Florence was a great deal better water for steady drinking than the water on which many of those American travellers had been brought up in their American western and southern homes. And as to a substitute for the native water of the region,—if they desired to avoid that,—it didn't seem to occur to them that any of the many standard bottled mineral waters which were available there would be safer and more health-giving than native wine. No, it was the water that must be shunned; it was the wine that must be taken.

I have spoken of Florence because the water there is called particularly bad. But it is pretty much the same the world over, as to this dread of water, and faith in wine, by the average traveller. Why, here in Philadelphia, during the Centennial summer, when millions came in from outside, and packed themselves in close quarters, and wore themselves out with long days of walking and standing and bewildering gazing, and overtaxed their stomachs with hurriedly eaten indigestible lunches, whatever pains and aches anybody from that throng of visitors had, in Philadelphia or on the way home, were almost without exception attributed to the water. Of course it was the water! To hear one talk about the troubles that come from water-drinking away from one's home, might fairly prompt the question, Is there anything that is really dangerous in this world except water? And yet all this talk about the necessity laid on a traveller to drink wine or brandy instead of water while away from his home is sheer bald nonsense.

I have travelled not a little in my lifetime. I have averaged nearly twenty thousand miles a year for twenty years at a time. I have been through the length and breadth of our land from Maine to California, and from Minnesota to Florida. I have journeyed also in Europe and Asia and Africa. Yet I never found the place where it was necessary for me to drink wine or brandy, nor yet where I deemed a native wine as safe as the native water, judging from the apparent effects on those who used the one or the other.

I have found some pretty poor water in my day, limestone water, brackish water, muddy water, sulphurous water, water well-nigh putrid with decaying vegetation. I have drunk water through a little pocket filter, from the prints of my horse's hoofs in the travelled road after a rain-storm, as the only mode of quenching my thirst with water. I have drunk water from the tangled swamps in the sea-islands of the South Carolina coast, when I had to hold my breath as I drank because of the water's stench. But I was sure, in all these cases, that that water was safer, as a drink, than wine would be, and that if I added anything to it to render it innocuous there was less reason for my trying whiskey or brandy than ginger or mustard.

Several years after our civil war I was at the Surgeon-General office in Washington, making a call on Dr. Otis, with whom I had been a comrade in army-life, and who was now compiling and tabulating the medical records of the entire army. In the course of our conversation he asked me how it was that my health endured through all the exposure to which I had been liable in army service, and in prison life. My answer was, "Well, Doctor, I suppose you will hardly agree with me on that point. I think that my keeping up so well was due to my letting whiskey alone. The water we had was bad enough; but I thought it was better than the whiskey, and I stuck to it all through the war. I think my total abstinence was my safety. I never borrowed to-morrow's income to pay to-day's expenses with, but lived on the day's strength every day of the war." The Doctor's prompt response was: "A few years ago I shouldn't have agreed with you on that point, but now I do. Since I have compared, in this office the health-records of regiments where the surgeons refused to give whiskey, with those of regiments where whiskey was given freely, I am so impressed with the proof of gain from total abstinence that I wonder how so many of our soldiers lived through our whiskey treatment of them." And as with whiskey in America, so with wine in Europe. So distinguished a medical authority as Sir Henry Thompson has said recently in a letter to the London Times: "I can affirm . . . without hesitation, that the ordinary traveller never never run the risk of drinking poisoned water. I may also add here that it is equally unnecessary to drink alcoholic liquor of any kind. . . . During the last ten years, of which a total of more than two has been spent in Continental hotels, I have never consumed any other liquids than tea, coffee, and mineral waters."

I have seen on our ocean steamers and in European hotels the wine-flush on the cheek of young wives and young misses and lads day after day, and I have no more doubt than a large share of those wine-drinking travellers are to die drunkards than I am that water runs down hill. If a man drinks wine himself, he is not so likely to notice the effect of wine-drinking on those who are at table with him. To say that the native wine of a vine growing country is not promotive of intemperance, is to say that the Bible talks nonsense when it tells of Noah's being stupidly drunk on wine from his own vineyard. Even if we were to deny the Bible story about Noah's wine, I could testify that I have seen men drunk on native wine, both in Europe and in America, and that I know so much of the danger of wine-drinking as leading to intemperance that I am afraid to drink wine at home or abroad, lest I should become a drunkard myself, apart from any question of my example before others who are weaker than I am—if there are such.

It requires some courage not to drink wine abroad. Indeed, almost any self-denial involves a struggle—apart from the control of appetite. The fashion of this world is against self-denial. Wine-drinking is the fashion in Europe, and one must have some character to be willing, anywhere, to stand as notably singular in a personal habit or a social custom. Moreover, those who do drink, will be constantly telling those who do not that there is no other safe way than theirs. If one would do so and come as a total abstainer he must be ready to abide unflinchingly by his own judgment as to the right and safe way, in spite of the example and the entreaties and the solemn warnings of very excellent people, who think and do differently. For myself I am afraid to venture on the moderate use of those drinks which have by their very use led so many to use them immoderately. I have seen that inebriation anywhere is dangerous. I have found that water-drinking is safer than wine-drinking everywhere. That is my testimony to the wine question.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Death's Solemn Summons.

The thought has sometimes occurred to the writer whether we, who perhaps often witness the death-bed scene, or frequently attend the funerals of others, derive those lessons of solid instruction from them they are so calculated to induce in the reflective mind? Independent of any, however stirring, ministerial ferings there may be, what louder sermon, that more forcible appeal can be made than the sight of a fellow probationer called to his or her final account, with the one deeply solemn thought that we, too, cannot be long left behind? Deep and earnest should be the query in every heart, Am I prepared through putting on of Christ, for that eternity of peace and rest and joy in the Holy Ghost, which is without change or end? Have I shown, through experience of that godly sorrow which worketh repentance to salvation, to be repented of, my sins washed away by the atoning blood of the Lamb? Has the unspeakable gift of saving grace, with the innumerable other lesser gifts so freely disseminated, been used to the praise of Jesus' name, and the spread of his kingdom in the earth? Have I been engaged to fight the good fight of faith by the sword of the Spirit, and by obedience to the light of Christ which maketh manifest all things that are reprovable, even as if indulged in must forever separate the soul from Him? It is a solemn declaration of our Divine Law-giver: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." True, or, is it, that while our Father in heaven is tender, loving parent to the humble, penitent and contrite who reverently seek Him, He is, on the other hand, "a consuming fire" to those who reject or turn a deaf ear to His gifts of grace and mercy and salvation.

Solemn is the dying hour under every circumstance. But how is the consternation, the agitation and the sting of death taken away, when in humbleness of mind, and with self laid in the dust, we can make the filial appeal, Thou knowest, O Lord! that I love thee, and that my feeble endeavors have been conformed to thy blessed will. It is only hope in Christ, through the obedience which is of faith, that cheers and upholds the soul in the last trying conflict of nature. It is the surrender of the heart and affections to Him who came to save us from our sins, and to give us the health and strength and vigor of many years that prepares the way to say with Paul, "I know in whom I have believed," and that robs death of its sting and the grave of its victory. When the awful summons does come, which shall present at once to our view the little span of time and the immeasurable duration of eternity, what will at all avail us but Christ Jesus the only Saviour? The frowns or smiles of our fellow-worms will be lighter than nothing, and vanity; wealth or poverty will have lost their hold, their distinctiveness; whether life's pilgrimage has been more pleasant or painful to us will be of no account; whether tempests have roared around, or billows beat against our little bark will not trouble them; all will centre in whether we are Christ's through obedience to the revelations of his in-speaking Holy Spirit, or whether we have sought other lovers, and sacrificed upon their unholy altars.

"Short is the longest day of life," and notwithstanding the many lessons we have of this, with, also, of its exceeding uncertainty, we yet too negligently presume that time enough in the like fitful future, will be allowed us to prepare for that, which as it is the great end of this life, should therefore be sought as its first great object—a state of fitness for death's solemn summons. A pious female exclaimed on the bed of death: "Oh! my dear friends, if you knew what I do now, you would see that the whole business of life is a preparation for death." Another, of a very different character, is represented to have said, "It will be time enough to think of the next world when I am no longer fit for the pleasures or the business of this." If we neglect the great business of this probationary span till the bloom and prime of our years are exhausted, what security have we that the very uncertain lease of existence will be prolonged, or that the Holy Spirit will continue to strive with us? And how, by so doing, shall we subject ourselves to the censure conveyed by the Most High through his prophet to Israel of old: "A son honoreth his father, and a servant his master; if, then, I be a father, where is mine honor? and if I be a master, where is my fear?" "If ye offer the blind for sacrifice, is it not evil? and if ye offer the lame and sick, is it not evil?" "Cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and voweth, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing: for I am a great King, saith the Lord of hosts." Moreover, what deep regrets, what poignant sorrow must there be at every milestone of life's wasted years, that we had not attended to religion's solemnly imposed obligations sooner. That we had deferred what should have been the first concern of life to its weakest period! And that our whole lives had not been dedicated to Him who can alone support through the dark valley of the shadow of death, and present faultless before the throne of his Father's glory with exceeding joy!

Xerxes is said to have wept upon a survey from an eminence of his numerous army, that not one of so many thousands would be alive a hundred years after. Pious John Woolman has left a record to the effect, that upon his looking over a list of the names of Friends who had died, his mind was solemnly impressed with the great uncertainty of all things here, and a great incentive was raised within him to seek to live the life, that he might die the death, of the righteous. While evanescent and short-lived are all the things of earth, there is, nevertheless, sufficient time and measure of grace granted to every one to work out their soul's salvation with fear and trembling. In view of this it has been well said, that "every argument against an irreligious death is equally cogent against an irreligious life." "The necessity of religion is as urgent now, or in health, as it will be when we are dying." Truly then, compared with salvation nothing else is worthy of regard. And every death-bed we witness, or every grave-side we are called to, should prompt the earnest Christian desire to more and more put on the Lord Jesus Christ, through true dedication of the heart and life unto Him in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who is able to reward or punish us forever. This is the only sure way to true peace of mind amid the trials and vicissitudes of time, and the only sure ground of hope for an eternity of peace when all here shall have forever passed away.

Whatever sorrows, or crosses, or baptisms, or temptations, or tribulations may be our portion here, it is recorded for our learning and encouragement, that Jesus, who came to save us from our sins, has said: "He that cometh to me I will in no wise cast off;" and that He can, and will, save unto the very uttermost all that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them. These He will be a sanctuary and a refuge to, not only while engaged about the necessary duties of this life, but also when their eyes are about to close upon a world of sense and open upon a world of spirits—even the abiding refuge of the everlasting mercies of God in Christ Jesus.

The Tsetse, or Poisonous Fly of Africa.—African travellers often speak of the fatal effects on their horses and cattle of the bite of this insect. David Livingstone says of it:

"A few remarks on the Tsetse, or (Glossina morsitans), may here be appropriate. It is not much larger than the common house-fly, and is nearly of the same brown color as the common honey-bee; the upper part of the body has three or four yellow bars across it; the wings project beyond this part considerably, and it is remarkably alert, avoiding most dexterously all attempts to capture it with the hand at common temperatures; in the cool of the mornings and evenings it is less agile. Its peculiar buzz when once heard can never be forgotten by the traveller whose means of locomotion are domestic animals; for it is well known that the bite of this poisonous insect is certain death to the ox, horse and dog. In this journey, though we were not aware of any great number having at any time lighted on our cattle, we lost forty-three fine oxen by its bite. We watched the animals carefully, and believe that not a score of flies were ever upon them.

"A most remarkable feature in the bite of the Tsetse is its perfect harmlessness in man and wild animals, and even calves, so long as they continue to suck the cows. We never experienced the slightest injury from them ourselves, personally, although we lived two months in their habitat, which was in this case as sharply defined as in many others, for the south bank of the Chobe was infested by them, and the northern bank, where our cattle were placed, only fifty yards distant, contained not a single specimen. This was the more remarkable, as we often saw natives carrying over raw meat to the opposite bank with many tsetse settled upon it.

"The poison does not seem to be injected by a sting, or by ova placed beneath the skin; for, when one is allowed to feed freely on the hand, it is seen to insert the middle prong of three portions, into which the proboscis divides, somewhat deeply into the true skin; it then draws it out a little way, and it assumes a crimson color as the mandibles come into brisk operation. The mandibles shrunken belly swells out, and, if left undisturbed, the fly quietly departs when it is full. A slight itching irritation follows, but not more than in the bite of a mosquito. In the ox this same bite produces no more immediate effects than in man. It does not startle him as the gad-fly does; but a few days afterward the following symptoms supervene: the eye and nose begin to run, the coat stares as if the animal were cold, a swelling appears under the jaw, and sometimes at the navel; and, though the animal continues to graze, emaciation commences, accompanied with a peculiar flaccidity of the muscles, and this proceeds unchecked until, perhaps months afterward, purging comes on, and the animal, no longer able to graze, perishes in a state of extreme exhaustion. Those which are in good condition often perish soon after the bite is inflicted with staggering and blindness, as if the brain were affected by it. Sudden changes of temperature produced by falls of rain seem to hasten the progress of the complaint; but, in general, the emaciation goes on uninterruptedly for months, and, do what we will, the poor animals perish miserably.

"When opened, the cellular tissue on the surface of the body beneath the skin is seen to be injected with air, as if a quantity of soap-bubbles were scattered over it, or a dishon, awkward butcher had been trying to make it look fat. The fat is of a greenish-yellow color and of an oily consistence. All the muscles are flabby, and the heart often so soft that the fingers may be made to meet through it. The lungs and liver partake of the disease. The stomach and bowels are pale and empty, and the gall-bladder is distended with bile.

"These symptoms seem to indicate what is probably the case, a poison in the blood, the germ of which enters when the proboscis is inserted to draw blood. The poison-germ, contained in a bulb at the root of the proboscis, seems capable, although very minute in quantity, of reproducing itself, for the blood after death by tsetse is very small in quantity, and scarcely stains the bands in dissection. I shall have by-and-bye to mention another insect, which by the same operation produces in the human subject both vomiting and purging.

The mule, ass, and goat enjoy the same immunity from the tsetse as man and the game. Many large tribes on the Zambesi can keep no domestic animals except the goat, in consequence of the scourge existing in their country. Our children were frequently bitten, yet suffered no harm; and we saw around us numbers of zebras, buffaloes, pigs, pallahs and other antelopes, feeding quietly in the very habitat of the tsetse, yet as undisturbed by its bite as oxen are when they first receive the fatal poison."

"The children of Israel had little within their dwellings, and they were little sensible of the plagues that raged without. When God does not speak peace, what can give it? when He does, who can let it?"

"THE SOLITARY PLACES SHALL BE GLAD."

How will He make us glad?
How is that promise sweet to be fulfilled,
So that our sad,
Our aching hearts be stilled?

Will He a glory shed
O'er the waste places of our lowly days,
That our bowed head
We can in triumph raise?

Or will there gently steal
A subtle peace and stillness o'er our life,—
O'er woe and weal,—
A hushing of all strife;

A calm that naught can break,—
A tender trustfulness that can be "glad,"—
That joy can take
Through good days and through bad;—

A tender twilight calm;
Such as one sees in far-off northern days,
That seems a psalm
Of perfect peaceful praise?

NOW.

A night of danger on the sea,
Of sleeplessness and fear!
Wave after wave comes thundering
Against the strong stone pier;
Each with a terrible recoil,
And a grim and gathering might,
As blast on blast comes howling past,
Each wilder than the last,
All through that awful night,
Well for the ships in the harbor now,
Which came with the morning tide;
With unstrained cable and anchor sure,
How quietly they ride!

Well for the bark that reared at eve,
Though watched with breathless fear;
It was sheltered first ere the tempest burst,
It is safe inside the pier!

But see! a faint and fitful light
Out on the howling sea!
'Tis a vessel that seeks the harbor mouth,
As in death agony,
Though the strong stone arms are open wide,
She has missed the only way;
'Tis all too late for her to drive fast,
The mighty waves have swept her past,
And against that sheltering pier shall cast
Their wrecked and shattered prey.
Nearer and nearer the bark is borne,
As over the deck they dash,
Where sailors five are clinging fast
To the silliest stump of the broken mast,
Waiting the final crash.
Is it all too late? is there succor yet
Those perishing men to reach?
Life is so near on the firm-built pier,
That else must be death to each.

There are daring hearts and powerful arms,
And swift and steady feet;
And they rush as down to a yawning grave,
In the strong recoil of the bravest wave,
Treading that awful path to save
As they trod a homeward street.
Over the boulders and foam they rush,
Into the ghastly hollow;
They fling the rope to the heaving wreck—
The aim was sure, and it strikes the deck,
As the shouts of quick hope follow.
Reached, but not saved! there is more to do;
A trumpet note is heard,
And over the rage and over the roar
Of howling thunders on the shore,
Rings the guiding word.
There is one chance, and only one—
All can be saved; but how?
"The rope hold fast, but quit the mast
At the trumpet signal, 'NOW'!"

There is a moment when the sea
Has spent its furious strength—
A shuddering pause with a sudden swirl,
Gathering force again to hurl
Billow on billow in whirl on whirl;
That moment—comes at length;
With a single shout the "NOW" peals out,
And the answering leap is made.

Selected.

Well for the simple hearts that just Loving the mast with fearless trust
The strange command obeyed!
For the rope is good, and the stout arms pull
Ere the brief storm-tull is o'er;
It is but a swift and blinding sweep
Through the waters wild and dark and deep,
And the men are on the shore—
Safe! though the fend-like blast pursue—
Safe! though the waves dash high;
But the ringing cheer that rises clear
Is pierced with a sudden cry—
"There are but four drawn up to shore,
And five were on the deck!"
And the straining gaze that conquers gloom
Still traces, drifting on to doom,
One man upon the wreck.

Again they chase in sternest race
The far-recoiling waves;
The rope is thrown to the tossing mark,
But reaches not in the wintry dark
The one they strive to save.
Again they rush, and again they fail,
Again, and yet again;
The storm yells back defiance loud,
The breakers rear a rampart proud,
And roar, "In vain, in vain!"
Then a giant wave caught up the wreck,
And bore it on its crest;
One moment it hung quivering there
In horrible arrest.
And the lonely man on the savage sea
A lightning flash nplit,
Still clinging fast to the broken mast
That he had not dared to quit.
Then horror of dark darkness fell,
While eyes flashed inward fire;
And over all the roar and dash,
Through the great blackness came a crash,
A token sure and dire.
The wave had burst upon the pier,
The wreck was scattered wide;
Another "NOW" would never reach
The corpse that lay upon the beach
With the receding tide.

Selected.

Amusements.—We went on shore at Amity Point, [New South Wales] where some of the blacks were amusing themselves, during a rainy portion of the day, with dancing. One of them beat two of their boomerangs together for music, and produced a deafening clack. The men danced, or rather stamped to the tune, often changing the position of their hands, and using great exertion, till every part of their bodies and limbs quivered. They also collected bushes, and danced with them in their hands and under their arms concealing themselves partly by them. They seemed to enjoy this boisterous child's-play for such it greatly resembled. If custom did not render people in some measure blind to folly, many of the amusements practised in circles of society considered highly civilized might perhaps seem as absurd and almost as barbarous. I consider the Society of Friends to have made great advances in true civilization, in having abandoned such amusements as well as in some other particulars. By this abandonment they also avoid much that is inimical to Christian sobriety, and turn their relaxation into channels more rational and conducive to domestic happiness. I believe no people in the world realize so much temporal comfort as they.—James Backhouse.

It is not the encountering of difficulties and dangers in obedience to the promptings of the inward spiritual life which constitutes tempting of God and providence, but the acting without faith, proceeding on our own errands with no previous convictions of duty and no prayer for aid and direction.—David Livingstone.

For "The Friend."

Western Friends in Court.

(Continued from page 70.)

The changes in the condition of the Society are thus described by B. C. H. "In the mediæval history of the Society of Friends, here was a crystallization of its character. They had put themselves rather in the character of an old bottle that would not expand and adapt itself into the condition in which they were placed as an evangelical body. In doing this they got out of the early history which was caused by the new bottle of the Society which would expand and adapt itself to the different edges, &c. For that reason the Society of Friends became stationary. The fundamental doctrines you will find in the usage, character and principles of the early Friends. There is where we want to go to-day, and work the differences in the discussions we have upon our hands, because we are returning to the early day, and the early usages and fundamental principles." "After the death of George Fox, there was a gradual slipping into the state of which I spoke."

In reference to the document of 1830, this witness testified: "It was a proper expression for the object had in view;" but "did not mean every thing."

He thus speaks of the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia: "The Philadelphia Yearly Meeting stands well, but there are two that claim to be Philadelphia Yearly Meeting."

Q. "Has there been any separation in the Yearly Meeting since the Hicksite separation?"

A. "Yes."

Q. "When?"

A. "About 1845 or 1846."

"I have stated that that Yearly Meeting is not in a condition to express its own opinion. It is imbecile in its action for want of unity." Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, at the time of the Ohio separation was desirous—the one part—to offer their fraternity to one portion of the Yearly Meeting, the Hoyle meeting as it is termed, and the other part of the Yearly Meeting spoke in favor of a union with the Huns Yearly Meeting. The discussion was full and earnest, but the clerk was favorable and had the power of the Yearly Meeting in his own hands—therefore the voice of the meeting was overruled, and the clerk of the meeting ordered the epistolary correspondence. That is the way in which it was done. The next year the discontent was so strong that it was found it would effect a separation; they continued the correspondence, and it was dropped; and there they are to-day, imbecile as I say in action."

This witness seems to have made some of these statements from having been misled by representations that he had either heard or read. The writer attended the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1855, and has a clear collection of what took place when the Ohio object was discussed. Only one Friend advocated the reading of the epistle signed by Binns; a number of others desired that either of the epistles from Ohio should be received. But there was a very large expression from many of the most experienced and eighty members, comprising a decided majority of those who spoke, in favor of acknowledging the body represented by B. Hoyle as clerk. And in thus deciding the clerk simply did his duty as the servant of the meeting, the following year (1856) the Ohio and other epistles were read and answered. In 1857 the Ohio and other epistles were read, but the meeting afterwards decided to discontinue all epistolary correspondence with the other Yearly Meetings, and has not resumed it since. There was no separation, as stated by the witness, in 1845 or 1846; neither am I aware that there has ever been two bodies among Friends, since 1827, claiming to be Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends. I am aware, however, that there is a small meeting held within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, that was originally composed of some who left that meeting about 1860. These were afterward joined by others who had become detached from Baltimore, Ohio and Indiana Yearly Meetings. They called themselves a "General Meeting of Friends," but they are sometimes known as "Primitive Friends."

The same witness spoke of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting as the followers of Hoyle, and said that they had run into vulgar fractions. But one of the most surprising statements made by him is contained in his answer to the following question:

Q. "Are the questions determined by a majority vote, or by what means does the clerk ascertain the sense of the meeting?"

A. "A majority vote, if not in opposition to any principle of the Society of Friends. In the early history of the Society in all matters of business—they put the question, or frequently did. If any difference of opinion came up about it—they put the question and had it decided by yeas and nays."

Evan Hadley, the other witness on the part of the plaintiffs, had been clerk of White Lick Quarterly Meeting in 1877. His evidence had reference mainly to the continuation of the organization of that meeting.

The position taken by the Orthodox Friends was, that their meeting was a part of the Society of Friends. This was a body having well-known doctrines and practices which were adopted at the rise of the Society and adhered to by Friends ever since. That the Progressives had abandoned some of its fundamental doctrines, and adopted others which the Society has ever disbelieved and testified against. That instead of the Holy Spirit visiting sinners as an inner light convicting them, warning, instructing and leading them in the pathway of holiness, as they are obedient to its manifestations; they taught, that it only visits to convict of sin, and does not appear as a light or guide to the world in general. That it dwells only in the hearts of believers. That it does not lead to justification only as the Scriptures are known, read and understood. That transgressors who repent are justified before they are sanctified, &c., &c.

Acting upon these new doctrines, they have introduced radical changes in the modes of worship, customs, usages, social habits, &c., which have ever distinguished Friends from other religious sects. That a number of Orthodox Friends protested, many times upon suitable occasions, against these departures, without avail, until they were finally forced to withdraw from those who had thus separated themselves from the true Society of Friends. The Progressives were, therefore, not a part of the religious Society of Friends. And that the Orthodox Western Yearly and White Lick Quarterly Meeting are in unity with that Society, and are in fraternal relations with other Yearly Meetings who adhere to the same faith.

The first witness was Robert W. Hodson, an aged Friend who had been for many years in responsible positions, both in Indiana Yearly Meeting before 1858, and in Western Yearly Meeting since that time. He was one of a committee appointed in 1874, to present an epistle from the latter meeting to the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia.

In 1871, Western Yearly Meeting appointed a committee of twenty-six men and women to hold general meetings within its limits. At first they were conducted with a degree of satisfaction, but after a time they became changed in character. The witnesses and others expressed their disapprobation, but the meetings continued to be unsatisfactory. The committee was continued under appointment in 1872; but six of the number refused to be associated in the work, and they were released. The principal causes of complaint were singing in meetings, the use of a mourner's bench, calling upon each other to speak and pray, to rise in response to certain propositions and questions, reading the bible, and using it while preaching, and not allowing sufficient time for silent waiting. The teaching was unsound on the doctrine of the light of Christ in the soul. These matters were resisted, not only in the committee, but they were brought to the notice of the Yearly Meeting, year after year. This body did nothing to check the innovations, but encouraged them by approving of the reports of the committee and continuing it under appointment.

As another means of relief a special call was issued, in 1876, for a session of the Meeting for Sufferings. The suffering of faithful Friends was laid before this body, which seemed to have little weight therein. Nothing was done which afforded them relief; the innovations were defended, and an address to the members was adopted which contained no reference to the object for which the meeting was called.

This state of things continued until Friends became discouraged. Finding their protests were without avail, of latter time not much was said by way of opposition to the controlling element.

The views of this witness on the subject of the light of Christ within, will be made clear by his answers to the following questions:

Q. "What is the teaching of the Society, and what has it been for two hundred years as to the universality or limitation of that light in men?"

A. "I have understood it to be universal. That it has appeared unto all men, according to Scripture testimony. Several of the earlier writers are very clear on this subject: that this Light, Grace, or Seed, has appeared unto all men, whether they heeded it or not."

Q. "In speaking of all men—do you mean to say all men regardless of whether they are converted or not, or is it limited to those who have been converted?"

A. "To all men. I think George Fox's is as clear as language can be made on that subject, that it has appeared to the sinner as well as to the converted. And the idea I have understood the Society of Friends to believe, is that this has appeared unto all men whether they ever heard of the sufferings of our Saviour, or of the Scriptures. That there is a seed of Grace, that we have received through his atoning sacrifice, which enables us to know what is right and what is wrong."

The next witness was Eleazar Bales, who when asked his age, replied, that if he should live till to-morrow, he would be 87 years old. In answer to the questions as to what offices he held in the Society, and how long he had held them, his reply was: "I have lived in all good fellowship and faith with the Society since my birth and have lived to years of religious understanding; and it has been so thought. And though a feeble instrument, I have been made use of in the Society to some extent. I have been acknowledged as having a gift in the ministry for about fifty-three years."

He proceeded to confirm the statements of the preceding witness respecting the trials. Friends were subjected to on account of the introduction of unsound doctrines and new practices with which they could not unite. He mentioned that on one occasion he had been upholding the necessity of our taking up the cross and following our Saviour; and he was followed by another minister who said that there was no cross to be taken up.* Much feeling was manifested at this stage of the proceedings; many heads were bowed, some faces were covered, and one woman Friend was observed to be weeping freely.

This witness was one of the three Friends appointed by Western Yearly Meeting to convey its epistle to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1874. The latter body declined to receive it—one Friend remarking that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting could not recognize Western Yearly Meeting as long as that meeting allowed singing, mourner's benches, calling on one another to preach and pray, &c., in its subordinate meetings. To this the Western deputation could not reply, because they knew these things were all true. The witness told the writer that he wanted very much to state these facts to the court, but was not allowed to do so.

(To be continued.)

From "The Council Fire,"

Martyr or Murderer.

On an evening of 1863, while an old Scotchman and his family of half-breeds were traveling down the Hell Gate Canon, in Montana Territory, they were suddenly startled by the report of a gun on the opposite side of a creek which they were about to cross.

They supposed that a party of hunters were in the neighborhood after the small game of the mountains, and having crossed the creek they perceived the smoke of a camp-fire.

The Scotchman carelessly rode up, but was astonished at finding the solitary corpse of a white man who had evidently been shot while in the act of eating his supper. A bullet hole was in the back of the head, and a discharged rifle lying in the rear, plainly said that the man had been killed with his own gun.

The Scotchman was frightened and hastily rejoined his family. They fled from the place. Having traveled a few miles they met a citizen in search of stolen horses, and having imparted their story they were impelled to return. A thorough examination was then made, and from papers found upon the body it was ascertained that the murdered man was named Ward, that he was a miner, and had been on his way to Washington Territory. There was also found on him two bills of sale, showing that he had been the purchaser of two horses, one of which animals was then found close by in the brush. On the body was also found a small quantity of gold dust, amounting to about $30. The corpse was decently covered with a blanket, and the parties started for the village of Hell Gate.

There was no law in the Territory at that time, but a few citizens went out on the following morning to bury the dead man. They found after arriving upon the spot that the corpse had been disturbed, and that the blanket had been abstracted. A few days afterward an Indian (the son of the present Pand O'Reille chief) was found riding one of the horses described in the bill of sale found upon the body of Ward, and he also wore the identical blanket with which the body had been covered. He was arrested and taken before the United States Indian Agent. It was then proven that the Indian was one of a party returning from the buffalo grounds; that he had left his camp in advance, and that it was quite impossible for him to have reached the locality in time when the fatal shot was fired. He stated in self-defence that after traveling many miles his horse became tired; that upon reaching a certain point in Hell Gate Canon during the night, he found a horse, and upon examination, the dead white man. He took the fast horse and left his own, and deeming a covering unnecessary for a dead body, he donned the blanket to keep off the chills of the night. The agent released the Indian, as there was nothing to show him guilty. (It has been, and is now, the boast of the Flathead Nation, that the blood of a white man has never been shed by one of its members.) But the white people believed the Indian guilty. There had been misunderstandings for some time past, and indications pointed towards an early war.

Dispatches were sent to the mines, and an organization was about to be effected to punish the Indians severely. They did not wish for war, because they were in the minority even if they had cause. Councils were held, and it was at one of these that the accused murderer of Ward came up and surrendered himself. Said he: "The white people are about to come down upon us and kill our women and children; now deliver me up to them and it will appease their wrath. Let them hang me."

His wishes were complied with. His father, in company with the chiefs, took him to Hell Gate and delivered him to the white citizens. A short trial was had. One of the leaders, white men, simply said, "All in favor of hanging this Indian step on one side of the store and let the balance remain where they are."

The sentence was hanging.

It was while the doomed man was standing upon the dry-goods box, with the fatal noose around his neck, that his father stepped up to him and said: "You are flesh of my flesh, blood of my blood; you are about to meet the Great Spirit; now tell me whether you killed that white man or not?" The reply was: "I have confessed to the priest. The black gowds told me that Jesus Christ died to save sinners, and I tell you, father, that I did not kill that white man; but that I offer myself to be hung in order to save my little brothers and sisters from the wrath of the pale faces."

CHARLEY SHAFFT.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Yellow Glass in a Fog.—Some years ago I was staying at a hotel on the Lake of Constance. One morning a fog came, on which completely obscured the opposite shore; but looking through a strip of yellow glass, which formed the border of the window, I was able to my surprise, to see it distinctly. I presume the yellow glass choked the blue rays reflected by the fog, just as a Nicol's prism held at a proper angle, chokes the rays reflected from the glass and enables us to see clearly the picture behind it. On my way home, I stopped in Paris, and, happening to call on one of the principal opticians, mentioned the circumstance to him. He forth with showed me a naval telescope provided with a cap at the eye end containing a yellow glass, which could be removed at pleasure.—R. in Nature.

Earthquake.—A severe earthquake was felt three weeks ago in the southern part of North Island, New Zealand. No lives were lost, but in some of the townships scarcely a chimney was left standing. Fissures extending for many miles are reported to have been made and the railway line was rendered unsafe in that neighborhood, owing to the undulations of the earth alternately raising and depressing the rails.—Nature of 9th mo. 15th.

Death in the Sleeping-room.—It is within the experience of every physician to have some strong and healthy young people come here and go to service in shops and mills, and to know that within a year or two their health fails and they die with consumption. Many of them have a good family history, so far as can be learned from the subject. I have seen the same class in other places, and know that it was uncommon for them to suffer as they do here. I have seen hundreds of them digging in the Ohio Canal, and sleeping in board shanties, without the general health becoming affected in the least, in the way that they are here. All men employed on the farms in the Sciota Valley are, as a rule healthy, and they are the same class which suffers here by the score. What makes this difference? Here they live in filthy boarding houses, with perhaps enough to eat, but they sleep in close rooms, several persons in the same apartment, with their clothes saturated with perspiration, or, when the clothes are removed, they are hung in the same room, or what is worse, in a small closet to ferment and dry. The decomposition which takes place assists very greatly to contaminate the atmosphere, and thus day by day they live in air poisoned with changed animal compounds, until the general health fails, and cough commences, and the subject continues to live in the same way, not thinking or being told that the conditions by which he is surrounded are killing him. It is next to impossible to correct these abuses against propriety. The mistress would show you the door, should you say that her house was not clean, or was kept in such a way as to lead to sickness among her people. Yet I venture the assertion, that the odor produced in such places, and under such circumstances, is a peculiar and characteristic that it can be distinguished by the odor imparted to clean clothing kept in such closets, and is so persistent as to remain for some time after they have been removed and even worn away. I have found the same conditions in well-kept

* "Then said Jesus unto his disciples, if any man would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me."—Matthew xvi. 24.

"Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple."—Luke xiv. 27.

private houses, among the help, and brought about in the same way. Very frequently do meet servants who have come here well and early, with rosy cheeks, and after a few days of service the health fails, a cough begins, and within the next year they die with consumption. The number who go in this way is not small. Inquire of such persons, and often you cannot find anything wrong in the family history. These persons are found among girls who work in cellar kitchens and small places, often overheated, and sleep in small, close rooms, so as to generate a miasm, which gradually produces the diseases which all meet so commonly. These people suffer in this way signifi- cantly, but are always offended if they are told that their afflictions have been produced by not taking proper care of their persons and of their clothing. The ladies in mansions are also sensitive if a suggestion could be made that there is anything about the premises not as it should be. From long observation on this question, I am satisfied that there exists in these, fruitful sources of disease.—Dr. J. W. Scott in the Ohio Medical Journal.

A tender conscience stands in the way of a great deal of evil, and also of a great deal that seems enjoyable and to be desired. The man who is unwilling to do wrong is at an apparent disadvantage in the world, both in the struggle for success in life, and in the pursuit of personal happiness. It is harder, yet easier, to get along in the world with a firm heart and a sensitive conscience. "A cold head and a colder heart make many things easy," says Charles Kingsley. Going uphill requires no such effort as clambering up hill, or even as resisting the temptation to let go and slide. But who would take things easy, and take the consequences of easy-going? It is better to do right at its real cost of struggle and pain, than to purchase present comfort by wrong doing or hardness of heart.—Selected.

Let us make a stand on the ancient ways, and then look about us, and discover what is the straight and right way, and walk in it.—Lord Bacon on Innovation.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 15, 1881.

Ohio Yearly Meeting convened on First-day, Ninth month 25th, at Stillwater, near Barnesville, Ohio—the meeting of Ministers and Elders having been held the day previous. There were no strangers present with ministers, though a considerable number were in attendance, many of them from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The two public meetings held on First-day were very large, as has been the case for years past. Besides their own members, people from Barnesville and the vicinity came in such numbers that hundreds were unable to find room in the meeting-house. These seasons of Divine worship are said to have been favored opportunities.

Among the subjects which occupied the sinner's meetings, the gradual education and religious training of the children claimed considerable attention. The reports on education showed that there were 750 children of a suitable age to go to school. Some of these had been assisted in their education by the Committee of the Yearly Meeting on that subject, to whose use $200 was appropriated out of the Yearly Meetings' funds.

Wilson Hall and Abel H. Blackburn acted as clerks.

In considering the state of Society as shown by the queries and answers, several Friends were exercised in a lively manner on various subjects, such as the attendance of religious meetings, the maintenance of love for one another, keeping to our Christian testimony to plainness in dress and other things, training the young in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, being an example to others in a holy life and deportment, and avoiding any compromise of our testimony to the nature of true gospel ministry, which, as it is a free gift from Christ, should be freely exercised for the benefit of his Church.

A Friend remarked, that though but few who were present could retain in their memory all of the advice which had been given, yet there was no injunction which they could remember, "Have salt in yourselves."

A minute, embodying the substance of the exercise which had spread over the meeting, was prepared by a committee appointed for that purpose, and directed to be sent down to subordinate meetings in the extracts from the minutes.

An appropriation of $50 was made to the committee charged with the distribution of Friends' books; and it was concluded to direct the Quarterly Meetings to raise in the usual manner the amount needed to pay the debt still remaining on the boarding-school building, about $1400, including interest.

A memorial of Walter Bundy, a youth of 21, who died of consumption, took strong hold of the feelings of those who heard it read, and opened the way for much exhortation.

A visit was received by the men's meeting from a woman Friend, who was concerned to press on the attention of her hearers the importance of faithfully upholding the testimony of the Society to true spiritual worship.

A joint committee was appointed to take into consideration the situation of Friends in scattered bodies throughout the land. There was a strong and united expression of sentiment that this was a step which it would be right for the Yearly Meeting to take, mingled with a feeling of caution that nothing should be done rashly.

At the close of the meeting on Fifth-day the brief minute of the clerk was read, and after a time of solemn quiet, the Yearly Meeting of Ohio for 1881, was a thing of the past.

The boarding-school house being in close proximity to the place of meeting, furnishes a convenient temporary home to a large number of those who attend; who thus have the opportunity of pleasant intercourse with beloved Friends in the intervals of the meetings.

A judicious Friend who has attended Ohio Yearly Meeting speaks of it as a strong body, with members not inferior to those who can be found elsewhere, in spiritual experience, sound judgment and general carefulness; and that they have no need to be anxious on their own account about epistolary correspondence with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

These sentiments accord with our own feelings for years past—the belief having been gradually formed, that such a correspondence is more important to our own Yearly Meeting than it is to that of Ohio.

The practice of wearing mourning apparel, and the use of black crape or other material, as a sign of sorrow for the loss of relatives or friends, is a conformity to the customs of the world, which the Society of Friends has long been concerned to caution its members against. It is both natural and proper to feel the removal from our midst of those whom we have loved and valued. But these outward signs of mourning are no real token of the inner feelings. They are often worn for appearance sake, and as a matter of form, by those whose hearts are but slightly, if at all, affected with grief. And where the heart is truly sad, there is no propriety or advantage in parading the fact before the eyes of the world, as if to solicit sympathy from strangers.

We may remember our Saviour reproved that disposition which led some in his day to perform their prayers at the corners of the streets, that they might be seen of men. And though this was not the same act as wearing mourning, yet we think in many cases the underlying principle was the same—to gain the approbation of man.

In common with many others, we have felt that, for the same reasons, Friends could take no part in the public displays connected with the death of our late President. Though it was a satisfaction to observe the general prevalence of real sorrow and sympathy on account of that solemn event, yet the wasteful expense and the outward show, were calculated to sadden a thoughtful mind.

A correspondent from California, in a letter dated 9th month 26th, thus refers to this subject:

"I sit down in my office to-day with a burdened mind, on looking abroad and seeing the great amount of folly and extravagance now indulged in over the land. Surely it calls for inward exercise that our dear older and younger Friends may be preserved from any participation therein. I trust we all feel the suffering and woe of those who are in any way afflicted; but is it any cause for us to indulge in the solemn mockery of outward observances of grief and folly?"

"I have felt much on this occasion that the Lord will be pleased to preserve a remnant who will plead for the purity and simplicity of the holy, self-denying religion of Jesus. I cannot feel clear in the sight of my Heavenly Father, without lifting up my voice against these evil tendencies."

We have received a circular of The Society for Home Culture, with a request to notice it in our columns. It was organized in 1880, by members of the Society of Friends. Its object is to advise those who desire to pursue their studies after leaving school. Those desiring fuller information can obtain copies of the circular by addressing the Secretary, Watson W. Dewees, Westtown P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The U. S. Senate convened on noon on Second-day the 10th inst. Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, was elected President of that body, pro tempore.

Late advices from Arizona state that eighteen of George's band, who recently broke camp, have surrendered themselves. The bulk of the hostile Indians, however, have gone to the southern end of the Chiricahua Mountains, and it is thought they will get away from there. General Wilcox, who arrived at Tucson on Fifth-day night of last week, said he would cross the border in pursuit of them, and would co-operate with any Mexican troops that would assist him in his endeavors to capture the Indians. The Mexican Consul at Tucson has telegraphed to Chihuahua, and sent orders to the garrison there, to get Mexican troops to co-operate with the Americans.

There were heavy frosts in the billie regions of Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina on the night of the 5th inst. It is feared that serious damage has been done to the growing tobacco, wheat, Durville, Virginia, Raleigh, North Carolina, and there is apprehension that the large growth of cotton in the northern portion of South Carolina has been destroyed.

A fire in New York on the evening of the 10th, totally destroyed the Fourth Avenue Car Stables, covering an entire block, and owned by William H. Vanderbilt; and also Merrell's large furniture storage building, occupying the middle of the block on the south side of Thirty-second street. The loss on the stables is estimated at $500,000. A number of horses perished in the flames. The loss on Merrell's building and its contents is estimated at $2,000,000. The contents of the furniture in New York has stored there, and was destroyed. A picture, valued at $50,000, the property of W. Vanderbilt, was also destroyed.

Throughout southern Minnesota, northern Iowa, and a large portion of Dakota, rain has been falling almost incessantly since the 22nd of August. The corn, the finest surface of the water; the grain is sprouting in the stack, and scarcely any plowing has been done.

The colored people of Raleigh, N. C. will hold an industrial fair, beginning 10th mo. 31st.

An adventurous party of scientists, have lately hoisted the Stars and Stripes, North Carolina, the highest point of Mount Whitney, the highest point of land in the United States outside of Alaska.

The shipments of grain from New York during 9th month were nearly 6,000,000 bushels less than during 9th month, 1880.

During the eight months ending 8th mo. 31st, 1881, the exports of petroleum and petroleum products from the United States amounted in value to $30,187,250, against a total of $27,650 during the corresponding period of 1880.

The cultivation of rice in the Gulf section is annually assuming proportions of greater magnitude. Before the late war it nearly reached the yield of 200,000,000 bushels yearly. After the war its cultivation was resumed on a large scale, and in 1870 the harvest was about 74,000,000 bushels. This year's crop throughout the Gulf States will be about 100,000,000 bushels. The South Carolina journal, remarks 150,000,000 bushels.

It is reported that a terrible plague has appeared near Waldron, Platte county, Missouri. Within five days eleven persons have died, and none of those now sick show signs of recovery. The bodies of the sufferers are covered with black spots. The Board of Health states that there has been 34 deaths in this city last week, 79 more than during the corresponding week of last year, and 37 less than during the week ending 10th month 1st, 1881. Of these 197 were males and 150 females; 54 died of consumption, 24 of typhoid fever, 20 of pneumonia.

Markets.—U. S. 3's, 100's, 100's; 4's, 113; 4's, 110; currency 63, 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11 1/2 to 13 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard crude 8 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour was less active, but prices were unchanged. Sales of superfine at $5.25 a $5.50; western and Pennsylvania extras, at $6.50 a $7.12; 200 barrels Minnesota extra, clear, at $8 a $8.12; 300 barrels Minnesota extra, clear, at $8.50 a $8.50; 200 barrels Minnesota extra on private terms; 400 barrels Pennsylvania extra family good, at $7.50; 300 barrels do. do. choice, at $7.50 a $7.75; 300 barrels Ohio do. do. choice, at $8 a $8.50; 100 barrels Minnesota patents, choice, at $9.50; 100 barrels do. do. high grade, at $9.50; 100 barrels Wisconsin patents, choice, at $9.50; winter wheat patents at $9.50, and 1100 barrels city mills family on private terms. Rye flour sells at $6.50 per barrel. Corn meal was inactive, and no sales have been reported. Feed was sold. Sales of three ears winter barn, track, at $21.50 per ton; No. 2 spring do. at $21.00 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was dull, unsettled and lower. Sales of 3000 bushels No. 2 red at $1.47 a $1.48, as to quality and location; 3100 bushels do. do. 3000 bushels do. at $1.48; 1900 bushels do. at $1.48; 5000 bushels for 11th month, at $1.51. Rye was dull; 400 bushels sold at $1.07 per bushel. Corn was lower; about 9000 bushels sold in lots at 75 cts. for yellow; 74 cts. for mixed; 73 cts. for steamer; 72 cts. for No. 3; 72 cts. for No. 4. Oats were unchanged; sales of 11,000 bushels white at 51 a 52 cts., and rejected and mixed at 48 a 49 cts. per bushel, and 15,000 bushels No. 2 white at 51 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 10th mo. 31st, 1881.—Loads of hay, 335; loads of straw, 57. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.35 to $1.45 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.25 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; Straw, $1.05 to $1.15 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in good demand and prices were a fraction higher; 3600 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 3 1/2 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were in demand, and good grades were a fraction higher; 15,500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 3 1/2 cts., and lambs at 4 a 7 1/2 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Pork was fairly held; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 10 1/2 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra Chicago.

FOREIGN.—O'Donnell, speaking at the Land League meeting at Dungarvan recently, said there were two Governments in Ireland—one, Gladstone's, which no one would obey, the other, that of the League, which people would obey.

The Dublin correspondent of the Daily News, after interviewing several influential men who have intimate knowledge of the wants and wishes of the farmers of a large portion of the province of Connaught, says he has put together the chief complaints, and the greatest losses of the Shannon, the farmers are disposed to take advantage of the Land act to the utmost extent, and that the Land League will not be able to divert them from their purpose.

Paris and its suburbs now contain about 150 miles of streets, and the city has the greatest length of tramways, after the metropolis, are Lille, Rouen, Roubaix and Beziers, with only 15, 14, 9 and 8 miles respectively.

Madrid, 10th mo. 8th.—In the Senate to-day Senator Goyena presented an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne demanding autonomy for Cuba. It demands the conclusion of a commercial treaty between Cuba and the United States on the basis of absolute freedom of commerce. The Conservative newspapers declare that the amendment must be withdrawn, as the Government has been appointing Governor of Cuba in place of General Blanco. He will start for Cuba on the 28th inst.

A despatch to the Times from Geneva says: The Socialist Congress at Chur closed Fifth-day. The American delegate gave a desponding account of the state of Socialism in America. He said that the number of Socialist newspapers had been reduced by one-half since 1877, and that the better times have caused a thinning of their ranks. It was resolved to hold a Congress in Paris in 1883.

The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says has a communication from St. Petersburg announcing that the headquarters of the nihilists have been discovered, and that sixty arrests have been made.

A report of local doctors states that 77 per cent. of the cases of the diphtheria epidemic now raging in the province of Orel, Central Russia, are fatal.

It is stated that the Government of Russia intends to allow Jews to acquire land in places where there is no fear of collision between them and the populace. An article in the Journal de St. Petersburg indicates that the elevation of Servis to a kingdom is probably shortly.

Count Wallduro, the Arctic explorer, who has just returned to Hammerfest from a journey to the lower Yenisei in a Bremen merchant steamer, is reported as declaring such navigation possible every year, despite the difficulties which have hitherto been held to surround it.

Baron Von Haymerle, the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, died suddenly at 3.30 on the afternoon of the 10th inst.

The Minister of Justice has introduced in the Lower House of the Austro-Hungary Diet, a bill legalizing marriages of Jews and Christians.

A despatch to the Times from Tunis, dated Sixth-day, says it is rumored that the Bey's Ministers in Council agreed on the 10th inst. to depose the Tunisian representative of the Daily News declares that the Bey, speaking on the subject, said it was unnecessary to ask his consent, as he had lost all authority.

A despatch from Tunis says: "For some days past severe fighting has been proceeding around Kef between the French garrison and the insurgents. General Sabatier has advanced two days' march towards Kairuan lately. In fact, a majority of Frankland, the European residents are drawing a petition in favor of the occupation of the city of Tunis."

A sample of water from the Sacred Well of Mecca has been analyzed and found to be polluted by sewage to an extraordinary degree of disease-breeding filthiness. In fact, Professor Frankland, who made the analysis, calls it bottled cholera, and, as this water is of great demand throughout Mohammedan countries, it is manifest that it is likely to be an active agent in the dissemination of disease.

A despatch to the London Standard from Fort Ann says: In the Boers object to the article in the convention by which the Queen has reserved control of the external relations of the State, including the conclusion of treaties and the conduct of diplomatic intercourse with foreign powers, and the article defining the duties of the British Resident. They also object to the article which gives the Queen the right of appointing and removing for all denunciations; to the article declaring that no slavery or apprenticeship partaking of slavery shall be tolerated by the Boers; to the article providing that all persons other than natives who conform to the law of the Transvaal shall have free access to Courts of Justice for the protection and defence of their rights. The correspondent says the above explains why, in the recent debate in the Volksraad, members declared that the Convention dealt with the Boers as though they were hordes of savages.

A quantity of bees, destined for Ontario, have been received in London from Cyprus. They were let loose in London for a fly, and afterwards repacked for the remainder of their journey. They are conveyed in small boxes, partly covered with perforated metal, and are provided with honey and water. A similar consignment of this unusual freight was successfully forwarded to Canada last year.

It is stated in Ottawa that an appeal will be made to the Dominion Government for the relief of the sufferers by the bush fires on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. Six hundred miles of coast have been devastated, and whole villages destroyed, with boats, net and the summer catches of the fisheries.

It is stated from Madras, that the Seminary of St. Sulphice has settled its differences with the Oka Indian by purchasing 25,000 acres of land in the Muskoka district, and paying all the expenses of settling the Indian thereon.

The government of Quebec has been asked to send relief to the people of Anticosti Island, who are in great distress, owing to the failure of the fisheries.

The grain crops in British Columbia have been seriously damaged by continuous rains, from the boundary northward to a distance of 200 miles.

The latest advices from South America, via Panama, are that Peru has refused to receive the early appointment of JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Sup't., and that an expedition will be sent to capture Arequipa.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

THE WINTER SESSION begins on Second-day, 10th mo. 31st, 1881. Parents and others intending to send their children to the Westtown Boarding School, apply to JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS, Sup't., at Westtown P. O., Chester Co., Pa., or to CHARLES J. ALLEN, Treasurer, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE. New Franklin, (Trenton) N. J., Ward, Philadelphia, Pa. Physician, Superintendent—GEO. C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at his residence, Tuckerton, N. J., on the 3rd of the 10th inst. 1881, JOHN W. WARD, Physician, aged 92 years, a member of Little Egg Harbor Parishes and Monthly Meetings. Her humble consistent life gave evidence that she was concerned for her spiritual welfare and growth in the truth, as it is in Jesus; and although the summons to this dear Friend came at 1 the night when she was 92 years and friends have been so long beloved that her end was peace. She was entered resigned to the Lord's will, and said, "I am going home."

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 22, 1881.

NO. 11.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

A Concise Account of Pennsbury in Bucks County, Penna., by G. W. B., 1831.

Pennsbury was the name bestowed upon William Penn's favorite American mansion and its near surroundings: the location was Penn's Manor, near the Delaware River, and near the south-eastern extremity of Bucks County, Pennsylvania. It was a place which attracted much attention in its early history, and it was a locality around which clusters rich historic interest—religious, political, official, social, domestic. The spacious mansion itself was a prodigy of the times, and the austere family which occupied it the centre of great attraction. The founder of a new and untried system of government, there spent much of his happier hours, relaxing at times from the severe duties of his position, and in the enclosure of the family circle, partaking the more quiet enjoyments of life; but these hours of recreation doubtless were mingled with seasons of thoughtful, and sometimes painful, solicitude, under the weight of the great trust that had been committed to him, and the heavy responsibilities he had accepted and assumed; yet he pursued his way amid the sunshine and the clouds which sometimes surrounded him, with unwavering faith in the triumph of his humane, liberal, just and Christian policy. The infant government of Pennsylvania received no inconsiderable portion of its nursing at Pennsbury.

Penn's Manor, as originally laid out by William Penn, contained 8431 acres—the land partly alluvial, and principally covered with forest. The boundaries were somewhat irregular, but they bordered for several miles on the river Delaware, and extended several miles inland; they also bordered on several tracts of land taken up by earlier settlers, and under the jurisdiction of the Governor of New York, and never belonged to the Penn estate. About three miles intervenes in a northerly direction between Bristol, Penna., and the farthest point in the original Manor boundary. That portion of the domain lying between Governor's Creek and Welcome Creek, containing the site of the original mansion and its surrounding improvements, has been represented, and with a degree of plausibility, as a noble island, an ancient Indian royalty, with its elements from the river bending several times around it, chosen by chieftains nurtured in aboriginal warfare, as a position possessing many advantages for defence against their enemies, and while in their possession bearing the name of Sepassin. There is a portion of Penn's Manor formerly occupied by beds of creeks and affluents from and to the river, which is now cultivated land, and this circumstance may in a degree account for the changed appearance of the surface and surroundings. Pennsbury is not now upon an island.

Upon the chosen situation, the agents of William Penn commenced building a habitation suitable for the governor of a great province, even before his first arrival in the country. It was erected in 1682-3, and with the improvements, some of which were perhaps added at a later date, cost £5000, which was estimated in those days as a large sum of money. The mansion was sixty feet in length, forty in breadth, and two stories high, built of bricks, and covered with tiles. There was a large reservoir for water on top of the house, constructed of lead, and to the leakage from it was partly ascribed the premature decay of the building. It has also been said that much of the lead was pillaged at the time of the Revolutionary war, for the purpose of moulding bullets. Judging from relics found upon the premises, at least some of the window sash were likewise of lead. The out-houses—including a kitchen and larder, a wash-house, a house for brewing and baking, and a stable for twelve horses—were all buildings one and a half stories high, and are said to have been so disposed as to produce an effect agreeable and picturesque. The large wooden brew-house was more secluded: after this historic building, which has attracted so much curiosity and been visited by so many people, was not needed or made use of for the special purpose of brewing, it was utilized as a farmhouse for many successive years; but it has now disappeared, except the foundations, which are still visible.

The point has been somewhat controverted, but it is generally believed that the mansion faced the Delaware; its appearance has been represented as stately, and that the upper windows commanded a magnificent view of the river and of the opposite shores of New Jersey. The entrance was by stone steps leading to a handsome porch, on the oak capitals of which were displayed carvings of vines and clusters of grapes, imported by the Proprietor from England. The porch opened into a spacious hall extending nearly the whole length of the house, which was used upon public occasions, for the meeting of the council, for the accommodation of strangers and distinguished guests, for collective intercourse with the Indian tribes, and probably for courts and religious meetings, which it is asserted were held at the mansion. On the first floor there was also a small hall, and three parlors, all wainscoted with English oak, and communicating by folding doors,

From information obtained through the instrumentality of John Penn, the great hall is represented as containing, among other articles of furniture, one long table, a supply of pewter plates and dishes, and six vessels for holding water or beer. It is probable that this hall was also occupied upon various public occasions for the festive entertainment of William Penn's numerous guests, among whom the Indians are said to have been the most frequent partakers of his hospitality. Information through the same channel, giving a descriptive account of the varied furniture distributed through the three parlors and little hall, described a great leather chair in one of the apartments: this was probably used by the Governor upon important public occasions. The same source of information describes the four chambers as being well supplied with beds, bedding, chairs, tables, &c. In one of them the bed curtains were of satin; in another, of camlet; in another, of striped linen. The chambers in the garret were furnished with four beds. We also gather from the same authority; that upon the broad walk or avenue lined and shaded with poplars, extending from the mansion to the river brink, and descending by a flight of stone steps from the upper to the lower terrace, on one occasion the tables were spread for the festive entertainment of a large number of Indian guests; and among the viands prepared were one hundred turkeys, beside venison and other meats.

The mansion stood upon a gentle elevation surrounded on all sides by gardens, lawns, shrubberies, and flower beds to which the most beautiful wild flowers found in the country, native and procured, were transplanted. The Proprietor has been represented as being extremely fond of a suitable country house with extensive gardens, and that he spared neither care nor money in order to make Pennsbury prominently attractive as a residence. He imported skilful gardeners, both from England and from Scotland. The gardens themselves were a marvel in the colony for their extensiveness, for their beauty, for their attractiveness of location, and for the skill manifested in their management; various kinds of trees, shrubs, seeds and roots were imported from England; among them walnuts and fruit trees. The adjacent woods were laid out in walks and drives at the time of the Governor's first visit to the country; and he afterward, in several of his letters, required the preservation of the trees. There were also more distant vistas, opening prospects down the Delaware, and upward toward the falls.

The Governor, both on his first and second visits to Pennsylvania, imported valuable horses. The family had a large travelling coach at its disposal, but owing to the frequent badness of the roads it was not very often called into service; a calash was a more frequent accommodation. Hannah and Letitia, the wife and daughter of William Penn, rode in a sedan chair when they went a shopping in the city, or visited their female friends in the neighborhood, and judging from the circumstance that several side-saddles and pillows were found in the mansion after the family had left America, it is reasonable to suppose that the women to some extent practised horseback riding. The Governor himself frequently rode around the country on horseback, but he generally travelled between Pennsylvania and Philadelphia in his barge, to which he was very partial, manifesting peculiar interest in it; it was of considerable dimensions, furnished with a mast and six oars. In a letter to his steward, he says: "But above all dead things, my barge. I hope nobody uses it on any account, and that she is kept in a dry dock, or at least covered from the weather."

Isaac Norris thus writes of the Proprietor's wife when the family were about leaving the country: "His excellent wife, and she is beloved by all (I believe I may say in its fullest extent); so is her leaving us heavy and of real sorrow to her friends; she has carried under and through all with a wonderful evenness, humility and freedom; her sweetness and goodness have become her character, and are indeed extraordinary. In short, we love her, and she deserves it." Letitia, the daughter of William and Gulelma Penn, has been represented as very interesting and attractive: the certificate setting forth membership and removal granted by her friends in a collective capacity, upon her return to England, portrayed their estimation of her merits in language very appreciative. But it has been represented, that these two worthy females, Hannah and Letitia Penn, after the novelty of the wilderness had passed away, had no cordial love for the country of their adoption, and had more than once invited the Proprietor to take them back to their beloved England; that they were in a flutter of delight at the prospect of leaving America; and that they themselves, were perhaps the only persons in Pennsylvania who rejoiced at their departure.

Isaac Norris also writes: "The Governor's wife and daughter are well; their little son, a lovely babe; his wife is a woman truly well beloved here, exemplary in her station, and of an excellent spirit, which adds lustre to her character, and has a great place in the hearts of all people." Deborah Logan mentions a tradition heard in her youth from an old woman in Bucks county, "who went, when she was a girl, with a basket containing a rural present to the Proprietor's mansion, and saw his wife, a delicate, pretty woman, sitting beside the cradle of her infant." The child which is here brought into notice was probably the one, and the only one of William Penn's children born in America.

(To be concluded.)

"I cannot do this," said a Christian merchant in reference to some business operations in which he was asked to take part—"I cannot do this. There is a man inside of me that won't let me do it. He talks to me of nights about it, and I have to do business in a different way!"

Oh! those talks of night about the business of the day, when "the man inside" has our ear and there is no escape from the judgment he pronounces! "Peace blessed is he who is able to hear it in peace!"

For "The Friend."

Hidden, Faithful Ones.

There are no doubt scattered through the length and breadth of Christendom, not a few faithful and hidden ones, who are earnest in the pursuit of living water, and of enduring, substantial truth. These are resigned to the lowly, obscure and tranquil state in which Providence has placed them. These are "Content indeed to sojourn while they must

Below the skies, but having there their home.
The world o'erlooks them in her busy career
Of objects more illustrious in her view:
And occupied as earnestly as she
Though more sublimely, they o'erlook the world.
She scorns their pleasures, for she knows them not;
They seek not her's, for they have proved them vain."

These could, no doubt adopt, in measure, the language of the Church formerly to its Holy Head, when it was hidden, though led, as in the wilderness: "Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory." "Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not: thou, O Lord, art our Father, our Redeemer: thy name is from everlasting." These, as they are careful to abide with the dear Master in suffering and in rejoicing, will know his all-powerful arm to be round about them to support. For "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and He will show them his covenant." The eye of the Good Shepherd is ever upon his little flock wherever located; and as these look to, and rely upon Him, all the power of the enemy shall not be able to scatter one sheep from his fold, or entice one lamb from his safe enclosure. But all depends upon keeping close to Him, who can alone preserve in the dangers and temptations incident to this state of weakness and probation. It is a precious and glorious as well as incontrovertible truth, that "The foundation of God standeth sure;" and that Jesus is all powerful to deliver, and no less always ready to receive with open arms all who, in humility of heart, seek to him for life and salvation.

She who broke the alabaster box formerly, and with the precious ointment thereof anointed the dear Saviour, was signally recognized and honored by Him. There is no doubt that among the little band of hidden ones alluded to, there are those who have likewise anointed the feet of Jesus by giving themselves, because of their filial love, as a living sacrifice to Him. Though "this gospel" may not "be preached in the whole world" for a memorial, as was to be of the woman in the text, it shall nevertheless be recorded in that book of remembrance written before Him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. There are other biblical records which are likewise truly encouraging to the lowly humble traveller. One of these is the case of the Centurion who appealed to Jesus to come and heal his servant; but in much abasement of self said, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof; but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed," &c. When Jesus heard it, He said, "Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Another is the instance of good king Hezekiah; who, when sorely chastened in spirit, prayed unto the Lord, saying, "I beseech thee, O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight;" upon which the answer from the Lord was, "I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will heal thee," &c. Fourth is the testimony concerning Gideon who, under a close fight of afflictions, said to the angel of the Lord that appeared unto him to make him a judge in Israel, "where wilt thou have me? Behold, my family is poor in Manassah, and I am the least in my father's house." But the answer of the angel of the Lord was, "Go in this thy might surely I will be with thee," &c. Cannot some of this class receive instruction also in the straits and seasons of proving, from what Manoah's wife pleaded: "If the Lord were pleased to kill us, He would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat offering at our hand; neither would He have showed us these things," &c. In connection with the foregoing, the following testimony bears close upon the subject in hand: "In a summary review of Richard Baxter's matured experience in regard to religion, taken by him towards the latter part of his life, in which enlargement of view and abasement of self discovered, we have the following sentence: 'I less admire gifts of utterance, and the profession of religion than I once did; or have much more charity for many, who by the want of gifts do make an obscurer profession. I once thought, that almost all we could pray movingly and fluently, and talkers of religion had been saints. But experience hath opened to me, what odious crimes may consist with high profession. While I have met with divers obscure persons, not noted for any extraordinary profession or forwardness in religion, but only to live a quiet, blameless life, whom I have after found to have lived, as far as I could discern, a truly good and sanctified life.'"

The imperative duty of all is to watch over their own hearts. This, faithfully attended to, will ever induce low and sober thoughts of one's self. It will lead us into the bare part of the desert where Moses was eminent instructed, and will preserve there. The great apostle Paul was kept so low and dependent that he dared not glory in any thing save his infirmities; and this he did—"that the power Christ might rest upon him." May none be afraid of the low valley of sweet humility where the power of Christ is experienced, where is the "garden enclosed"—"a fount of gardens, a well of living waters, and stream from Lebanon."

May the little, hidden, faithful ones be encouraged. May they never east away the shield of faith as though it had not been anointed with oil. In every sorrow-stirring and proving season may their trust be in the Lord alone; who will then be their sufficient ever-present helper. He will furnish with grace and gifts, with child-like dependence and fervent, effectual prayer. His strength is made perfect in weakness. Not sparrow can fall to the ground without his notice. Not a nook so retired that his eye doth not penetrate it. Not a chastened, pining soul so poor, weary, or disconsolate, but he doth not know it altogether. A moth may forget the darling of her bosom, before He can forget any of his loving, dependent faithful children. These, in the time of trouble, He will hide in his pavilion; in the secret of his tabernacle will He hide them. "Thou young lions do lack, and suffer hunger; but they that wait upon the Lord shall not want ny good thing." "He giveth power to the aint, and to them that have no might of their wn, he increaseth strength."

Colored Men in China.

from The Southern Workman, Hampton, Va., Eighth mo., 1882.

Our kind correspondent, to whom we are indebted for the following interesting article, writes respecting it:

"There are two points illustrated: (1) the negro capacity under favorable circumstances; (2) the extraordinary recovery of power and energy by the Chinese which has been remarked by many observers, and which is an important element of the political future of this far East.

"The writer of the paragraph is W. N. Armstrong, Attorney-General of the Sandwich Islands, who was travelling with King Kalakaua."

In a previous letter I spoke about a negro, A. Butler, a resident of Shanghai, China, is career is quite remarkable. His parents are Africans, or pure negroes. His father a teacher in Washington, D. C. He was educated in Paris, and there learned to speak French, Italian, German and Spanish. I think he has an aptitude for languages. When Burlingame was appointed Minister to Peking some years ago, he met Butler in Paris, made him his private secretary, and took him to China, where he became familiar with the open Chinese.

Burlingame always put him on a footing of social equality. Wishing to go into business, Butler left the American Embassy, and took a post in one of the great American trading houses. Subsequently he went into the service of the Shanghai Navigation Company. For some time past, the Chinese officials, and some of the rich Chinese merchants, have been watching carefully the operations of the Europeans in steam navigation, supported by European capital. These prudent, careful men, determined that if there was any profit in the trade, the Chinese should have it, and not the fan qui (foreign devil). Therefore they began to buy steamships themselves, and to run them to and from their own ports. They organized the China Merchants' Steamship Company. They put their own, and not foreign, money into it. They purchased the Shanghai Company's Steamers, and Butler went into their employment. Still, these Chinese, careful and economical as they are, did not understand the business of running steamships, for it is a business which requires special training. These men were cheated by Europeans in the quality of the vessels sold, and they were held in great contempt by Europeans and Americans who kept lines of steamships in the East, and who believed that their dominion over the sea would never be successfully disputed by the "pig-tails." The Chinese concluded it would be well to employ Europeans at first in the most respectable positions. But the trouble has been that Europeans have generally tried to rob the Chinese, when employed by them. The owners of this new Chinese line, including some of the most influential men in the Chinese government, put Butler in charge of one of the most important departments of the business, and authorized him to reorganize the service in his own way. He is a natural organizer, one of those men who know how to put things in their proper place, how to put down confusion. He systematized the business, brought order out of chaos, introduced economy, enforced discipline, and rivaled the Europeans in their steamship service. The result is that, after two years' work, this Chinese Steamship Company, instead of running at a loss, has earned over a million of dollars net profit. The prospect now is, that it will earn very large annual dividends.

The Chinese official who is at the head of the Company told me that they considered Butler not only a man of great ability, but an honest man. He said that he was a very safe adviser, and they regarded him as an important agent in the future operations of the Company. Now this Chinese Company own already thirty-six steamers. They are bidding for the trade of the Pacific Ocean. One of their vessels lately went to San Francisco, and reduced the price of freight to China. The American and European lines are by no means easy at the appearance of this great steamship fleet; no one knows where its operations will stop. As these people learn more thoroughly the steamship business, they will become more formidable rivals to the Europeans, and as they are content with much less profit than the Europeans, and the business is conducted at their own homes, and not with a distant European basis, it is easy to see that the time is soon coming when the vast trade of the great Pacific Ocean will be in Chinese hands.

Coal is an expensive article in China. Supplies for steamers are brought from Australia and Java. Now there are immense coal-fields in China. The Chinese will not let the Europeans touch these coal-fields under any circumstances, but they can touch them themselves. Already they have opened a vast colliery about eighty miles from tide water at Tientsin; a canal from the mine to the ocean is about finished. The coal is owned by the same people who control the steamship company.

This year coal will be delivered to ships. If the Chinese prefer to consume the coal in their own vessels, instead of selling it to the foreign steamers, it will not take long to wipe out the foreign service, as the cost of the coal will be so much less than that now used by all steamers.

Butler is a leading man in this magnificent enterprise in China.

I have related this incident because it bears on the question of the "color line," and I write this from a city where the presence of twenty-six different nationalities has obliterated all color lines. There is a lesson in Butler's life. He fought for his position and won it. He did not sulk for it, or cry for it, or beg for it; he commanded it. He made himself the peer of men about him, and they acknowledged it, as all men will admit it, when forced to meet the matter. Men sought him, as they always seek men who have advantages, either in brains or experience. Interested as I am in the negro question, it was to me a most important incident to meet on the seaboard of the great Chinese Empire an American negro, educated, capable, doing his work well, and a leader among men.

Several weeks after meeting Butler I was with the King of the Hawaiians on board the royal yacht of the King of Siam, on the river Menam. On the way to the capital of the country, Bangkok, the yacht stopped for a moment at the custom-house, in order to take on board some officials. I noticed a negro sitting in the stern of a boat, and inquired about him. A merchant said to me: "He is at the head of the custom-house on the river. It is a very responsible place. This negro is a man of considerable education, is honest, and capable; so he was appointed to the place, and discharges the duties well." I had no opportunity to speak to this man, but I counted it as an incident of my trip, that I had met another negro who was doing credit to himself. I have written this letter for the sole purpose of presenting these facts to the younger colored people in America, that they may know that their race can hold itself if it will.

Singapore, Fifth mo. 10th, 1881.

For "The Friend."

Catharine Phillips.

I have felt it right to offer for insertion in the columns of "The Friend," some extracts from the writings of that eminent minister of the Lord, Catharine Phillips; which are recommended to the serious notice of our young Friends (as well as older) that, like Mary of old, we may be induced to "choose the one thing needful," even that "good part which shall never be taken away!"

Ohio, 10th mo. 5th, 1881.

"As the dealings of the Almighty with me from my youth have been singular, and are worthy to be retained in remembrance with thankfulness, I have committed to writing some remarkable circumstances of my life; tending to awaken future thanksgiving and watchfulness in myself, and, considering how wonderfully the Divine arm has been manifested for my help, to encourage me to a steady trust therein, and to a perseverance in submission thereto; in order to leave to my surviving relations some memorials of the various exercises and dangers which I have passed through, and of the merciful support and preservation vouchsafed from the Lord therein."

She spent much time with her afflicted father. She states that "reading to him the experiences and sufferings of faithful martyrs, and of our worthy Friends, with the accounts of the glorious exit of such as launched out of time in full assurance of everlasting bliss, made profitable impressions upon my mind; my spirit being often tendered thereby, and my love of virtue and piety strengthened; so that I may truly say that such holy persons, though they are dead yet speak. May their language be heard by the youth of the present and succeeding generations, and incite them to eschew the paths of vanity, and to follow the footsteps of Christ's companions. So will the song of his redeemed be theirs."

She says her "natural disposition was very volatile and my apprehension quick; and as my faculties opened, I delighted much in books of a very contrary nature and tendency to those which had engaged my attention in childhood. I had a near relation who, notwithstanding his having been divinely favored in his youth, had slighted his soul's mercies, and pursued lying vanities. He kept house in the town; and through him, myself and my sister had opportunities of obtaining plays and romances, which I read with avidity. I also spent so much time at his house as to be introduced into amusements very inconsistent with the simplicity of truth, and my former religious impressions; so that my state was indeed dangerous, and but for the interposition of divine providence, I had been left to pursue courses which must have terminated deplorably.

"I also read history, was fond of poetry, and had a taste for philosophy; so that I was in the way to embellish my understanding, as is the common phrase, and become accomplished to shine in conversation, which might have tended to feed the vain proud nature, render me pleasing to those who were in it, and make me conspicuous in the world.

"But the Lord, in his wisdom, designed to bring me to public view in a line directly opposite to worldly wisdom, pleasure, or honor; and when He was pleased more fully to open to my understanding his great and glorious work of renovation of spirit, I saw that I must desist from these publications and studies, and pursue the one necessary business, viz., working out the salvation of my immortal soul; and I esteem it a great mercy that I attended to this intimation. However lawful it may be, in proper seasons, to look into the works of nature, and become acquainted with the history of former or present times, my attention was now powerfully attracted to higher subjects; and had I pursued those lower things, I might have become as a vessel marred upon the wheel."

"This is, alas! the case with many who have been divinely visited, but who, not deeply and steadily attending to instructions of pure wisdom, but seeking to be wise and learned in matters which merely relate to this present state, have not advanced in the simplicity of divine knowledge; and although it has remained obvious that the Lord's hand has mercifully been turned upon them to form them for his service, they have not grown up to that degree of usefulness in Christ's church whereto they might have attained, had they passively abode the turnings of his preparing hand.

"Were the sons and daughters of our religious Society, who are favored with good natural understandings, clothed with heavenly wisdom, they would become and appear truly great, in the dignified simplicity and humility of the service of the King of kings. Human knowledge and acquirements too often puff up the minds of youth; and indeed some of more advanced age pride themselves therein, when, as examples to the rising generation, they should be clothed with humility. It was observed of a truly honorable member of our favored Society, that "he was a divine and a naturalist, and all of the Almighty's making."* I have read very little on natural philosophy, and am not in a disposition to boast of my acquired knowledge of either human, natural, or divine things; but I may say, that I have admired how by one gleam of heavenly light the understanding is opened into natural things; so as in degree to behold, as at one view, the general economy of the Divine Former of all things, as it is displayed in the outward creation. This produces adoration to Him under the humbling sense of his power, mercy, and wisdom, as well as admiration of his works; and discovers that they are indeed marvellous, and, in their full extent, incomprehensible. Therefore, let not the faculties of his adopted children be so improperly occupied in exploring them, as to prevent an advance in their various stations in his militant church; when happily their souls are fixed in the triumphant, they will know so much as forever to inspire the angelic song of 'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; in wisdom hast thou made them all!'

ALL YOUR NEED.

BY FRANCIS RIDLEY HAVERGAL.

"My God shall supply all your need according to his riches in glory, by Jesus Christ."—Phil. iv. 19.

Who shall tell our untold need,
Deeply felt, though scarcely known?
Who the hungering soul shall feed,
Guide and guard, but God alone?
Blessed promise! while we see
Earthly friends must powerless be,
Earthly fountains quickly dry,
"God" shall all your need supply.

He hath said it! and we know
Nothing less can we receive;
Oh! that thankful love may glow,
While we restfully bow;
Ask not how—but trust Him still,
Ask not when—but wait His will,
Simply on his word rely,
God "SHALL" all your need supply.

Through the whole of life's long way,
Outward, inward need we trace,
Need arising day by day,
Patience, wisdom, strength and grace.
Needing Jesus most of all,
Still of need, on Him we call;
Then how gracious his reply:
God shall "ALL" your need supply.

Great our need, but greater far
Is our Father's loving care;
He upholds each mighty star,
He unfolds each tiny flower.
He (who numbers every hair),
Earnest of his faithful care,
Gave his Son for us to die;
God shall all "YOUR" need supply.

Yet we often vainly plead
For a seeming good denied;
What we deem a pressing need
Still remaining unsupplied.
Yet from evil all concealed,
Thus our wisest Friend doth shield:
No good thing will He deny;
God shall all your "NEED" supply.

Can we count redemption's treasure,
Scan the glory of God's love?
Such shall be the boundless measure
Of his blessings from above.
All we ask or think or more
He will give in boundless store;
He can fill and satisfy,—
God shall all your need "SUPPLY."

One the channel, deep and broad,
From the fountain of the Throne,
Christ the Saviour, Son of God,
Blessings flow through Him alone.
He, the Faithful and the True,
Brings us mercies ever new:
Till we reach His home on high
"GOD SHALL ALL YOUR NEED SUPPLY."

THE STRANGER ON THE SILL.

Between broad fields of wheat and corn,
Is the lowly home where I was born;
The peach tree leans against the wall,
And the woodbine wanders over all;
There is the shadowed doorway still,
But a stranger's foot has crossed the sill.

There is the barn—and as of yore,
I can smell the hay from the open door,
And see the busy swallows throng,
And hear the peewee's mournful song;
Out the stranger comes—oh! painful proof,
His sheaves are piled to the heated roof.

There is the orchard—the very trees
Where my childhood knew long hours of ease,
And watched the shadowy moments run,

Selected.

Till my life has imbibed more shade than sun;
The swing from the bough still sweeps the air;
But the stranger's children are swinging there.

There bubbles the shady spring below,
With its bulrush brook where the hazels grow;
'Twas there I found the calamus root,
And watched the minnows poise and shoot,
And heard the robin have his wing—
But a stranger's bucket is at the spring.

Oh, ye who daily cross the sill,
Step lightly, for I love it still;
And when you crowd the old barn eaves,
Then think what countless harvest sheaves
Have passed within that scented door
To gladden eyes that are no more.

Deal kindly with these orchard trees;
And when your children crowd their knees,
Their sweetest fruit they shall impart,
As if old memories stirred their heart;
To youthful sport still leave the swing,
And in sweet reverence hold the spring.

The barn, the trees, the brook, the birds,
The meadows with their loving birds,
The woodbine on the cottage wall—
My heart still lingers with them all.
Ye strangers on my native sill,
Step lightly, for I love it still.

Lucretia Garfield on Woman's Work.—This following is an extract from a private letter of Lucretia Garfield to her husband, written over ten years ago. Falling into the hands of Pres. B. A. Hinsdale, of Hiram College, Ohio, he used it to illustrate a lecture. After this it appeared in The Student, a paper published by the students of Hiram College:

"I am glad to tell you that out of all the toil and disappointment of the summer just ended, I have risen up to a victory; that sentence of thought since you have been away has won for my spirit a triumph. I read something like this the other day: 'There is no healthy thought without labor, and thought makes the labor happy.' Perhaps this is the way I have been able to climb up higher. I came to me one morning when I was making bread. I said to myself: Here I am, compelled by an inevitable necessity to make or bread this summer. Why not consider it pleasant occupation, and make it so by trying to see what perfect bread I can make? It seemed like an inspiration, and the whole of life grew brighter. The very sunshine seemed flowing down through my spirit into the white loaves, and now I believe my table is furnished with better bread than ever before; and this truth, old as creation, seems just now to have become fully mine—that need not be the shrinking slave of toil, but the regal master, making whatever I do yield me its best fruits. You have been king of your work so long that may-be you will laugh at me for having lived so long without my crown; but I am too glad to have found it at all to be entirely disconcerted even by your merriment. Now, I wonder if right here does not lie the 'terrible wrong,' or at least some of it, of which the woman suffragists complain. The wrongly educated woman thinks her duties a disgrace, and frets under them, or shrinks them if she can. She sees man triumphant, pursuing his vocations, and thinks it is the kind of work he does which makes him grand and regnant; whereas it is not the kind of work at all, but the way in which and the spirit with which he does it.

Weep not that the world changes—did it keep
A stable, changeless state, 'twere cause indeed to weep.
—Bryan.

* William Penn's account of George Fox.

For "The Friend."

Circular of the Bible Association of Friends in America.

In again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previous to the general meeting of the Association on the 3rd of Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon Friends, who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answers to all the Queries, and of forwarding their report seasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected, that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in deciding what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each, by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time, are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every use, how boxes should be marked and forwarded; and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

Address John S. Stokes, No. 116 N. Fourth street, Philadelphia.

CHARLES RHODES,
JAMES WHITALL,

Committee of Correspondence.

Philada., 10th month, 1881.

QUERIES.

1. What number of families or individuals have gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures the Auxiliary during the past year?
2. What number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold by the Auxiliary within the past year?
3. How many members, male and female, are there belonging to the Auxiliary?
4. What number of families of Friends reside within limits?
5. Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scriptures of good clear type, and on fair paper; if so, how many?
6. How many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy of the Holy Scriptures?
7. How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?
8. Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to supply use within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?
9. What number of Bibles and Testaments would be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously, to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?
10. What number would be required in order to furnish each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase?
11. How many Bibles and Testaments are now on hand?

Who Cares for Me.—A poor, lone woman at one evening, thinking how sad was her condition. She was old and almost helpless, with little of this world's goods which she could call her own. "Who cares for me?" thought she. Suddenly this verse came to her remembrance: "For we have not an high Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

It was like a dawning of golden sunshine. Her doubts and fears were all gone. What need of earthly friends to cheer and soothe her declining years? Jesus knew her every care and sorrow, and He, "the Lord of glory," as touched with the feeling of her infirmities. How precious is the thought that we in all have such a friend in every season of trial and distress! "I will not leave you comfortless," are the Saviour's gracious words. My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

For "The Friend."

Western Friends in Court.

(Continued from page 78.)

Albert Maxwell, clerk of the Orthodox Yearly Meeting, was next examined. His testimony confirmed that of the two preceding witnesses in regard to the departures of the Progressive Friends. Before he had concluded, a ruling of the judge excluded much of the evidence that was about being introduced. As the discipline of 1865 contained a declaration of faith that had been agreed to by both of the parties to the suit, no testimony on doctrine would be admitted only so far as might be a denial of this declaration, and such denial must be by authority or sanction of Western Yearly Meeting or White Lick Quarterly Meeting.

The next morning after this decision, some questions on the subject of unsound doctrines were again asked, when objection was made by counsel for the plaintiff, on the ground that up to 1877 both parties having had the same organization, to which they had submitted matters in dispute, its action was binding upon both. A protracted discussion ensued. The defence insisted on the rightfulness of showing that the party represented by the plaintiff had departed from and rejected the faith and doctrines of the Society of Friends, and is, therefore, not entitled to the claim of being Friends, and should be excluded from assuming control of the funds under controversy; and that the party of the defence does maintain and hold to the doctrine of Friends, and is therefore the true Society to hold said funds. On the other hand, the plaintiffs insisted that, while they were ready to meet the question of doctrine, and show the entire soundness of faith of the meetings represented by their clients, these are not legitimate questions for enquiry in the court, but that it must first be shown that the defendants represent an organization complete and according to the order of the Society of Friends. More especially so when it is shown by the testimony that the organization represented by them is complete and unbroken, and has so continued to the present time. The Court sustained the latter position.

This ruling of the judge seemed clearly to foreshadow his final decision of the question at issue. It was thought best by the defence to arrange the concluding evidence so as to bring the question in proper shape for the action of the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana. With this understanding considerable evidence was allowed to go forward, particularly of a doctrinal character, mostly, however, coupled with the exceptions of the plaintiff.

The witness then resumed and stated that separation first began in a Monthly Meeting, afterward in Plainfield Quarterly Meeting. He then proved the organization of the Orthodox Yearly Meeting. In 1877 a conference of about 150 Friends was held at Sugar Grove, before the Yearly Meeting, to protest against innovations in Meetings. It was harmonious in its action, and adopted an address to Friends; 10,000 copies were printed and distributed. The Orthodox Yearly Meeting, in 1877, sent out a circular epistle for information, to the meetings that Western Yearly Meeting had previously corresponded with.

To none of these was any reply received in 1878. (A previous witness had said that none were expected.) Since then the meeting had received epistles from the Yearly Meetings of New England, (Smaller Body); Iowa, (Orthodox), and Kansas, (Orthodox). One under cover was also received this year from Canada, (Orthodox), which would be laid before the Yearly Meeting, when next held.

A number of documents were offered as evidence and exceptions taken. Among these were Barclay's Apology, Barclay on Church Government, Clarkson's Portraiture of Quakerism, The Declaration of American Friends in 1830, various doctrinal testimonies issued by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting between 1843 and 1878 inclusive, one of like character by Ohio, and several by Western Yearly Meeting, (Orthodox). The usual objection offered by the plaintiffs throughout the trial to the introduction of doctrines as evidence, was that they were "irrelevant."

The clerk of the Orthodox White Lick Quarterly Meeting, John W. Furnas, testified that said Meeting was composed of White Lick and Beech Grove Monthly Meetings—the latter formerly belonging to Fairfield Quarter, and transferred to White Lick since 1877. He gave an account of some occurrences that took place during the separation in the Yearly Meeting. Being in a position to see, he observed the method taken by the representatives to decide the question referred to them as to which was the legitimate Quarterly Meeting of Plainfield. After convening in the Meeting-house yard, a Friend called upon those favorable to the Progressives, to rise to their feet. About two-thirds of their number did so, and the majority decision was reported to the Yearly Meeting as the voice of the representatives.

William Harvey, a member of the same Quarterly Meeting gave evidence of departures in that Meeting, against which he had unavailingly borne his testimony.

Cornelius Douglass, of Wilmington, Clinton County, Ohio, was placed upon the stand, and a few questions propounded to him. But after it was stated what was intended to be shown by his evidence, he was not allowed to proceed. He had attended Indiana Yearly Meeting several years ago, being a member of that Meeting at the time, when it was decided to address an epistle to the Methodists. The testimony was intended to show the importance of epistolary correspondence as an "accompaniment of the organization."

During a temporary absence of the judge, the deposition of Joel Bean was taken. He was a member of the Progressive Yearly Meeting of Iowa, and had acted as clerk of Iowa Yearly Meeting for ten years. He admitted the departures in doctrines and practices within the limits of that meeting. He also stated that his Yearly Meeting had not taken any steps to endeavor to correct this state of things.

The minutes of Canada, Iowa, Kansas (all Orthodox), and New England (Smaller Body) Yearly Meetings were offered in evidence to establish a correspondence with Western Yearly Meeting (Orthodox). Also the minutes of the latter meeting for a like purpose. The testimony of Cyrus W. Harvey, clerk of the Kansas, and Adam Spencer, clerk of the Canada Yearly Meetings—both Orthodox—were taken in the same connection. The evidence of Adam Spencer also showed that his Yearly Meeting, since the separation, had been attended by rather more than one-half the number previously present.

Gilbert Jones, of Belleville, Ontario, was placed on the stand, but after some preliminary questions had been asked and answered, he was withdrawn. For this action no reason was assigned by counsel.

Probably the most comprehensive and satisfactory statement in regard to the organization of the Society, presented on behalf of the defence, was contained in a deposition of Jonathan Chase, clerk of New England Yearly Meeting (Smaller Body). Deponent had always been a member with Friends; his ancestors had also been members for two hundred years.

The subordination of inferior to superior meetings, was clearly set forth in this document; also the independence of individual Yearly Meetings. Correspondence between these bodies, had in several instances, been interrupted and afterward resumed. An epistle had in some instances been received from an individual. But correspondence had never been regarded as essentially an accompaniment of the Society organization.

Some doctrinal matters were also presented with the above statement, but they were objected to and not admitted as evidence.

Depositions of Edwin Blackburn and James Carey, of Baltimore, were offered, by which it appeared that in 1828, the Yearly Meeting held in that city, had 57 representatives from its Quarterly Meetings. Only two of these with a small portion of others who were present—representing less than one-fifth of all the members—withdraw from the Hicksite Majority and held a separate Meeting. The body thus withdrawn was acknowledged as Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, by all the other Orthodox Yearly Meetings, on the ground of its soundness in the faith of Friends. The foregoing testimonies were objected to by counsel for the plaintiff, as were also the three depositions which follow.

One of these was from a woman, who is a member of the Progressive Western Yearly Meeting. In it she admits that she contracted a second marriage, while her first husband, from whom she had been divorced, was still living. She had been continued as clerk of her Preparative Meeting, and sent as a representative to the Yearly Meeting.

Another witness, a Friend, deposed that he had paid a minister of Indiana Yearly Meeting $500 for preaching one year.

The third deposition was that an arrangement had been made with a minister, a Progressive Friend, to prepare and deliver a thanksgiving sermon. And that this agreement was carried into effect.

(To be concluded.)

Much more is to be done by the silent, holy influence which imperceptibly surrounds that individual who lives much with God, and which, like unction, falls silently, but surely, on those around, than by all the mere talking in the world. But to taste of this blessedness, to realize this grace, we must daily have far more communion with the Lord of glory, than with the best beloved of earthly friends. We can only give as we receive. As perfume however precious, soon exhales, so the most gifted among us must continually replenish his vessel with light, and life, and love from above, or his words will be without flavor and without vitality.—M. A. S.

The Old-Fashioned Cupboard.—"Cupboard" at the present day signifies, by corruption, a close case; but originally cupboards had no doors, and were described in early times as "things made lyke stayres." Our ancestors, like the Romans, plumed themselves on an ostentatious display of plate, and considered every cupboard of plate incomplete unless it consisted of a cup of gold covered, six great standing pots of silver, twenty-four silver bowls with covers, a basin, ewer and chasoir of silver. Stowe mentions one exhibited at the marriage feast of Prince Arthur, in the palace of the Bishop of London, "of five stages in height, triangled," the which was set with plate valued at £1,200, and in the other chamber, where the princes dined, was a cupboard of gold plate, garnished with stones and pearls, valued at above £20,000. When Cardinal Wolsey entertained the French Embassadors at Hampton Court in 1528, two banquetting rooms were thrown open, in each of which a cupboard extended the whole length of the apartment, piled to the top with a mass of plate. Hall, in his "Chronicles," (Hen. III. an. 25,) relates how "the Erle of Arundel was chief butler, on who xii. citizens of London did give their attendance at the Cupboard—the Erle of Darby, cup-bearer." The historian Speed (b. ix, 13, Rich. II.) points out that it is the duty of the Major to attend in his own person as chief cup-waiter, (charged with the cupboard royal,) as well in the hall at dinner, to serve the King in a cup of gold with spices, and for his fees to have the said cup, and a water-spout pot of gold thereunto belonging, when he took his leave at night.—Notes and Queries.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

East Indian Converts.—Richard Temple has published a book entitled "India in 1881." Of its author, the Lucknow Witness says: "It is probable no man living has a more complete knowledge of India." Concerning the converts from Hinduism, this book says: "Though they may not display all the firmer virtues of Christianity, they must have some of such virtues; for they must have cast out with an effort many superstitions deeply embedded in their mental constitutions; they must have dedicated their thoughts to truth alone; they must have broken some of the ties which are dearest to humanity; they must have borne the reproaches of those from whom reproach is hardest to bear. Despite many temptations, the instances of apostasy have been very rare."

A Successful History.—The Free-will Baptist Mission dispensary at Midnapur, India, has completed its forty-first year, and treats an average of about 3000 patients a year. It has several branches.

Abjuration of Romanism.—Signor Campello, Canon of St. Peter's at Rome, and a prominent and influential Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, on 14th of 9th mo. abjured Catholicism in the chapel of the Methodists at Rome. In notifying Cardinal Borromeo, Prefect of the Congregation, of his decision, he says his action is due to the continued hostility of the Pope to Italy.

In commenting on this occurrence, the Christian Advocate says: "The continued hostility of the Roman Catholic chiefs to the civil authorities at Rome, and to freedom of conscience, as well as their opposition to every modern measure for the general education and progress of the masses, is now beginning, to force some of her ablest and best scholars to despair of any reform in the Papal system."

Expensive Meeting-houses.—The Baptist Weekly says the costliness and grandeur of houses for worship have become so great as to draw after them the practical exclusion to a large extent of the poor. Many of the families of mechanics and others in moderate circumstances go nowhere to a place of worship and allege the cost of it as a reason.

"Of making many books there is no end."—Professor Hesselbach, of the University of Vienna, lectured twenty-two years upon the first chapter of Isaiah, and had not finished when death surprised him and carried him off. Chancellor Ulrich Penzger, of Tubingen gave three hundred and twelve university lectures, covering a period of four years, upon the prophet Daniel, then lectured twenty-five years on Isaiah, giving one thousand five hundred and nine lectures, and then taking up Jeremiah, finished one half of him in seven years and four hundred and fifty-nine lectures. At that juncture, in his eightieth year, died, ended his achievements.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Relation of Foul Air to Consumption.—"Experiment has shown that if an animal be kept confined in a narrow, closed apartment, so that the air supplied is always more or less vitiated by the carbonic acid which it expires, how ever well fed that animal may be, tubercle (consumption) will be developed." If this be the case, a large percentage of cases of consumption should be met with among the inmates of badly ventilated schools. But, fortunately, the disease is comparatively infrequent under the age of fifteen, and added to this is the protective influence of the active exercise in the open air usually indulged in by school-children. It is upon the teacher that its blighting effects are most apparent as they are predisposed by age, they neglect exercise in the open air, and their mental labor is severe, and worry of mind exhausting. O. eleven teachers who died during the last eight years within the limits of one county in Pennsylvania, two died of acute disease, one of an overdose of an habitual narcotic, and of nine attacked by consumption, eight died—six ladies and one gentleman; the other, a gentleman, will recover, at least for a time.—From "Schoolroom Ventilation," by Dr. P. J. Higgins in Popular Science Monthly for Eighth month.

A Clever Crow.—I have had my Australian piping crow for about two years. At first he was quite uneducated, and rather a disreputable looking party, but, with good food and exercise, his musical talent soon developed itself. He fetches and carries like a dog, and seems never tired of running after a ball or crumpled paper, and bringing it back and putting it into one's hand, and waiting for another throw. He will tumble about on the floor, and play more like a monkey than a bird. He will get into a slipper with a string tied to it, and allow himself to be coaxed round and round the room, holding on all the time to the string. Some time ago we were troubled with mice, but "Peter" soon brought them to a sense of their situation. He ferreted them out, chased them, killed them, and, having duly washed them in his water in, hung them up to dry, picked them, and wallowed them. It requires great perseverance in training these birds. They will eat almost any thing. Some days ago our bird wallowed a piece of glass, and for two days and nights was very ill, moaning pitifully; at last brought it up in the usual way, and in full song.—The London Field.

Don't Waste Vital Energy.—The most vigorous persons do not have too much vitality; people generally inherit a lack; or at least that much vital energy has been permanently lost in their childhood or youth through the ignorance or carelessness of their parents. Often it is impaired by wrong indulgences in early manhood. The endeavor with all persons should be to husband what left, be it much or little. Therefore:

1. Don't do anything in a hurry.
 2. Don't work too many hours a day, whether it be farm-work, shop-work, study-work or house-work.
 3. Don't abridge sleep. Get the full eight hours of it, and that, too, in a ventilated and un-purified room.
 4. Don't eat what is indigestible, nor too much of anything, and let good cheer rule the hour.
 5. Don't fret at yourself or anybody else; or indulge in the blues, nor burst into fits of passion.
 6. Don't be too much elated with good luck, nor disheartened by bad.
- Positively—be self-controlled, calm and brave. Let your brain have all the rest it needs. Treat your stomach right. Keep a good conscience, and have a cheerful trust in God for all things.—Selected.

Eye-Stones.—Eye-stones are composed of calcareous material, and when placed in a nooth plate containing a weak solution of orange juice or vinegar are slowly moved about by the evolution of carbonic acid gas. It is from this fact that ignorant people imagine that the eye-stone has life, and a particular eagerness for vinegar, in which above all other acids it delights to swim. Most of the eye-stones sold to the wholesale drug dealers of New York City are supplied to them by sailors employed on vessels engaged in the fruit trade between Venezuela and other South American Republics. They are regarded with mystery and awe by the native inhabitants, by whom they are collected in large quantities. A very prevalent error exists as to the origin of eye-stones. Many persons imagine, and many errors on the subject state, that the eye-stone is the product of the fresh-water lobster or crayfish, and that the stones are found in the stomach of the above-named animal, and constitute a storage of lime during the moulting season. This is not so. The stones found in the crayfish are known as crab-stones. In Poland, Russia, and Astrachan, the crayfish are rotted in deep pits dug in the earth, after which the refuse is washed to obtain the crab-stones, which are used in many parts of Europe to correct stomachic difficulties.

Nearly all univalve shells have an operculum, or door, that fits closely to the inside of the mouth or opening of the shell. This door is generally situated on the upper side of the back part of the foot on which the animal moves. When the univalve draws in his body the operculum is the last part that is taken to the cavity, or mouth of the shell, where it fits so accurately, and is of such a bony or calcareous nature, that it affords perfect protection to the animal against enemies from without. All eye-stones are operculums of small close-fitting doors that are used by the eye-stone bearing univalves to protect them from intruders. The under side of the eye-stone is composed of numerous slightly concentric grooves. When moving over the eyeball the grooves collect and retain all foreign substances. The movement of the eye-stone is caused by the pressure of the eyeball against the stone.—Scientific American.

The Screw Worm.—I herewith send you specimens of half-grown screw worms, taken from the roof of a hog's ear. The hog had been bitten by a dog on the ear a few days before, and the worms had nearly destroyed the ear of the hog when its condition was discovered. Carbolic oil was applied to the sore, which caused the worms to move to the surface so they could be taken out with forceps. While the worms are in the burrow, they constantly eject or discharge bloody water which runs from the sore, and this discharge is often the first intimation or sign of their presence. While they are sucking and not disturbed, or sickened, or disabled by any poison or insecticide, it is very difficult to dislodge them, as they hold on to the flesh with great tenacity, and as there are usually great numbers of them embedded in a hole.

These worms have been more numerous, more troublesome, and more destructive this year than usual; all the newspapers of Texas have reported their ravages in stock. In Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana, they are more numerous and destructive in years of overflow, and it is generally understood here that they are more numerous in wet years; and this has been an unusually rainy summer and fall.

They infested the slaughter pens and meat-stalls of the markets, and deposited their larvae on the meat, and the larvae would instantly pierce the meat, and conceal themselves, eat, grow, and flourish. People refused to buy market-meat during the time of their prevalence. I tried to get some butchers to bring me some screw worm flies, but they would not do it, as they thought, no doubt, such a thing would injure their credit as butchers, and diminish the sale of their meat. I regret that I failed to get a fly for you.

A. R. KILPATRICK, Texas.

—Scientific American.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 22, 1881.

The removal from our midst of many of those who have long been regarded as burthen-bearers in the Church, to whom we looked up as men and women who would watch with concern over all that affected the interests of our Society, brings an added weight of responsibility on those who remain.

There are many of our younger members who have had the advantage of the influence and example of these departed worthies. They have mingled with them in the family circle, witnessed their solid deportment in our meetings for Divine worship, observed their concern for the maintenance of our doctrines, testimonies and discipline, and partaken of their counsels, admonitions or reprofs. They regard these Friends, whose work is now ended, and others of the same class who are still members of the militant Church, with great respect. They love the Society of which they are members, listen with satisfaction to the preaching of its doctrines, rejoice at the spread of its principles, and are grieved when any fall away therefrom.

Yet there are some of these younger friends and some also who are further advanced in years, who do not seem to realize that the time has fully come, when they must take up the responsibilities which have been borne by those on whom they were accustomed to lean. They must bow their necks to the yoke of Christ, and bear burthens for themselves and for others. A still younger generation is coming on, who look to them for guidance and help. They are now as lights in the world, as a city set on an hill, which cannot be hid. Whether they choose it or not, they will influence others. This responsibility cannot be evaded. Their conduct and example, the whole tenor of their lives, will say to others,—"Come, let us walk in the Light of the Lord," in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions—or it will tend to settle them at ease in pursuits and enjoyments which do not look beyond this state of existence.

The Church has a right to look to these who have been trained under its care, for the laborers who are to work in the Lord's vineyard; for the shepherds who shall "of a ready mind" take the oversight of the flock; for the watchmen who shall sound the alarm when danger approaches; for the warriors who shall repel the assaults of the enemy and turn the battle to the gates, and for those who shall go forth as ambassadors of the Most High to proclaim the glad tidings of the Gospel of peace and salvation.

These should feel that the serious work of life has now come to them; and that they must no longer glide along in a smooth and easy path, throwing upon others the cares, anxieties and labors which inseparably attend every one who becomes an useful instrument in the Lord's hand; and which are necessary to the proper development of their own characters.

The Lord will care for his Church, and for the preservation and spread among men of the pure principles of the Gospel; but if those, who in one sense may be termed the children of the Kingdom, prove idle and disobedient, others will take the crowns which might have been theirs. May this be averted by faithful dedication; and through Divine mercy and the renewed extensions of Heavenly visitations,—may the inspiring language of the prophet Isaiah be applicable to those whom we are addressing—"Ye shall be named the priests of the Lord; men shall call you the ministers of our God;" "Everlasting joy shall be unto them!"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On Fifth-day the 13th inst., David Davis, Senator from Illinois, was elected President pro tempore, in place of Thomas F. Bayard previously chosen to that office. Senator Davis is independent in his political views, and although elected by a Republican vote, he declares that he recognizes it as an acknowledgment of the independent position he has long occupied in the politics of the country. A number of nominations by the President have been confirmed by the Senate. Among others that of Hannibal Hamlin to be U. S. Minister to Spain.

Guitaen was arraigned in the Criminal Court at Washington on the 14th, and his trial was set down for 11th month 7th. The question of jurisdiction is to be argued and determined before 10th inst. 30th inst. a sum of $24,000 have been raised in this city for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in Michigan.

The losses by the fire in Morrell's building and contents in New York, is less than was at first supposed. A little over a million dollars it is believed will cover them.

The woollen and cotton mill of Charles H. Landerberger, on Randolph street, above Columbia avenue, in this city, was entirely destroyed by fire on Fourth-day night 12th inst. The flames spread so rapidly that many of the hands, who were working "over-time," and some of whom were girls, became panic-stricken, and jumped from the windows in the third, fourth and fifth floors to the ground. Eight of them were killed, and 12 are fatally injured.

Heavy rains in the Northwest have caused floods in the Wisconsin and Black rivers. The Wisconsin river is swelling over the railroad track at Waupun to a depth of nearly five feet. At Stevens Point the dykes have been ordered to be opened to avert serious disaster. The Black river rose eight feet in twenty-four hours, and flooded the surrounding country. A heavy rain prevailed throughout Wisconsin on the 10th inst. Rivers throughout the State are in flood, particularly the Raritan and Southwestern, and the river divisions of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroads. One washout, at Boscelo, is five miles in length. The Mississippi and Black rivers are still rising.

Complaints having been made by residents on the frontier between Quebec and Quebec, of the inexactness of the boundary line, the Dominion authorities have commissioned a surveyor to make an examination of the line. Should the complaint be sustained, the appointment of a joint boundary commission will be asked.

The disease known as "pink-eye" is spreading among the horses in Denver.

Our exports of domestic breadstuffs during the nine months ending 9th mo. 30th, 1881, amounted in value to $177,452,249; against $209,204,277 during the corresponding period of 1880.

Since the first of the year there have been 1359 cases of small pox in Chicago, of which about 40 per cent. have proved fatal. The greater number of cases have occurred in one ward—the Fourteenth—where attempts at vaccination have been resisted by "open violence at times." It is estimated that there are 40,000 persons in that ward who are vaccinated, and it is stated that about 109 deaths from small pox in Chicago during 9th month, 81 occurred in the Fourteenth Ward.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health states that there were 339 deaths in this city last week, 45 more than during the corresponding week of last year, and 8 less than during the week ending 10th month 8th, 1881. Of this number 177 were males, 169 females—76 boys and 76 girls; 56 died of consumption, 21 of marasmus, and 19 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s, 100½; 4½'s, 113½; 4's, 116½; currency 6½, 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in present demands for middlings are reported at 11½ a 12 cts. per lb. for nuplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude 8 cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There was very little movement, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota flour, at $1.47 a barrel, and $1.48 a barrel for $8.10 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $7.25 a $7.50; western do. at $7.25 a $8.25, and patents at $8.25 a $9.25. Bay flour is in light demand at $6.12½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is higher and in better demand. Sales of 100 bushels red and white at $1.40 a bushel on the open board $1.47 was bid. Rye is steady at $1.20 for Pennsylvania. Corn is higher and in better demand. Sales of 7000 bushels including yellow, at 72½ a 73 cts.; mixed at 72 cts.; steamer at 71 cts.; No. 3 at 70 cts., and rejected at 70 cts. At the open board 69 was bid. Oats are quiet, but higher. Sales of 8500 bushels, including white at 49½ a 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 47½ a 48 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 10th mo. 15th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 326; loads of straw, 44. Average price—during the week—Prime timothy, $1.35 to $1.45 per 100 lbs.; medium do. at $1.25 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; Straw, $1.05 to $1.15 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand this week, but prices were easier: 4250 head arrived and sold at the common yards at 3 a 6½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Sheep were in steady demand; 14,500 head arrived and sold at the common yards at 4 a 4½ cts., and lambs at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound as to condition.

Hogs were unchanged: 4400 head sold at the different yards at 8 a 10½ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—Dublin, 10th mo. 13.—Charles S. Parnell was arrested this morning by Detective Superintendent Mullins, at Morrison's hotel, on two warrants signed by Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, charging him with inciting people to violence and with having taken part in a riot with intimidating threats, and taking the benefit of the Land act. Parnell was taken to Kilmainham jail in a cab. John Dillon and J. O'Brien, members of Parliamento, have since been arrested; also Sexton and other prominent members of the Land League. Much excitement has been caused by the arrests. Rioting in Dublin and Limerick has been quelled by the military. The Times in a leading article says: "We are convinced that if the Irish masses see that the Government is resolved to carry out the law they will not engage in a disastrous contest out of any romantic loyalty to their imprisoned leaders." Great Britain was visited last week by a severe gale which proves to have been the most disastrous known for many years. The London parks are strewn with fallen timber. Many boats are aground in the River Thames, and the steamboat traffic is suspended. Very few places in England have escaped damage by the storm. Four hundred small trees were blown down in Southwark. By the falling of a roof at Stockton-on-Tees, five persons were killed. One hundred and thirty British and foreign vessels were wrecked. The approximate value of the property lost is $4,000,000, of which the sum of $300,000 represents the British loss.

The British loss is mainly British due to the loss of the coast of the United Kingdom, against only twenty wrecks in the early part of the week in all parts of the world; 133 persons were reported lost or missing. Accounts received subsequent to the compilation of these statistics state that 59 fishermen belonging to Bourne-mouth were reported to be missing, and to have been drowned, and that 119 others, belonging to both places, are missing. The storm has caused great damage to property in Ireland. Several houses were wrecked, and many were unroofed.

The Paris Bourse publishes a letter from General Gaudissart, in which he says he earnestly trusts the Channel tunnel project may never be carried out, as he feels that its construction would be a lasting source of danger to England.

The Morning Post says: "We have reason to believe that despatches have been exchanged during the past week between the British and German Governments on the advisability of a joint naval service all along the African coast for the protection of the interests of their respective subjects, menaced by the rising of the Arabs. The initiative of official negotiations has been left to Austria, but the death of Baron Haymerle may cause some unpropitious change in German policy has yet been made. Germany appears only anxious to insure the co-operation of the Powers mentioned."

Further excavations near the Pantheon, in Rome, for the purpose of isolating the structure from the buildings which surround it, have brought to light the bases of Agrippa's floor, and the foundations of the theatre below the street level, and is strewn with fragments of Cipollino marble. An immense fragment of cornice and the base of a column, fluted on one side, and fully one metre in diameter, are also visible.

The once famous and extensive cedar forest of Lebanon, according to a writer in the Vienna Allgemeine Correspondenz, is now reduced to a few fragments of mere timber, numbering about 400 trees. To save it from complete destruction and preserve it at least in its present extent, Eastern Pacha, the Governor-General of the Lebanon, has issued a special order, containing a series of stringent regulations calculated to check, it is said, not only a stop to the traffic, but the influx and loss of most travellers. It is expressly forbidden to put up tents or other kinds of shelter within the district of the trees, or to light fires or cook any provisions in their vicinity. No one is allowed to break off a bough or even a twig from the trees. It is forbidden to bring any beasts, birds, or animals, be they domestic or wild, or any other kind of animal, within the district. Should oxen, sheep or goat, or other pasturage cattle be found within the prescribed limits, they will be irredeemably confiscated.

It is stated in Montreal that the money required for the building of a railroad from the St. Lawrence river has been subscribed in Paris.

A company has been formed in England, with $500,000 capital, to establish fisheries on the west coast of British Columbia.

The relations between Mexico and Guatemala are reported to be improving, and it is hoped that the Government of Guatemala Government has asked mediation of our Government, which has consented, but Mexico refuses arbitration. The dispute, now becoming threatening, has lasted fifty years.

WEST TOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The WINTER term commences on Second-day, 10th inst. 31st, 1881. Pupils who are sending regular orders, and who have been from Philadelphia, can obtain tickets at the depot of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad, corner of Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, by giving their names to the Ticket-agent there, who is furnished with a list of the pupils for this purpose. In such case the passage, including the trunk charge, will be paid for by the Ticket-agent. Pupils who have been from the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad depot at the close of the term. Tickets can also be procured of the Treasurer, 304 Arch street. Conveyances will be at the STREET ROAD STATION on Second and Third days, 10th mo. 31st, and 11th mo. 1st, to meet the train that leave Philadelphia at 7.30, 9.30 and 11.15 A. M. and 2.30 and 5 P. M.

THE UNION TRANSFER COMPANY will send off BAGGAGE to any place in the built-up part of Philadelphia, if notice is left either at No. 838 Chestnut St., or the South East corner of Broad and Chestnut Sts., or a Ticket Agent, or by the Railroad Station, and will deliver it at the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad depot at charge of 25 cents per trunk, to be paid either when the order is given or when the trunk is called for. For the same charge they will collect baggage from any of the other railroad depots, if the railroad checks are left at the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad depot. The Company above designated, or are delivered to an agent of that Company, who will usually either pass through the train as it approaches the city, or will be found at the depot on the arrival of the train; but passengers by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad should reach the depot at the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad and Chestnut. In all cases it must be stated that the baggage is to go to Westtown Boarding School by way of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad.

Baggage thus put under the care of the Union Transfer Company, will not require any attention from the owner either at the 31st and Chestnut St. depot or the Street Road Station, but will be forwarded direct to the School; but the card receipts given by the Transfer Company should be left with the Baggage-master at 31st and Chestnut St. depot.

DURING THE SESSION, passengers for the School will be met at the Street Road Station, on the arrival of the first train from the City, every day except First-days and small packages for the pupils, if left at Friend Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, will be forwarded every Sixth-day at 12 o'clock, except on the last two Sixth days in the Twelfth month, and the expense charged for their bills.

Tenth month 17th, 1881.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting will be held in the Committee room of Arch Street Meeting-house, on Fourth-day, Eleventh month 24, at 8 o'clock P. M.

Friends generally are invited to attend. 10th mo. 1881. E. SMITH, Secretary.

AUXILIARY BIBLE ASS'N OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA QUARTERLY MEETING.

The Fifty-first Annual Meeting of the Association will be held at No. 109 North Tenth St. (second story) on Fourth-day, 26th inst., at 7½ o'clock P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.

B. W. BEESLEY, Secretary.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent, JOHN C. ALLI, M.D. The Admission of Friends to the Asylum is made to the Superintendent, or any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at his residence near Pineville, Bucks Co., Pa. Ninth month 12th, 1881, BENJAMIN WIGGINS, in the 73rd year of his age, an esteemed member and overseer of Buck's Church, and a member of Friends' Meeting, residing in his department, and remarkably clear of constitution, a kind and tender husband and father helping those needing help in a very quiet and unpretending manner—better known by deeds than words to those who knew him best valued him most. His relatives and friends, and a host of others, who have been permitted to enter into that rest and peace prepared for the righteous of all generations.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TENTH MONTH 29, 1881.

NO. 12.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

See, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

First-Day Occupation.

In a late communication by the writer, on "Library and other Literature," some authorities were cited as to the harmful results furnishing novels and novelettes (with more or less of) a moral, to the children of the so-called "Sunday," or "Sabbath-schools." It is pointed out how, to the superior entertainment which this readily-supplied fiction afforded, might be traced the fact that a taste for exciting and, eventually, depraving reading, was fostered within the Church itself; whilst the complaint was frequently heard at the attractions of the schools often operated, as a consequence, to cause a neglect of the regular services of the church" by both teachers and scholars. The acquirement of lead knowledge of scriptural matters, without a corresponding impress being made upon the spiritual apprehension, is a confessed weakness deplored by many excellent people to have the success of these schools very much at heart.

In what has been thus said, I have made reference to the system as it has been taken by the members of Friends' meetings generally, outside of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Teaching is a service placed by the Society in near connection (if not co-ordination) with ministering and exhortation, and is safe to conclude that if the attempt to impart a knowledge of religious matters be undertaken by those who have no call and no qualification for this distinctive duty, whose lives are not set honestly and earnestly toward a heavenly kingdom, their endeavors must yield little fruit. Further, the everyday speech and behavior of one who, whilst evincing to himself bearing the yoke of Christ, says to direct others in the highway of holiness, must not have an obvious tendency to perse and not to gather.

Without calling in question the sincerity of the motives which have animated those who have entered into this engagement; it will be admitted that some of these have adopted or permitted methods, others joining in them, which have reacted injuriously on the simplicity of our worship of God, and our profession of his leadership in the Church.

Although this be conceded, it will not do for us simply to condemn these deviations from what we believe to be the true gospel order: it may, on the contrary, be more profitable for us to ask ourselves whether, through the lack of attention to parental duty in many quarters, we have not rather invited these departures. Have parents, with children growing up around them, been so neglectful of the family relation, as to allow their offspring year by year to spend the First-day of the week nearly as they pleased, taking no pains to gather them together for the purposes of suitable reading, instruction, or counsel? Having been present at the morning meeting, have they accepted the day so entirely as a day of rest, that they have taken something more than a comfortable mid-day meal, and feeling the need of repose, and an indisposition to exert themselves, allowed the younger members of their families to while away the time as they inclined? Or, have they talked business, politics, and the crops with callers, whilst their sons have strolled away or driven off for pleasure or to pay visits? Surely, then, indifference and idleness, where such have prevailed, may not consistently condemn a zeal which may not have been always according to knowledge.

But, no system of moral and religious teaching, however excellent, can, it seems to me, compensate for a too general surrender of that which beneficially adheres to the Divinely-ordained institution of the family. It appears to have been too much lost sight of, that in providing First-day schools for the benefit of the children, something like a correspondent spiritual loss may be experienced by the parents; for I think we look at the matter but partially not to perceive that the real or apparent gain in the one direction may react disastrously in the other. Parental responsibility, with its spiritually-healthful exertion and concern, is transferred for the time being to the shoulders of teachers, who, it may often happen, are not much older nor religiously wiser than their scholars.

May not an indiscriminating adherence to the system, taken in connection with the growth of novel and story-paper reading on the part of the children, have given strength to the tendency alluded to as follows in a late number of the Christian at Work? "There has grown up in this country," it remarks, "within a half century, a spirit of levity, a leniency towards some forms of vice, and a general lessening of restraint on the young, which tend to encourage the sowing of wild oats, regardless of the yield. The old strictness has gone out of our home life."

Pertinent to this view of the subject are some remarks on family government in the American Messenger, the carefully-edited and widely-circulated monthly issue of the American Tract Society. The editor says: "Many striking and sad indications, which are open to the observation of any thoughtful person, show that there is among us a widespread lack of wise family government. Here it is some runaway matrimonial adventure; here some young girl going to her ruin, and in shame committing suicide, or perhaps foully murdered by her guilty betrayer; here some young person rashly putting an end to life by poison or the too-ready pistol. Even when matters do not go to the extent of crimes, in how many homes will there be found turmoil where there ought to be peace, bickerings where there ought to be harmony, unhappiness where there ought to be the highest joy this side of heaven.

The reason is not far to seek. These evils, greater or smaller, come from the lawlessness of ungoverned natures, and this from the lack of parental government. We, of course, do not mean to say, that wise government in the family will prevent all crimes, or do away with all evils. It is the work of the Almighty to change the heart, and it is only a change of heart that will make it sure that there will be no outbreak of evil. But a wise family government will, almost without exception, lead to individual self-control; and where that exists the outbreaks to which we have referred will not be found."

This wise family government, of which systematic reading and instruction to and with the youth formed an integral part, was a marked accompaniment of early (and much of later) Quakerism. Clarkson, in his "Portraiture" (page 67) says: "It is certainly an undeniable fact, that the youth of the Society, generally speaking, get earlier into a knowledge of just sentiments, or into a knowledge of human nature, or into a knowledge of the true wisdom of life, than those of the world at large. I have often been surprised to hear young Quakers talk of the folly and vanity of pursuits, in which persons older than themselves were then embarking for the purpose of pleasure, and which the same persons have afterward found to have been the pursuit only of uneasiness and pain."

It is claimed by some that through the medium of First-day schools, many members have been added to our Society. Without advancing the opinion as to how far the Society may have been strengthened by these various reported additions, it seems to me that, were our energies diligently exercised according to the example of the helpers of Nehemiah, each in repairing and re-building the broken-down wall of Zion over against his own house, an erection much more enduring would result. Do any call this selfish? Do we esteem it selfish to first work out our own salvation with fear and trembling? Will God's cause in the earth suffer at the hands of a people who are earnestly engaged, parents and children together, in striving to do that which is acceptable in his sight? Instructed and strengthened thus together, will the love of God shed abroad in their hearts, extend, in this gospel day, no farther than to the stranger within their gates, or will it not also reach out to the neglected ones in the back streets, as well as to others, of other races, more distant? Finally, will not the distinctive principles and testimonies of Friends, as the possession of a separate religious Society, be better apprehended and more consistently maintained?

See "The Friend" of Ninth month 24th.

A well-known preacher and writer, G. P. Pentecost, recently expressed himself strongly upon the evils of this danger, or, rather, existing evil.

In giving expression to these queries and suggestions, (which has been done with some hesitancy, as knowing that others older and more experienced could have stated them more acceptably), the writer hopes he will not be understood as in any wise depreciating any engagement which has been entered into in the love of the Master. His object has simply been—while remembering how we are enjoined to "covet earnestly the best gifts"—to incite us first to a more diligent cultivation of family duties, as being a service which may be eminently blessed to ourselves, to our own religious Society, and to society at large.

J. W. L.

For "The Friend."

Regeneration.

We are by nature the children of wrath—children of the first Adam, after he had lost the divine life, and become spiritually dead. So we need to be regenerated; that is, generated anew; born again; not of corruptible seed, "not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." A birth which is incorruptible and eternal. The first birth from the first Adam "is of the earth, earthy." The second birth is of the second Adam, the quickening spirit—the Lord from heaven, and is heavenly. For "as is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly." And as we, in the first birth, bear the image of the earthy, so we in the second birth bear the image of the heavenly.

That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual. The new birth is the work of the Holy Spirit. And nothing but the spirit of holiness can regenerate us and make us holy. We have it from the highest authority, that "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." So regeneration is the great need of the church, and of every individual member; in order that we might shine as lights in the world, and be made partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." And this is the way the new birth is brought about. As we are led by the Spirit of life and light, we are brought out from under the bondage of death and darkness, and created anew (spiritually) in Christ Jesus, the Second Adam—the quickening spirit; by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of that Holy Spirit of life which was lost in the fall. And this is the only way the great and necessary change from death to life—from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to the power of God, can be made. For can death bring forth life? It is the Spirit that quickeneth and giveth life. Our fallen fleshly propensities can do nothing towards the great work. They are in the way, and have to be crucified and slain.

It was sin, and death by sin, that first caused the separation between man and his Maker; and that sin, or rather the sinful heart from which it proceeds, has to be created anew by the eternal creative Word, before we can be reunited to God, and be made partakers of his holiness. And without holiness no man shall see the Lord. And pollution cannot cleanse itself; neither can death produce life. Therefore as in the first Adam all are in a state of spiritual death, so in Christ the Second Adam all may be restored to newness of life. But sinful man cannot redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him. All that we can do is (like John the Baptist) to point the sinner to "the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." His power is sufficient, and as able to cleanse and renew life, as the power of the Evil One is to defile and cause death. The outward offering of Christ for the sins of the world, showed the great love and mercy of God towards sinful man, but we are not saved by that alone; but only as we livingly experience the work of salvation for ourselves, by yielding in willing obedience to the purifying operations of the Holy Spirit within us. It is only as we are regenerated, and walk in that "true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," that we have fellowship one with another, and witness the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil," and redeem us from all iniquity."

Now so far as we are redeemed, or regenerated and created anew in Christ Jesus, we have spiritual life, both individually and in our assemblies for worship, instead of spiritual death and dry ceremonial formality. All the old Adam, or things pertaining to the fallen nature, having been crucified by the divine life, will have passed away, "and all become new (spiritually), and all things of God who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ." He died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them. And "by one offering He hath perfected forever them that are sanctified." And I do believe it is only the sanctified ones—the new-born ones—that are perfected by that one offering. And it is these that Peter calls the elect of God, "through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." So we must be born again—born of water and of the Spirit—born of the purifying elements. For "that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit."

Now, reader, how is it with thee? Pause and ponder. Of what avail will it be for thee to read and believe these momentous truths, if thou hast not witnessed the new birth for thyself? We may believe in the necessity of regeneration, and be able to talk with fluency about it, but if we have not received it, what good will all our belief and talk do us? If we are not born of God we are not his children. If we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his. And when the great day of decision shall come upon us, I solemnly fear such shall be weighed in the balances and found wanting.

I am this day eighty years old. And still find that I have daily to watch and secretly to pray that I enter not into temptation. I also find that although the spirit is increasingly made willing, the flesh is at times weak. But I rejoice in the hope of the glory of God.

D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 10th mo. 6th, 1881.

Excessive Dissipation.

The writer is acquainted with many worthless fellows who are, perhaps, but seldom seen: public and but little known, because of the rather avoiding than seeking notoriety; but satisfied with the retired niche in which Providence has placed them, and in the approval of Him to whom they are known, and who they desire to serve. There are, on the other hand, multitudes of the same sex to who change, novelty and excitement seem as grateful and as indispensable as is opium to the lover of that enervating, ruinous drug. They appear to look no higher than to revel in the ever-changing scene—the parade and show and delights of sense—found at the various summer resorts and watering places; where extravagance, and dissipation of time, ar mind, and money, with, it is to be feared, too much forgetfulness of God, make up their entertainment, their pastime and neglect of the great purposes of life and of the opportunities placed within the reach of all.

These say, we cannot be singular, we must do as the rest, or those around us, do. We cannot avoid conformity to a world in which we find ourselves so temptingly placed. These loose to the wind their pleasure-courting sails and pursue their idle like the butterfly flitting from flower to flower, as though life were but a gay, continuous holiday, designed for us to sport our airy season and be seen more. These, to the casual observer and those engaged in the same giddy round, fashion, appear satisfied to take up with the portion this poor world only can give, to be busied or too neglectful of the rich and in life beyond promised in the language of Christ: "To him that overcometh will grant to sit with me in my throne, even as also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

The following slips from recent newspaper should be cautionary signals, if not arresting warnings, to all that are tempted to waste pleasure's giddy whirl a life of such infinitesimal importance. They are thus chronicled among the excessive dissipations of the season just passed.

"The most brilliant racing season Saratoga has ever known closed on Saturday."

"The ladies who ride so fearlessly at the hounds at Newport fox-hunts are called 'saddle artists.'"

"Saratoga is voted 'nothing, if not superficially stylish in all its doings.'"

"Extravagant dressing in the morning now quite the fashion at Newport, and was expressed as to what is left for 'full dress since painted satins, point lace sleeves, or embroidered shoes and over-dresses of pearl network are displayed on a public lawn at big noon.'"

"At Saratoga fair women are endeavoring to outvie each other in elaborate and costly dresses. Finery is in full blast, and fashionable costumes, many of which are more extravagant than either pretty or becoming to astonished beholders. 'What shall I wear,' the feminine cry."

"One hundred and sixty arrivals were registered at the Ocean House, Newport, one day last week. Gayety reigns."

"The day is ushered in at the Casino by the playing of the band at eleven; ever, where is gayety, brightness and life. Elbowing one another among the crowds are savants millionaires, women of beauty and fashion, army-men and politicians, literateurs, and, in re, a large proportion of the gilded youth." "Hops are given almost nightly at Cape May, and attended with success. The season at its height."

"Ocean View, Virginia, has numbered many ests this season. A writer says: 'It is perty charming—no end of fun and enjoy-ent.'"

After all loved self's fond indulgence in ese gay pastimes and absorbing paraphra-ia, we have no doubt that, with many, he heart mistrusting asks if this be joy?" "While the soul—that part destined to an imortal existence—secretly longs for some-thing more real and substantial; something ore in accordance with the great purpose d duty of life; something which would seem t a due recognition of the rich and varied unties of a kind Father in heaven; to whom faithful account must be rendered for the p of time, talents, riches, influence, and all e we may for a little while be entrusted th, or be permitted to enjoy. Can excee-e dissipation and profuse expense, wholly own feelings of painful misgivings and fell orse?" or can beauty, and the sweet notes poisoning flattery, with the oft too welcome image paid to it, banish thoughts of that dgment to come," which Paul so pleaded ore the Governor of Judea as to cause him tremble?" Can fashion's baneful bouquet, nity's mirthful reign, or pleasure's intox-icating cup, hide from their votaries the omni-s handwriting on the wall, that fearfully elaims our dependence, our impotency, our thingness?" In a word, can any from love such a world?

"Too full of tempting snares and fond delusions," ego the approbation of Him and with whom is the eternal fiat, that shall ward or punish us forever?

"Whose pervading eye Beholds the heart, and sees what passes there?"

Would that these devotees of pleasure, with others, might, with a great Apostle, count thing too near or too dear to part with for e excellency of the knowledge of Christ sus, who gave himself for us; and who ould bestow, did we sincerely ask it of Him, t only of the well of water springing up to everlasting life for present support, but, ally, would lead unto living fountains there-where God would wipe all tears from the es.

10th month 10th.

A Concise Account of Pennsbury in Bucks County, Penna., by G. W. B., 1881.

(Concluded from page 89.)

It has been said that William Penn died a yeholder, but if so, it is manifest that he was intentional; although there is reason to be-ieve that slaves continued to be appendages t the estate at Pennsbury after he left Penn-sylvania for the last time, and even at the time of his decease in 1718, and for several years; yet, as he sets forth in a will which is ill extant, made in 1701, containing this ause: "I give to my blacks their freedom, it is under my band already, and to Old Sam 90 acres, to be his children's after he and s wife are dead," it is not likely that he changed his mind afterwards, but more pro-able that those entrusted with his American airs, were embarrassed in carrying out his benevolent intentions. The following is from a letter dated in 1721, from James Logan to Hannah Penn:

"The Proprietor, in a will left with me at his departure hence, gave all his negroes their freedom, but this is entirely private; however, there are very few left.

"Sam died soon after your departure, and his brother James lately, Chevalier by a written order from his master, had his liberty several years ago; so that there are none left but Sue, whom Letitia claims, or did claim, as given to her when she went to England. These things you can best discern.

"There are, besides, two old negroes, quite worn, that remained of three which I received eighteen years ago of E. Gibbs' estate of New Castle county."

It may be that some of those slaves, advancing as they were in age, were retained in an unchanged condition, for the humane purpose of supporting them out of the estate in their declining years. William Penn's last will makes no allusion to property in slaves.

When it became known among the Indians that Onas, as they called the Proprietor, was about to leave the country, a large number of them flocked to Pennsbury, to renew their covenants, and to bid him farewell: many of them were sad under a fear and an impression that he would never return; hovering around his promises of friendship, protection and justice with increasing tenacity, and anxious lest those who were left in trust of the administration of his affairs in his absence might not prove satisfactory. This gathering together of the Indians at Pennsbury upon the eve of the Governor's absence from the province, was a memorable and important occasion; they met in council, and for themselves and people, respectively, expressed their earnest solicitude that all their former covenants might remain inviolate, and agreed, and earnestly urged, that if any differences should arise amongst them, such might not be made the occasion of alienation and hostility between William Penn or his people and the Indian chiefs or their people; but that justice should be done under all circumstances, that all animosities on all sides might be forever prevented.

We can scarcely sufficiently appreciate in this day the advantages which resulted from William Penn's pacific policy toward the Indians, and his consequent influence over them. The mutual hatreds and jealousies between whites and Indians which prevailed in other colonies, and impeded their prosperity, were obviated here; and the early settlers, while pressed with the cares and privations of pioneer life, experienced not only their friendship, but their services.

J. Richardson, of England, has left an interesting account of a visit which he made at Pennsbury in the year 1701 or 1702. The following are extracts from his memoranda:

"I was at William Penn's country house, called Pennsbury, in Pennsylvania, where I stayed two or three days, on one of which I was at a meeting and a marriage. Much of the other part of the time I spent in seeing to my satisfaction William Penn and many of the Indians, not the least of them, in council concerning their former covenants, now again revived upon William Penn's going away to England, all of which was done in much calmness of temper and in an amicable way.

"When they had ended the most weighty parts for which they (their councils) had been held, William Penn gave them match coats and some other things, which the speaker advised to be put into the hands of one of their cossacks or kings, for he knew best how to order them. I observed, and also heard the same from others, that they did not speak too at a time, nor interfere in the least with each other in that way in their councils. Their eating and drinking was also in much stillness.

"William Penn said he understood they owned a Superior Power, and asked the interpreter what their notion of God was in their own way. The interpreter showed them dancing several circles on the ground with his staff, until he reduced the last into a small circumference, and placed, as he said by way of representation, the Great Man, as they called him, in the middle of the circle, so that he could see over all the other circles, which included all the earth.

"They went out of the house into an open place not far from it to perform their worship, which was done thus: First they made a small fire, and the men without the women sat down about it in a ring, and whatsoever object they severally fixed their eyes on, I did not see them removed in all that part of their worship, while they sang a very melodious hymn, which affected and tendered the hearts of many who were spectators. When they had thus done, they began to beat upon the ground with little sticks, or make some motion with something in their hands, and pause a little, till one of the elder sort sets forth his lyre, followed by the company for a few minutes, and then a pause; and the like was done by another, and so by a third, and followed by the company, as at first, which occurred ex-ceedingly to affect them and others. Having done, they rose up and danced a little about the fire, and parted with some shouting like triumph or rejoicing."

There is scope for thoughtfulness in the remembrance that this interesting people has long since passed away from a large space of country which spreads around Pennsbury—a people so sincere in their devotions, so moral in their lives, so warm in their attachments, so unalterable in their friendships, no lingering remnant remains to represent the race of their worthy fathers, or exhibit the attainments in civil and religious progress of which it was doubtless susceptible.

And as the personal presence of William Penn among the poor Indians was marked by many testimonials of affection on their part, and as their friendship was pure, it was deeply rooted and lasting, time and distance did not wear it out; the memory thereof was precious to them, and they exhibited evidence of it long after William Penn had passed away. It appears they had a veneration for Pennsbury on account of associations connected with it, and some tribes were wont to perform annual visits to the locality. These visits were continued until late in the last century, and perhaps were continued until a later period of time. An eye-witness, who had been a young girl residing with the family occupying the brew-house dwelling about the time to which reference has been made, represented that among the annual visitors were some of great age; and at that period there yet remained some of the walnut trees that William Penn had planted, and these were objects to which they clung with howling and lamentation, apparently frantic with grief, yet with wild enthusiastic fondness. Some of these aged children of the forest had knowledge of William Penn personally as well as from tradition, and there must have been something touching in these exhibitions of true-hearted affection for his memory, which still remained so fresh and lively, so long after his earthly pilgrimage had ended.

The bursts of affection with which the poor Indians sometimes greeted their friend William Penn were somewhat singular in exhibition, and, although doubtless annoying, perhaps were not altogether displeasing to his generous feelings. If tradition truly represents, these warm-hearted creatures upon one occasion met him on the road in the neighborhood of Pennsbury riding in his coach, and from the impulse of the moment, drew him from it, and wrapped their blankets around him in token of affection; and so impetuous were their zeal to manifest their friendship and attachment, that all danger from the fright of horses was unheeded, overlooked, or not comprehended, and it was useful for the driver to tie them to trees for safety.

The Governor of a great province sometimes condescended to the low estate of the simple-hearted and confiding Indians, partaking of their venison, their bonny, their roasted acorns, and other Indian dainties, joining in their athletic sports, and sometimes rivaling them in feats of agility; with all of which they were immensely pleased.

The Indians bore frequent testimony that William Penn had never deceived them, and unbounded was their confidence in his integrity; doubtless it was good policy in him to cultivate their friendship; but apart from every temporal consideration, they possessed a large share of his sympathy, brotherly kindness and disinterested love.

There is something truly pleasing in looking back to the beginnings and advance, the manifestations, comforts, and good fruits of the friendship which continued to subsist between William Penn and the Indians. Although he possessed the land which had descended to them from their fathers, and they were exiles from it, still that friendship remained unimpaired. Were we now to look abroad over the scattered remnants of our Indian population, how few examples of warm attachment, unwavering friendship, and bursts of affection would be manifested at the presence of those that have been instrumental in dispossessing them of their ancient inheritance, and how few would be the testimonials to the justice and generosity of these.

A scanty remnant of one or two of the old cherry trees, which it is said William Penn planted with his own hands, is still obtainable as relics. A portion of the brick pavement which constituted the cellar floor of the mansion, is now an unaltered portion of the cellar floor of the attractive modern farm-house built partly upon the foundations of its ancient but more pretentious predecessor. The occupants of the present dwelling are supplied with excellent water from a well near the door, from the same well which, yielding the like pure and refreshing water, contributed to the necessities and comforts of the Penn family in days which have long since passed away. The worthy farmer who now owns and occupies the premises, bears the name of William Penn Crozier.

The ancient improvements and the forests have nearly all disappeared from Pennsbury and its adjacent surroundings, but the site of the mansion is still there, and the river pursues its wonted course as when the Proprietor of a great province and the introducer of a new and to the world novel system of government, launched his favorite barge upon its waves or tranquil waters, and perhaps contemplated the rapidly-approaching period when the progress of civilization would change the sylvan scene before him, and his benevolent exertions to implant the blessings of civil and religious liberty be crowned with success.

EVERY DAY.

O trifling tasks so often done,
Yet ever to be done anew!
O cares which come with every sun,
Morn after morn the long years through!
We shrink beneath their paitry sway—
The irksome calls of every day.

The restless sense of wasted power,
The tiresome round of little things,
Are hard to bear, as hour by hour
Its tedious iteration brings;
Who shall evade or who delay
The small demands of every day?

The boulder in the torrent's course,
By tide and tempest lashed in vain,
Obeys the wave-whirled pebble's force,
And yields its substance grain by grain;
So crumble strongest lives away
Beneath the wear of every day.

Who finds the lion in his lair,
Who tracks the tiger for his life,
May wound them ere they are aware,
Or conquer them in desperate strife,
Yet powerless he to scathe or slay
The vexing gains of every day.

The steady strain that never stops,
Is mightier than the fiercest shock;
The constant fall of water-drops
Will groove the adamant rock;
We feel our noblest powers decay,
In feeble wars with every day.

We rise to meet a heavy blow—
Our souls a sudden bravery fills
But we endure not always so
The drop-by-drop of little ills;
We still deplore and still obey
The hard behests of every day.

And even saints of holy fame,
Whose souls by faith have overcome,
Who wore amid the cruel flame
The molten crown of martyrdom,
Bore not without complaint away
The petty pains of every day.

Ah, more than martyr's aureole,
And more than hero's heart of fire,
We need the humble strength of soul
Which daily toils and ills require;
Sweet Patience! grant us, if thou may,
An added grace for every day!

THE SONG OF THE BROOK.

A little brook went singing
O'er golden sands along,
And as I listened to it
It whispered in its song.

"Beneath the steady mountain,"
I thought I heard it say,
"My crystal waters started
Upon their winding way.

"I fondly hoped that flowers
Should bloom upon each side,
And sunshine always cheer me
Wherever I might glide.

"Through grassy meadows flowing,
And birds on every tree,
I hoped that each hour passing
Would pleasure bring to me.

Selected.

"Yet hopes once bright have perished;
But rarely have I seen
The lowly birds and flowers,
The meadows soft and green.

"Through barren paths and lonely,
My way has often led,
Where golden sunshine never
Has cheered my gloomy bed.

"O'er rocks I've had to travel;
O'er precipices steep
I onward have been driven,
And madly made to leap.

"The winds have sighed around me,
The clouds in darkness hung,
And sadness has been mingled
With music I have sung.

"But still, wherever running,
My life has not been vain;
I've helped to grow the forests
That wave across the plain.

"The forests build the cities,
And ships that sail the sea,
And the nightly forests gather
Their nourishment from me.

"So onward! onward ever!
With singing I will go,
However dark and dreary
The scenes through which I flow."

A higher law than pleasure
Should guide me in my way;
Thus 'mid the rocks and forests
Comes music every day.

For "The Friend."

Circular of the Bible Association of Friends in America.

In again calling the attention of Auxiliaries to the Annual Queries to be answered previous to the general meeting of the Association on the 3rd of Eleventh month, the Corresponding Committee would press upon Friends, who have been engaged in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, the importance of furnishing full and accurate answer to all the Queries, and of forwarding their reports seasonably to the Depository.

It may be recollected, that in making donations to Auxiliaries, the Board are guided in deciding what number of Bibles and Testaments shall be sent to each, by the information given in its report. Hence those Auxiliaries that do not report in time, are liable to be left out in the distribution.

Specific directions should be given in every case, how boxes should be marked and forwarded; and their receipt should always be promptly acknowledged.

Address John S. Stokes, No. 116 N. Fourth Street, Philadelphia.

CHARLES RHODES,
JAMES WHITALL,

Committee of Correspondence
Philada., 10th month, 1881.

QUERIES.

1. What number of families or individuals have been gratuitously furnished with the Holy Scriptures by the Auxiliary during the past year?
2. What number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold by the Auxiliary within the past year?
3. How many members, male and female, are there belonging to the Auxiliary?
4. What number of families of Friends reside within its limits?
5. Are there any families of Friends within your limits not supplied with a copy of the Holy Scripture in good clear type, and on fair paper; if so, how many?
6. How many members of our Society, capable of reading the Bible, do not own such a copy of the Holy Scriptures?
7. How many Bibles and Testaments may probably be disposed of by sale within your limits?
8. Is the income of the Auxiliary sufficient to supply those within its limits who are not duly furnished with the Holy Scriptures?

Selected.

9. What number of Bibles and Testaments would it be necessary for the Bible Association to furnish gratuitously, to enable the Auxiliary to supply each family?

10. What number would be required in order to furnish each member of our religious Society, capable of reading, who is destitute of a copy, and unable to purchase it?

11. How many Bibles and Testaments are now on and?

For "The Friend."

Western Friends in Court.

(Continued from page 85.)

From the records of one of the county courts of Indiana, evidence was obtained that a woman in the station of minister, in Indiana Yearly Meeting, had, in her official capacity united six couples in marriage. The laws of this state, it is said, require that only ministers who have been ordained, shall be qualified to perform this rite.

The following minutes of the Ohio Select Yearly Meeting (Binns) were offered and exception taken:

Minute of 1877.—"This meeting was brought to deep exercise and travail concerning ungodly and mystical views and expositions which appear here and there in certain of our members, in opposition to the plain scriptural doctrines of man's darkness and deadness in sin by nature, and his redemption thereon by the Lord Jesus Christ, whose shed blood is the alone means of cleansing the soul from all the guilt of sin: it was directed, that non-acceptance of this doctrine, is a manifest disqualification for the station of minister or elder."

Minute of 1878.—"This Meeting renewedly feels the importance of purging itself from all unsoundness in doctrine, and we hereby affirm the substance of the minute of last year, and subordinate meetings are directed to carry out the instructions therein given, a reference to such cases. We do not believe that there is any principle or quality in the soul of man, innate or otherwise, which, even though rightly used will ever save a single soul; but that it pleased God, by the polishness of preaching, to save them that believe; and the Holy Spirit is sent to convince the ungodly of sin, who upon repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus Christ who died for us, are justified by His blood, and we repudiate the so-called doctrine of the inner light, or the gift of a portion of the Holy Spirit in the soul of every man, as dangerous, unsound and unscriptural."

A deposition was offered from Benjamin P. Gosand, a minister of North Carolina Yearly Meeting. This was to the effect that himself and others were appointed a committee by the Select Yearly Meeting of North Carolina, to labor with some of their members on account of unsound doctrines that had been introduced among them. The committee accordingly visited some of the select members and advised them to burn a certain objectionable document and also such other papers in their houses, as advocated like sentiments. The reader may be interested to know that his document containing the unsound doctrines was the Declaration of Faith, adopted by the entire Society of Friends in America, in 1830! This evidence was objected to as irrelevant, and also on the ground that the Select Yearly Meeting had not endorsed the course of the committee.*

*The Yearly Meeting has not been held since the committee was appointed.

A deposition from Melinda Newby in regard to the unity of Catharine Mulloy with Orthodox Friends was ruled to be irrelevant to the case. I was informed that Catharine Mulloy on her death-bed had said she had rather her will should be burned than that her money should fall into the hands of the Progressives. At one time during the trial the judge suggested that as the testatrix knew that some Friends held sentiments different from others, if she had desired her will to be administered only by those holding the established principles, she would have so expressed it therein. But it is to be remembered that in 1868, those of Progressive sentiments had not developed the great changes that they did afterwards; and that Catharine Mulloy had probably never contemplated a separation in her meeting.

After the Discipline of 1865, and that issued by the Progressives bearing the imprint of 1881 had been offered as evidence, Evan Hadley was re-examined. He stated that his Quarterly Meeting, after the separation in the Yearly Meeting in 1877, accepted the reports from the Progressive body. No change had taken place in the subordinate Monthly Meetings since that time. These are White Lick and West Union Monthly Meetings.

The case was then submitted without argument on 4th day afternoon, the 7th of 9th month.

Several Friends from Philadelphia and Ohio were present, prepared to testify to the history and position of their respective Yearly Meetings, as well as to other matters. After what had occurred, however, it was thought that their testimony would not be received, and they were not examined.

The Indianapolis Journal of 9th mo. 22d, contains the decision of the judge, which is given at considerable length.

Judge Hill holds that the question at issue is simply: "which of two bodies, each claiming to be the true White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, is identical with the body that received these bequests from Catharine Mulloy." He bases his opinion in favor of the Progressives on the following points: The continuation of their organization; their correspondence with the same Yearly Meetings as in former years; their preponderance of numbers, and the absence in 1877 (the year the division occurred) of any controversy, excepting the question of recognition of the two contending Plainfield Quarterly Meetings. The Yearly Meeting was competent to decide this question.

He quotes in support of this last opinion, from a number of decisions; among others that of Connitt vs. Reformed Protestant Church, &c., 54 N. Y., 551. It is said: "Having thus reached the conclusion that this was an ecclesiastical matter and that the church judicatories had jurisdiction of it, we cannot enquire whether they have proceeded according to the laws and usages of their church, nor whether they have decided the matter correctly. It is the settled law of this country, repeatedly announced by the most learned judges and highest courts, that in such cases the civil courts must take the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts as final and binding upon the parties."

That there are cases where the civil tribunal rightfully supersedes the ecclesiastical is admitted. He says: "I am aware of a line of decisions holding that the civil courts will disregard and set aside the action of a religious body under certain circumstances, and will control the use or disposition of property, regardless of the action of the religious organization having it in charge. These are cases where property, by devise, gift or grant, has been devoted to certain pious uses, or the propagation of certain religious tenets, or the support of a minister or a school preaching or teaching certain religious doctrines, or in some way has had impressed upon it in the creation of the fund, or the gift, devise, or grant of the property, a devotion to certain religious purposes. In all such cases, upon well settled principles, in no respect conflicting with the principles of the cases above cited, the courts will see that the property is not diverted from the purpose to which it was originally devoted, so long as there is any one entitled to and seeking its application according to the original design, although a very large majority of those having the fund in charge may be attempting its diversion to other purposes."

"But where the property in controversy has been devoted to an ordinary charity, unconnected with the support, promotion or benefit, in any way, of any peculiar religious belief; or where as in the case at bar, it is devised to a religious society in trust only, for ordinary charitable purposes, under like circumstances; in such cases no inquiry into the religious opinions of either of the contending parties is admissible; with the possible exception of admitting it solely for the purpose of aiding and identifying the party entitled to control the fund."

This "possible exception" is a very important matter indeed, involving the whole question, as the bequests were made to "White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends."

The departures, respecting which such a large amount of undisputed testimony was offered, are thus referred to:

"I am not unmindful of the fact that evidence was before me that for some time previous to this separation, in various meetings for worship under the control of the Western Yearly Meeting, or of the committee appointed by it to superintend and take charge of such meetings for worship, various departures from what are claimed as the established usages of the Society of Friends, in the mode of conducting its worship, were indulged in; and doctrines were taught by the ministers which are claimed to have been inconsistent, and in conflict with the doctrines and faith of that Society."

"But where was complaint to be made of such conduct? Was it to be brought immediately before the civil courts? Or was it not a matter clearly to be brought, in the first instance, at least, before the proper tribunals of the Society itself?" He goes on to speak of Meetings for Discipline and the Meeting for Sufferings, as tribunals better qualified to hear and judge as to "what was necessary and proper to be done in the premises," than any civil court could be.

This is true enough. But when a large majority in these meetings refuse to apply any relief in the premises, what course is open to those who cannot conscientiously take their children to places of worship where they are continually exposed to influences and teachings which the parents believe to be wrong? That the judge failed to realize the importance which Friends attach to their religion, seems evident by the foregoing remarks.

On some points he really seems to have been misled by not understanding the facts. For instance where he says:

"There is no evidence of any action of the Yearly Meeting itself as a body, that is even claimed to have been a departure from the confession of faith, or discipline, or the usages and practices of the Society."

The testimony of Robert W. Hodson shows that protests had been made in the Yearly Meeting year after year. John W. Furnas was asked if there was any other cause for the separation than the Plainfield contest, but was debarré from answering. The discipline of 1881 contains radical changes from that of 1865, in doctrine and the principles of church government. It is true that these changes were not adopted in 1877.

In another place the judge remarks: "I think it is also clearly established * * * that no new Yearly Meeting can be set up and become a part of the Society of Friends, without the consent of all the other Yearly Meetings." The fact is, that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, never was asked to give and never did give consent to the setting up of either Western, Iowa, Kansas or Canada Yearly Meetings."

The decision is contained in the following words:

"It appears to me that the evidence establishes that the plaintiff Society is the actual, identical and real White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, intended by the will of Catharine Mulloy to be the trustee of the two funds devised by the fourth and seventh clauses thereof, and that my finding must, therefore, be for the plaintiff."

The defendants have appealed to the Supreme Court of Indiana, and the case is expected to be heard by that tribunal in about a year from this time. E. M.

CORRECTION.—In the last number, page 85, third column, lines 25-26, for "White Lick," read "West Union."

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

The Ecumenical Methodist Conference.—One of the noticeable events in the religious world is the recent gathering at London of delegates from all the various sub-denominations into which the followers of John Wesley have become divided. This conference of the Methodist bodies commenced its meetings on the 7th of the 9th mo., in the City Road Chapel, where Wesley preached a century ago, and closed its session on the 20th of the same.

At its last meeting an address was adopted directed to "The Ministers and Members of all the Methodist Churches throughout the World," from which the following information and extracts are taken.

The delegates were about 400 in number, and represented a total of 4,800,000 members, and including their families, not far from 20,000,000 people in all. They came from all the known organizations of Methodists, 26 in number. Among these sub-divisions, the address says:

"We are happy to observe decided tendencies to a closer, if not organic, union with each other. The example of three of the Methodist Churches in Canada, and two in Ireland, indicates that when Providence points the way, our different bodies in the same countries may be brought into one, with promise of largely-increased usefulness. Such unions, we believe, should be prudently encouraged, and when they occur under favorable auspices should be hailed with great joy.

"But while we are praying and waiting for them, let us respect each other, especially in all matters of Church discipline, and maintain just and truly fraternal relations; and being one in doctrine, aims, and essential methods, and really one spiritual organism, let us bring together annually in one year-book the results of our labors under God, and be known every-where as one Methodist Church."

Among the items of advice, we observe a caution that First-Day Schools should not be allowed to take the place of public Divine service, lest a generation should grow up who will neglect the assembling of themselves together for worship. Their members are encouraged to be liberal, not only in contributing for church purposes, but for the "charities required to ameliorate the condition of the human race," and in order to this, "let all our people, young and old, be trained to the entire consecration of property, and hence to liberal, systematic giving, according to the ability which God giveth."

They think it is time that all their places of worship and institutions of learning be freed from debt, so that no more money be paid in interest; and sensibly advise that in the erection of buildings for these purposes, extravagance be avoided and economy and convenience be consulted.

The evils of intemperance are referred to, and an appeal is made that "the force of a consistent example, and of private and public influence" of their 4,000,000 members be brought to bear against "this grievous crime."

"With equal earnestness we bear our testimony against war, and insist upon the most faithful efforts of nations to settle all difficulties by peaceful arbitration."

"Finally, brethren, we most earnestly desire that our people should avoid all self-laudation. We have reached numbers and wealth and power, which fearfully expose us to temptation to church pride."

Dis-Establishment in Scotland.—We learn from English papers that John Dick Piddie, M. P. for Kilmarnock, has given notice that at the next session of Parliament he will move in the House of Commons the following:

"That this House is of opinion that the maintenance of the Church Establishment in Scotland is indefensible on public grounds; that in the ecclesiastical circumstances of the country it is eminently unjust; and that a measure for the dis-establishment and dis-endowment of the Church of Scotland ought to be passed at an early period.—Selected."

Infidelity and Crime.—The N. Y. Evening Post says: "A careful survey of the murders, suicides, and other great felonies committed in the chief cities of the United States during the last ten years shows that a heavy fraction of the perpetrators were atheists and free thinkers. These unhappy persons, persuaded that life is the be-all and end-all here, imagine that they can jump the life to come. A collection of letters and other papers often left by criminals, when anticipating death, shows a fearful number of instances, some of which many readers will recall, of absolute disbelief in the existence of a God or in penalties for sins committed in this life to be exacted in a future one."

Ecclesiastical Contest among Roman Catholics.—The following, taken from the St. Louis Presbyterian, shows in a striking manner how little of the real power of managing the pecuniary affairs of their congregations is vested in the laity among Roman Catholics.

During the late session of the legislature of Michigan, Calhoun, a Roman Catholic member of the House of Representatives, and chairman of the Judicial Committee, reported a bill providing that all ecclesiastical property shall be vested in the hands of lay trustees. In presenting this report, Calhoun said:

The congregation in Catholic churches have no voice whatever in temporal affairs; such matters are entirely controlled by the priests. Councilmen are appointed by the bishop, but the priest names a certain number, and out of those the councilmen are appointed. Of course, priests select only men friendly to them, and who will do their bidding. They have no control in any event, and are mere bookkeepers or clerks. The congregations have nothing to do with fixing pew-rents or other revenues, or with the disbursement of any revenues. All charges, salaries, and expenditures are fixed for them by church authorities.

He called attention to the fact that no such powers are vested in Protestant pastors, but that, in all Protestant congregations, the people have full control, and manage their temporal affairs through trustees of their own choosing. By way of illustrating the wisdom and necessity of such a law as his committee recommended, he gave an example of the oppression to which Roman Catholics are not unfrequently subjected, by describing the character of a priest in one of their best churches. Said Calhoun:

This priest has diverted property from the uses for which the congregation procured it, to the uses of himself and friends. On the part of the congregation it is no mere personal dislike of him. It is a loathing of his character and methods. He is a notorious, shameless liar. Has been used for slander and compelled to retract. Is grossly dishonest; an extortioner who has exacted exorbitant payments of poor widows and orphans for funeral masses; a consummate hypocrite. Is a priest from purely mercenary motives, and only for the opportunity it gives him to get an easy living and dupe sincere people out of their money. He has vilified the living and the dead, and prostituted everything sacred, even the sacraments of the church, to his malicious ends. He is addicted to the use of liquor. Is an ignorant, vicious, malicious, thoroughly degraded and depraved wretch. Any one who will look at his bloated, discolored, swinish face as he stalks about streets can tell what he is. And yet he is retained there against the express wish of the people. People must submit to him and attend his mass, or be called non-Catholics.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Ventilation.—It is to the exhalations from the skin and lungs that the heavy, sickening smell noticed on first entering a crowded room is due. Odors being volatile and exceedingly light, these exhalations rise to the highest portions of the room; and, if not allowed to escape, accumulate there, saturating the air from above downward, and finally reaching the floor. Of all the noxious matters in the fouled air of a poorly ventilated school or public building, these are at once the most perceptible, the most offensive, and the most rapidly prostrating. A distinguished physician, writing of an infant nursery under his charge where the children did not thrive, and many died of diseases of the digestive organs, says: "One remarkable circumstance observed was that there was a faint odor always present in the room. Yet it was a large room, about fifty feet in length. One side of the room was made up of windows which went up about ten feet where the roof or ceiling bevelled up in an inverted A shape, which raised the room in the centre seven or eight feet more. Do what I would, I could not get rid of this smell. One day, feeling much annoyed thereat, I procured some long steps which extended about three feet above the upper ledge of the windows. On walking upon, no sooner had I got my head one foot above their level, than I found a terrible odor that made me feel giddy and sick, and I was laden enough to come down. I instantly sent for a workman, and desired him to remove three or four tiles at each end of the room, on level with the highest point of the roof. He did so. In ten minutes all odor had disappeared; but his work was no sooner ended than he was taken very giddy and practically sick, so completely had he been overcome by the pestilential atmosphere."

A Remarkable Pony.—A well-authenticated and extraordinary case of the sagacity of the Highland pony has just come under our notice. A year or two ago William Sinclair, pupil teacher, Holm, imported one of these little animals from Shetland on which to ride to school from school, his residence being at a considerable distance from the school-buildings. Up to that time the animal had been unsold, at sometime afterward Sinclair had it shod. One day the blacksmith, whose smithy was a long distance from Sinclair's house, saw the pony, without halter or anything upon it, talking up to where he was working. Thinking the animal had strayed from home, he drove it off, throwing stones after the beast to make it run homeward. This had the desired effect for a short time, but he had only done fairly at work once more in the smithy when the pony's head again made its appearance at the door.

On proceeding a second time outside to drive the pony away, with a blacksmith's intent he took a look at the pony's feet, when he observed that one of its shoes had been st. Having made a shoe, he put it on, and then waited to see what the animal would do, or a moment it looked at the blacksmith, as asking whether he was done, then pawed once or twice to see if the newly-shod foot was comfortable, and finally gave a pleased sigh, erected his head, and started home at brisk trot. The owner was exceedingly surprised to find the animal at home completely shod the same evening, and it was only on calling at the smithy some days afterward that he learned the full extent of his pony's sagacity.—Orkney Herald.

That which holds the first place in our affections, which is uppermost in our thoughts, and which we pursue with constancy, whether it is money, or pleasure, or power, or ease, is our god. We may say, "Lord, Lord," but the lord whom we worship and serve is that which fills our hearts and rules our lives.—Methodist Recorder.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 29, 1881.

In the article headed "Western Friends in Court," in our last number, it was said by one of the witnesses that correspondence with other Yearly Meetings had never been regarded as an essential accompaniment of the organization of the Society of Friends.

There has been so much misapprehension on this subject, that it may be profitable to examine into the origin of the practice of sending annual epistles to each other, which long existed in our Society.

Like the Apostle Paul, who daily felt the care of all the churches, George Fox watched with great interest over the society he had been so largely instrumental in gathering from the various professions of his day. He kept up an extensive correspondence with Friends in different parts of the world, who forwarded to him frequent accounts of their sufferings for the truth, and of the spread of the principles of the Gospel in their respective neighborhoods.

In 1689 he wrote an epistle to the Quarterly and Yearly Meetings of Friends in America, in which he advises them to "write over once a year, from all your Yearly Meetings to the Yearly Meeting here, concerning your diligence in the truth, and of its spreading, and of people's receiving it, both professors and prophane, and the Indians; and concerning the peace of the Church of Christ amongst yourselves."

He was then approaching the end of life, and, conscious of the failing of his bodily powers, through the multiplied labors, hardships and sufferings he had undergone, he desired the channel of intercourse might be kept open, when he would no longer be able to extend advice or help as had been his custom. This is shown by another document dated 1690—"All Friends in all the world, that used to write me of all manner of things and passages, and I did answer them,—let them all write to the Second-day's Meeting in London, directing them first to their correspondents there; and the Second-day's Meeting in London, for them to answer them in the wisdom of God; and let a copy of this be sent to all places in the world among Friends, that they may know and understand this."

In an account of the rise and progress of the Society drawn up by George Fox in 1689, he speaks of the Yearly Meeting in London as actively laboring to relieve any captives, prisoners or sufferers among Friends in Turkey or any parts beyond the seas; as assisting and laboring for those who were under persecution in any place; and as annually receiving accounts from all the Yearly Meetings in the world, and writing to them again; "so that once a year at the Yearly Meeting God's people know the affairs of Truth, how it spreads, and how all walk according to the Truth; having a heavenly correspondence one with another in the heavenly society and fellowship."

In those early days, the members of our Society in Great Britain were probably far more numerous than in all other parts of the world; and they included the most of the survivors of those faithful ministers who counted not their lives dear unto them, so that they might finish the work assigned them, of proclaiming the pure principles of the Gospel. The Yearly Meeting at London was therefore rightly looked up to with great respect, and constantly appealed to for advice and assistance in the emergencies that were arising. Excepting a comparatively small number on the Continent of Europe, nearly all Friends then lived in countries subject to the British crown; and London Friends were frequently called on to labor with the government in the interest of their brethren in the American colonies. The correspondence between Philadelphia and London Yearly Meetings, which was kept up from the earliest times to a comparatively recent date, furnishes several illustrations of this in the period prior to the revolutionary war.

Though this intercourse with the parent Yearly Meeting was maintained by probably all the offshoots, yet there was no corresponding interchange of communications between themselves. Friends of Philadelphia in writing to London Yearly Meeting in 1714 on the African slave trade, request them to advise with Friends "in other plantations where they [slaves] are more numerous than with us, because they hold a correspondence with you, but not with us, and your meeting may better prevail with them, and your advice prove more effectual." Yet epistles and deputations were frequently sent between the different Yearly Meetings in America, especially when any subjects arose of common interest, or where the help or counsel of neighboring bodies was desired. As early after the opening of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as 1683, William Penn and others were appointed to write to Friends in the other colonies, and suggest the establishment of a general Yearly Meeting for all the provinces from New England to North Carolina. Though this scheme was not carried out, yet it opened the way for more frequent intercourse between the brethren in different localities, who had many subjects in which they were mutually interested, as in the case of slavery already referred to. So that, in 30 or 40 years it became the usual practice of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to keep up a correspondence with the other bodies in America, as well as with London. Whether they pursued a similar course with each other, in those early times, we do not know.

Dublin Yearly Meeting was not included in this correspondence, except in one or two instances when special circumstances called for it, until some years after the separation of 1827.

As Friends in America became more numerous, and accustomed to the transaction of the weighty business that devolved upon them, they naturally came to depend less and less on the judgment of their brethren across the ocean; though still closely bound to them by the bond of a common faith, and by the traditions of the church. Hence, their epistles, which originally partook somewhat of the character of letters of information sent to a superior meeting, became the friendly greetings of co-ordinate bodies. London Yearly Meeting ceased to be regarded as the head to whose judgment the others felt bound to submit; but rather as the first among equals, whose advice carried great weight, but which was accepted and followed only as it commended itself to the calm judgment and better feelings of those to whom it was communicated.

In this altered condition of the Society, the reasons which induced George Fox to recommend the sending of annual reports from all parts of the world to London, no longer operated. The burthens of the Church had become divided between the different Yearly Meetings, each of which watched over its domains, seeking for help from each other as seemed needful. Without watchfulness on the part of Friends, the custom of preparing annual epistles might easily degenerate into a formal thing; and mere moral essays with little of the savor of life might take the place of those statements of the condition of the Society which were very properly sent in the beginning for the information of what was then practically a superior meeting.

If Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should resume its correspondence with other co-ordinate bodies, it is much to be desired that it should watch the restraining as well as the constraining directions of the Head of the Church, and be willing to omit the preparation of epistles when it feels that it has nothing to say. In private life, we do not feel it an essential condition of true friendship to send letters at stated times to those we love; neither ought it to be so regarded in the case of Yearly Meetings.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has nominated and the Senate has confirmed Edward D. Morgan to be Secretary of the Treasury, vice Wm. Windom, resigned.

The reductions of service on the steamboat and Star routes are believed, at the Post-office Department, to have nearly reached their limit. These have already effected a saving to the Government of $2,200,000 annually.

The steamship Parthia, from Liverpool, due in New York this week, has on board several tanks of young English sows and turbot, under care of a competent man, who has been entrusted with the work by Prof. Baird, of the U. S. Fishery Commission. They will arrive with Capt. Conerly in the forenoon, in about 15 or 16 feet water. This is the third attempt of the kind.

The first steamer that ever came to the port of New York from the Philippine Islands, the Malabar, arrived on the 24th inst., with 2325 tons sugar, said to be the most valuable cargo of that commodity ever imported into the United States from any country. The firm to whom it was consigned have sold it for $360,000, and to a leading sugar refining firm. The duties amounted to $125,000.

The steamer Leipzig, which arrived at Baltimore on Seventh-day, from Bremen, brought among her cargo 8000 cabbages, imported from Oldenburg in Germany. This novel importation is due to the scarcity and high price of home cabbages.

The number of immigrants who landed at New York during the twelve months ending the 18th of this month, was 368,045, against 270,356 during the corresponding period of last year; 139,502 came from Germany, and 58,294 from Ireland.

It is now authoritatively stated that the corn crop in Minnesota will be double that of last year, and that the damage by late rains has been overestimated. As a rule, injury to crops from weather influences are overestimated at the start, yet it is these overstatements, rather than the facts as finally ascertained, that usually control the speculative markets. Ohio, too, turns out quite a crop, the yield of wheat being 27,215,248 bushels, which is 70 per cent. of last year's unproductive production. Oats exceed the crop of a year ago by 3 per cent. The dry product is nearly as large. Corn is set down at 62 per cent.; rye, 85. The pastures throughout the State have been revived by the abundant rains.

The breaks in the Sky and other levees, near Quincy, Illinois, have resulted in a great flood. The farmers in the surrounding country have lost heavily, precipitated live stock, and much damage has been done to railroads.

Tennessee cattle that have been compelled to live on withered grass during the long drouth, are reported in remarkably good condition.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health states that there were 12 deaths in this city last week, 43 more than occurred during the corresponding week of last year, and two more than during the week ending 10th month 15th, 1881. The number of males was 187, of females 154. There were 35 deaths from consumption, 39 from typhoid fever, 20 from marasmus, and 20 from old age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 101; 4's, 110 $\frac{1}{2}$; 4's, 110 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's, 132.

Cotton continues quiet, but prices remain about the same. Sales of middlings are reported as follows: 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for export, and 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per gallon for home use.

Floor continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 1900 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at \$7.75 for clear, annual at \$8 for Pennsylvania extra family at \$7.12 $\frac{1}{2}$ a \$7.37 $\frac{1}{2}$; western do. do. at \$7.50 a \$8.25, and patents at \$8.25 a \$9.25. Eye flour moves slowly \$6 a \$6.12 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is dull, but options a little higher. Sales of 3700 bushels Delaware red and amber at \$1.40 a \$1.45; Eye is steady at \$1.05 for Pennsylvania and \$1.03 for western. Corn is quiet and steady. Sales of 9000 bushels including yellow, at 72 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; mixed at 71 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; steamer at 70 a 71 cts.; No. 3 at 70 cts., and rejected at 70 cts. Oats are less active, but steady. Sales of 11,000 bushels, including white at 50 a 52 cts., and mixed at 49 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 10th mo. 22d, 1881.—Loads of hay, 327; loads of straw, 46. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, \$1.35 to \$1.45 per 100 pounds; mixed, \$1.25 to \$1.35 per 100 pounds; Straw, \$1.10 to \$1.25 per 100 pounds. Hay is mostly dull, and prices were a fraction lower; 4800 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were dull and rather lower: 16,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 24 a 54 cts., and lambs at 4 a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per pound, as to condition.

Butcher stock was dull and rather low and sold at the different yards at 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—It is estimated that 43,670 tons of produce, including 20,406 tons of coal, were lost at sea during the recent gale. A majority of the wrecked vessels were laden with coal, and the cargo was lost as building materials, petroleum, herrings, tar and oil cake lost aggregate 13,257 tons. The balance of the losses consisted of salt, iron and timber.

The steamship Great Eastern has been put up at auction, and bought for $100,000. She was launched on the 13th of April, 1854, and was intended for the launching of a very long ship, sideways, instead of with the stern at the foot of the ways, as is usual. It is said that the launch itself cost between three and four hundred thousand dollars before she was got off the ways, and her entire cost up to this time, including the expense repairs, had reached the neighborhood of $25,000,000.

At the last meeting of the Land League a manifesto was issued, advising members of the League henceforth to pay no rent until the leaders are released. This was speedily followed by a proclamation from the English Government warning all persons that the Irish National League, or any of its branches, if they are called into an unlawful and criminal association, and that all meetings to carry out or promote its designs or purposes are unlawful and criminal, and will be prevented and dispersed by force. The proclamation warns the Queen's subjects connected with the League to discontinue all such meetings, and to abstain from giving further countenance to it.

All the powers and resources at the Government's command, the proclamation says, will be employed to protect the Queen's subjects in the free exercise of their lawful callings and occupations; to enforce the fulfilment of all lawful obligations; and to save the process of law and the execution of the Queen's writs from hindrance or obstruction. It calls upon all loyal subjects to uphold and maintain the authority of the law and the supremacy of the Queen in Ireland.

At the meeting of the Land League's Dublin office of the Government's proclamation, a hurried council was held. The books and documents were secured, and letters from the country were destroyed. Many books and papers were carted to a place of safety. The lights were extinguished and the doors were locked. Executive officers of the Land League, fearing arrest, having no stock of note paper and envelopes.

Archbishop Croke has written a letter protesting against the manifesto of the Land League, which meets the approval of the clergy generally. The Dublin correspondent of the Times says: "Accounts from different parts of the country since the promulgation of the proclamation are not so favorable as the Land League satisfaction. There has been no disturbance of business, and the people are much relieved."

Preparations are making at Moscow for the coronation of Alexander the Third.

The Norve Fremde says: "It learns that an agreement exists between England and Russia, in which the former binds herself not to send agents to Merv, and the latter not to send agents to Afghanistan. The anniversary of the annexation of Siberia to the Czar's empire will soon be celebrated at Irkutsk and in other cities of Asiatic Russia. A volume will be published describing the immense progress which the country has made since the annexation one section of it being the province of the Polish exiles, of whom it is estimated that within the past generation upward of 100,000 have gone into the country."

It is reported from the interior of British Columbia that not one-fourth of the crops there will be saved, the wheat and barley being blown from their stands by the season's breeze. The most inclement known since the settlement of the country by the whites.

Colonel Mercer's recent exploring party on the Spanish river, in Ontario, are said to have discovered vast pine forests containing more than 24,000,000 feet of superior lumber, with good facilities for its conveyance to market.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting will be held in the Committee room of Arch Street Meeting-house, on Fourth-day, Eleventh month 2d, at 8 o'clock P. M.

Those desiring to be present are invited to attend. E. SMITH, Secretary.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

An adjourned Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee room, Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Fifth-day, Eleventh month 17th, 1881, at 3 o'clock P. M. EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary.

WESTYOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

THE WINTER TERM commences on Second-day, 10th month 31st, 1881. Pupils who have been regularly entered and who go by the cars from Philadelphia, can obtain tickets at the depot of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad, corner of Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, by giving their names to the Ticket-agent there, or is furnished with a list of the pupils for the purpose. In such case the passage, including the stage fare from the Railroad Station, will be charged at the School, to be paid for with the other incidental charge at the close of the term. Tickets can also be procured of the Treasurer, Goddard Street.

On Second-day, 11th month 1st, 1881, the Second and Third days, 10th mo. 31st, and 11th mo. 1st, to meet the train that leave Philadelphia at 7.30, 9.30 and 11.15 A. M. and 2.30 and 5 P. M.

THE UNION TRANSFER COMPANY will send its BAGGAGE to any place in the built-up part of Philadelphia, service is left there at No. 538 Chestnut St., or the South East corner of Broad and Chestnut Sts., or a Market St. Ferry, (north side), and will deliver it at the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad depot at charge of 25 cents per trunk, to be paid either when the order is given or when the trunk is called for. For the deposit on the arrival of the cars, baggage from any of the other railroad depots, if the railroad checks held for and baggage are left at one of the offices of the Transfer Company above designated, or are delivered to an agent of that Company, who will usually either pass through the train as it approaches the city, or will be found at the depot on the arrival of the train; but passengers by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad should retain their checks and leave them at 833 Chestnut or Broad and Chestnut. In all cases it must be stated that the baggage is to go to Westtown Boarding School by way of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad.

Persons having baggage sent by the Union Transfer Company, will not require any attention from the owner either at the 31st and Chestnut St. depot or the Street Road Station, but will be forwarded direct to the School; but the card receipts given by the Transfer Company should be left with the Baggage-master at the 31st and Chestnut St. depot.

DURING THE SESSION, passengers for the School will be met at the Street Road Station, on the arrival of the first train from the City, every day except First-days and small packages for the pupils, if left at Friends' Book Store, No. 304 Arch street, will be forwarded direct to the School at 12 o'clock on Tuesday and Saturday in the Twelfth month, and the expense charged in their bills.

Tenth month 17th, 1881.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 5, 1881.

NO. 13.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

Notes of Travel.

For "The Friend."

A series of visits through some of the counties of Pennsylvania, lying within the limits of Exeter and Monsey Monthly Meetings, has induced the writer to a section of country much of which he had never before visited. Presented to him many points of interest, arising from the features of the country itself, from the personal feelings awakened towards its inhabitants, and the historical reminiscences of meetings and of individuals who formerly lived in the places visited.

The traveller by the Reading railroad from Philadelphia, passes up the narrow, but beautiful valley of the Schuylkill River, by an most constant succession of towns and villages, ironworks and other manufacturing establishments, whose motive power is partly derived from the falling waters of the river, and partly from the coal so abundantly mined in the mountains drained by its upper tributaries.

About fifty miles from Philadelphia, he sees a conspicuous and somewhat isolated eminence, of considerable height, lying to the east of the river, and known as Monocacy Hill. This is a protrusion of trap rock, pushed through the red shale district of Berks county; and a few miles beyond it is Exeter meeting-house, where the Monthly Meeting of the same name is still held. This is formerly the most distant of our Monthly Meetings towards the north-west. As the progress of the settlements extended, and the more adventurous of those seeking homes penetrated to the valleys beyond the Blue Ridge, and among the mountain ranges lying between it and the Alleghenies, this became the parent Monthly Meeting of several others; and meetings of Friends were gradually established in Matamoras, Roaring Creek, Fishing Creek, and other places, and in the Alleghenies.

Exeter Monthly Meeting is composed of several meetings, none of them large; and of these that at Reading is under the care of a committee of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. Few are the members of that Monthly Meeting, an important service rests upon them upholding the testimony of our Society to the spiritual nature of true religion, as well as to the Divinity and Atonement of the Redeemer—both of which are needed in that region. I believe they are in measure sensible of the weight of this responsibility, and that they exercise an influence for good in the community.

When travelling among the hills of Berks county, in the freshness of the early summer, the different shades of the verdure which clothed their sides and the valleys lying between, were very delightful; and they have left an impression of beauty on my mind which is not surpassed by scenes of greater extent and grandeur. The soil in the red shale is only moderately fertile; but it becomes very productive when we get into the all-sorts-of-rock; which is the name given to a curious conglomerate of stones of different shades of color cemented together, and consisting principally of limestone. The land is excellent also in the Oley Valley and in that through which the waters of Maiden Creek flow.

The object of my visit was to accompany a Friend whose mind had been brought under religious exercise for the people at large. In pursuance of this concern public meetings were held in many places, in some of which the goodness of our Heavenly Father was manifested in favoring those assembled with a covering of holy solemnity, under which a feeling of mutual love was experienced, and I believe desires were awakened for the spread of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the earth. Advantage was taken of the opportunities which presented for the circulation of many religious books and tracts. Nearly 5000 of the latter were distributed, mostly being given at the close of the public meetings to those who were in attendance.

A large portion of the population was of German descent; and among these, the German Reformed and Lutheran denominations were most prevalent. Those people are not much given to change in religious profession or in other things. One of the German Friends of Elklands Meeting told us, that at one time in Philadelphia he called on a relative who kept a boarding or eating-house. On passing through the room where several of his countrymen were seated, they gazed on him with much interest; and when he had gone to an inner apartment conversed among themselves about how strange it was that a German should become a Quaker! When we came to Elklands, we found that this Friend was not a solitary instance of conviction of our principles; for there were among the members of that meeting several natives of Germany who had been drawn to join with them in membership.

During the course of this visit, I was repeatedly impressed with the practical and well-balanced character of the views entertained by our beloved Society on the great subject of man's salvation. Though man, through disobedience to the Divine command, early lost the state of innocence in which he was created, and the thoughts and imaginations of his heart became evil; yet his meriful Creator promised him a Deliverer who should restore him into the Divine harmony.

Our Saviour came to redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people; to bring us from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God. He effects these gracious purposes through his own eternal Spirit, which shines into the heart of man showing him his true condition. For the apostle John declares of the Word which was in the beginning, and by which all things were made, which was made flesh and dwelt among men,—that the life which was in Him was the light of men; "that was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." As man is obedient to the directions of this light or Spirit of Christ, and joins himself to it, it leads him to true repentance, and gives him power to forsake his sins. This he could by no means do of himself; for the human heart is deceitful and wicked, and there is no natural power inherent in it which can lead it to forsake the corrupt pleasures in which it has delighted. It is the Grace of God that bringeth salvation. This grace is but another name for the Light or Spirit of Christ; and it hath appeared unto all men, teaching them that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. Those who faithfully follow it, and patiently endure condemnation for the sins they have committed, will be delivered from the government of the Evil One, and made subjects of Christ. Their past sins will be forgiven, being remitted for the sake of the offering on Calvary. It is those who walk in the Light, that know the blood of the Redeemer to cleanse them from sin.

The forgiveness of our sins is through Christ. He was wounded for our transgressions, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him. He suffered for our sins, and that He might procure for us the gift of the Holy Spirit, which is to lead us in the way of salvation. He told his disciples, "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send Him unto you."

The inseparable connection between obedience and forgiveness, on which George Fox so strongly insisted, that he declared that sanctification and justification were one experience; needs to be still held up to the view of those who are in danger of placing their hopes of salvation on a profession of Christianity and the observance of what are termed the ordinances, combined with a decent morality. For all these may exist, where the individual has never known that thorough change in the will and affections which we cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven.

The same doctrine may profitably be heeded by those who neglect the exhortation of the apostle—to work out their salvation with fear and trembling—and who hope that the merits and sufferings of the Redeemer will secure their future happiness, although they refuse to submit to the requirements and baptisms of his Spirit. For into the holy city, the New Jerusalem, nothing that is impure can ever enter.

The local history of Berks county states that Friends were among the earliest settlers within its limits; some of them having taken up land in Oley valley about the year 1704. The name of Lee occurs among those who first moved into that neighborhood; and it is still borne by members of our Society residing in that vicinity.

Some of the French Huguenots also found a home there in very early times; and we were kindly treated by some of the Berletoles and De Turcks who were descended from them. To one of the latter we felt much indebted, for though strangers (save that he was present at an evening meeting at Baumtown) he piloted us to his home about a mile distant after the meeting had ended, then hitching a horse or mule to a wagon, conveyed us several miles through the darkness to the house of a Friend, where we wished to lodge; and refused all pecuniary compensation, though it must have been near midnight before his day's labors were ended. We would gladly have accepted his kind invitation to lodge at his house that night, had it not been that the next day's work involved the holding of three public meetings and riding nearly thirty miles in a heated atmosphere, over roads rendered dusty by the drought; and it seemed needful to be ready for an early start. J. W.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Joseph Barker.

Joseph Barker, who lived in Omaha in 1875, was a man of powerful intellect, and a distinguished orator, and had been until within the last five years of his life, a bold and active advocate of infidelity.

After his conversion he labored with the utmost energy to counteract the influence for evil he had exerted. His excessive labors broke down his strong constitution and caused his death.

His son said of him: "He was constantly in receipt of letters from infidels in this and other countries, complaining that he had led them into infidelity and now he had forsaken them. These letters he always endeavored to answer, rising early and sitting up late, trying to undo the mischief he had done. He said that what first opened his eyes and led him to consider the whole question anew, was the gross immorality and licentiousness which so often characterized the lives of infidels. He said he had never known an infidel, that hated the Bible, who was not an immoral man."

The following is his own language: "Carried away, as by a tempest, from my early faith, I wandered for years in the dreary regions of doubt and unbelief. 'I looked for light, and behold darkness.' I sought rest, and found disquietude. And the farther I went the worse I fared, and the longer I remained in those dismal shades, the more wretched I became. I found myself at length face to face with utter darkness and eternal death. God, in his mercy, rescued me from that awful state, and brought me back to Christ. And here I am, happy in the light of his truth, and in the assurance of his love. I praise the Bible and I love Christ and Christianity more than ever, my hatred and horror of infidelity are greater than ever. I know it to be the extreme of madness and misery—the utter degradation and ruin of man's soul."

For "The Friend."

Due Moderation in the Pursuit of Learning, Fortified by Christian Humility.

Was the ballast of religious restraint and moderation ever more needed, than in such an epoch as the present, when the natural tendencies of the mind and heart toward the admired attainments of academical honors so greatly prevail? The writer values intellectual acquisitions, when they are kept within the bounds of Christian restraint, and not suffered to trench on the higher prerogative of due devotion of heart and affections to Him who made, and Him who ransomed man. He believes that the only safe soil in which human learning, now so extensively extolled and sought, can safely flourish and witness preservation from the exaltation and self-dependence which it is too apt to produce, is Christian humility. Is there not continual need of the antidote or correcting leaven of Christian life and principle, to keep in true moderation respecting it in a day when so much literary sail is hoisted and called into lively exercise? Is there not danger of inflation, and of the boasted march of intellect erecting talents and learning into idols? and is literary vanity any less a vanity because of its honorable prestige? Is there not danger that the inculcation of piety and virtue, as a seminal principle, will be too much overlooked if not disregarded amid the siege which popular applause is laying in the direction of much learning? And does not the one sure corrective against this, as against any other too absorbing worldly pursuit, lie in the worthy aim of seeking to fortify the heart with that precious obedience to, and love of Christ, which teaches to hold every thing in filial subservience to Him and his will? Most true it is, that human learning—valuable as it may be when kept in due subordination—is but as seeking for the smoother pebbles on the shore of the great ocean of Truth, unless that Truth itself be kept superlatively in view as the one thing needful. There may be "goodly pearls," of temporal value, worthy of being sought; but, at the same time, it is the "pearl of great price" which should not be eclipsed, but keep its due place in the noble ambition of the soul—first in time as it is first in value. Without this, however accomplished in the literature of the schools, we shall be as clouds without water. For the right knowledge of Jesus—that which makes wiser by rendering us better—is the all important knowledge, because it maketh wise unto salvation.

"When first the college rolls receive his name," the prize and prospect of academical honors, with, in too many cases, a name among men, cause many worthy youth to rise early and take late rest; to overtax their mental and physical powers, in order to obtain that, which after all—"when learning her last prize bestows"—is but "a corruptible crown." This acquisition, while dearly bought, may be useful—having respect both to this life and that which is to come—if sanctified and dedicated to the dear Saviour's use. But to those who trust in it, without seeking a better guidance, even that Wisdom which is profitable to direct unto every good word and work, it may and perhaps too frequently does puff up; lead to a dependence upon itself; tends to exalt reason above revelation; to set the creature the moth, above the Creator, the Omnipotent and finally, without great watchfulness, almost imperceptibly lands the bewildered victim into the mazes of error or not into the labyrinths of materialism.

As we trust will be observed, it is not mean by these remarks to decry, in wholesale human learning; neither to convey that above results are always followed by such sad sequel; but only to point out some of the dangers and whirlpools that may attend the too great pursuit of even a good thing when sought in moderation, thus causing it to become an idol to us. The conclusion of the whole matter seems to lie in the danger of suffering any cherished object to divert the attention from that daily "watching unto prayer" which so becomes, whether younger or older such weak, frail, and wholly dependent creatures as we are, that so soon may be cut off. We can have no excuse, at whatever age or however sudden and unexpected the summons be sounded, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him." May it prove through obedience to the grace that is given unto us, but the joyful entrance upon a life eternal, where the learned and the unlearned—the occupier of the five talents, the two, or the one—will alike have nothing to depend upon but the mercy and forgiveness of a Law giver and Judge who has said, that "Many that are first (in the world's honors and accomplishments) shall be last; and the last first."

What the writer would crave for the youthful aspirants of the present day is, that every one of this highly interesting class of community, might lay fast hold of the only Hanc which can safely guide through the vicissitudes and temptations of this fleeting, ever changing scene; preserve from placing the affections too much upon any mundane thing—even the renown that human learning and human eloquence give; and lead into a more intimate acquaintance and a closer walk with Him, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Thus enlightened by a Saviour's grace, and taught meekness and humility of heart in his school, they will realize a learning unlearned before; as also the fulfillment of the poet's promise—

"Acquaint thyself with God, if thou would'st taste His works. Admitted once to His embrace, Thou shalt perceive that thou wast blind before:
Thine eye shall be instructed; and thine heart,
Made pure, shall relish with divine delight,
Thill then unfehl, what hands divine have wrought."

The following, from the pen of Joseph Phipps, will form an instructive conclusion to these remarks: "What is cautioned against is the setting up human reason above its due place in religion, making it the leader instead of the follower of revelation, the teacher in stead of the learner; and esteeming it vested with a kind of self-sufficiency, independent of the direction and help of God's Holy Spirit."

"We are not required to lay aside our understandings, either in order to receive or act under the influence of the Spirit; but, as prudent and docile scholars, to submit them to the necessary instruction and improvement of that infallible Master of infinite wisdom and knowledge, who is the universal teacher of his people: Isai. liv. 13; that we may be nabled rightly to obey and worship Him with the spirit and with the understanding also. The Spirit of God and a right understanding must infallibly concur."

For "The Friend."

Disease as the Result of Unrestrained Passions.

In one of his lectures, Dr. B. W. Richardson points out the close connection between the workings of religion and of science, as regards the unrestrained indulgence of human passions and desires. That such indulgence leads to spiritual death is clearly stated in the words of our Saviour and his apostles; Dr. Richardson affirms that "it leads as surely to physical destruction of life as to moral degradation."

The manner in which this result is produced is thus explained and illustrated.

The nervous centres that are excited or analysed in the periods of rage, fear, undue excess of desire, hate, &c., are not the centres of the reasoning faculties, but are a distinct organic chain of nervous matter common to all animals that possess a semblance of a nervous system. They connect with, and are to a large extent controllable by the higher nervous centres, yet they are truly a separate system, impulsive, involuntary, and, if uncontrolled by the exercise of the reasoning centres, wild and dangerous. As animal centres, they are necessary and essential for the animal wants; for the building up of the organism, for the reproduction of the organism in the form of offspring, for the protection of offspring, for the protection and vindication of self, and yet dangerous if so excited as to exert supreme sway, and to make the man the equal companion of the lower class of animal being.

These nervous centres govern the action of the heart, lungs and other organs which are under the direct control of the will. When their power is impaired through over-excitation or other causes, the organs under their control do not perform their functions properly, and disease is induced. Of this, the following illustration is given:

"There is a peculiar form of disease of the circulation, a nervous derangement of the art, in the course of which the beating, or beating heart loses something of its natural force and tension. The heart beats and sitates; stops for a moment in its motion, and then, with confused impetus, goes on again. When you listen to such a heart, it is as if you were listening to a clock the ticking of which was several times in a minute interrupted, and which then went on again with a humming faint and uncertain tick. This many persons become a confirmed disease. It, what is more, it becomes a true hereditary disease. In its worse forms it renders man who suffer from it of uncertain mind and power. Their brain is not regularly and systematically filled with blood; their vessels are not at all times of equal tension. In the first instances, owing to the repeated induction of action, these sufferers are disposed to sudden impulses or to melancholy, and in the most instances even to suicide. We say these people that they are broken-hearted. Why? The answer is of singular interest.

"From a long and experimental study of this form of disease, I have ascertained that it is a permanent disease it is dependent entirely on paralysis or failure of those centres, those instinctive centres of nervous power, which govern the involuntary organs of animal life, including amongst the others, and most importantly of all, the pulsating heart. And yet another truth have I learned on this subject, namely, that whenever this diseased condition appears in the young or middle-aged as a confirmed condition of disease, and when it has not come down as an hereditary taint, it is induced solely by one cause,—the exercise and indulgence of the passions, or the excitement of emotion due to some accidental provocation. Violent anger, extreme ambition, fierce contest, sudden fear, intense hate, too ardent love, overwhelming grief,—these are the causes which lead to the intermittent circulation that promotes so many subsequent evils, and impairs, alike, the mental and physical usefulness of those who suffer from it. In the unusually large experience I have had of this condition, I have not met with an instance in which it was traceable to any other cause than the influence of the passions, except where it was of hereditary development."

Prejudice.

For "The Friend."

When a feeling of prejudice against another obtains a place in the mind it becomes an unceasing as well as very damaging inmate. It can see but little or no good in those towards whom the evil eye exists. One of its effects is, instead of such disaffected ones casting out "the beam" from the eye, as our Divine Lawgiver represents, it, on the contrary, magnifies "the mote" in a brother's eye. In short, it tends to exalt self, and proportionally to diminish our offending fellow in our view, even in cases where no wrong has been intended or committed. But where this feeling is indulged, what becomes of the graces of sweet humility and Christian charity?—that humility which the Saviour enjoins upon all to be "clothed with," and that charity which "suffereth long, and is kind;" "doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;" and without which, to "speak with the tongues of men and of angels," to "have the gift of prophecy," to "bestow all our goods to feed the poor," "profiteth nothing."

Such unreasonable prejudice formed against individuals without due examination, is a mischief that is very apt to manifest itself at boarding and other schools; though in these cases it is usually short-lived. But when the disposition to it is allowed to grow with our growth, and to take deep root in the adult mind, it becomes a foe to true harmony and that fellowship and unity which it is so desirable should be maintained as promotive of the health of the social and religious compact. Whoever are in danger of falling into this snare of prejudice or coldness toward others, should shun it as they would a nest of scorpions.

Does not the remedy or antidote against this bias of the mind lie, in deep Christian humility; a preferring others before ourselves; a simple dependence upon the everlasting Arm; with the earnest desire to be searched by Him who looketh on the heart? that thus the precious promise concerning Israel may be reproduced in our experience: "Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim." Nothing "shall hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord."

10th month, 1881.

Love better than Logic.

Have you ever pondered that dark mystery of human nature, the origin of the frightful idolatries of India? It seems to be proved that they have their beginning, not through development from some form of fetishism, baser and coarser still, but by degradation from the most refined and abstract speculations on the infinity, the spirituality, and the immutability of God: the fact is one that blocks the way of recent science in some of its most interesting tendencies. No subtler metaphysics is taught to-day in the lecture-rooms of Cambridge and New Haven than was taught long centuries ago by Hindoo sages, who enthroned their divinity in everlasting, impassive repose, far beyond the reach of affection, sympathy, or prayer, until the needy millions cried out, stifling, famishing, "Give us a God to love, to worship, to pray to!" and for lack of answer, betook them to the forest, or the quarry, or the mine, to the carver, and the smith, and made them gods that were no gods. So little can argument of philosophy hold us back, you and me, at such a time as this, when the stress of life comes down upon us, and the cravings of the soul grow strong!

I am bringing to the altar of God my offering,—my poor little offering of thankfulness and prayer. Here have I my little bundle of anxieties, cares, troubles,—it may be the concerns and anxieties of a nation, shuddering in fear and sorrow; it may be the distress and terror of some sorely afflicted little household; it may be the secret bitterness of some humble and contrite spirit,—in any case, a matter how infinitely small, when measured by the scale of immensity and eternity; but, oh, how great a thing to me! And there meets me, in the way, a philosopher. "And what, forsooth, have you there? Show it me, now." And I unroll before him my little bundle of griefs, of cares, of pangs, of sickness, of fears, of forebodings,—a handful of myrrh from a troubled heart, a sprig of frankincense from a grateful spirit. "And this, then, is what you would bring to lay before the Infinite, the Eternal, the Omnipotent, the Unchangeable God!" And each great title strikes my heart with discomfement and dread. "This is what you would bring to Him in prayer and deprecation! But do you not know that all this is part of a perfect system,—that it is all fixed by laws of nature, which no prayer can change or suspend, without upsetting the constitution of the universe? You would lay before God your wretched plight to move his pity. Tush! did He not know all this a hundred thousand years ago, ere ever the earth was? And I cannot gainsay him, and I will not cease to pray. But, by and by, the philosopher himself comes face to face with some of the overwhelming things in human life and human death. He hangs with tears and wringing of hands over some cradleful of childish anguish, and shrinks before what the laws of nature, the system of the universe, are doing,—so pitiless, so deaf to prayer, so blind to agony; and he turns away and cries, "My God, my God!" And his reason is not one whit the less true, because his love and faith are also true and strong. The awful wonder of God's unchangeable infinity abides; but out of cloud and darkness breaks forth, oh, what light of fatherly love!—Leonard W. Bacon.

For "The Friend."

"Vulgar Fractions" in Ohio.

Having observed in the last number of "The Friend" a statement of B. C. Hobbs, in his testimony in Indianapolis court, that Ohio Yearly Meeting had "run into vulgar fractions," I apprehend it to be the duty of some one to correct such statement by setting forth the facts in the ease, lest those unacquainted with the circumstances may thereby receive erroneous impressions relative to Ohio Yearly Meeting's true position and standing.

No separation has occurred in Ohio Yearly Meeting since those generally termed the "Binns Meeting" left it in 1854. It is not denied, however, that a few Friends withdrew from some of its subordinate branches in 1863, and for a time held separate meetings, and occasionally met in the capacity of what they termed General Meetings; but within a few of the more recent years, most of these have, through acceptable acknowledgments, returned to the respective Monthly Meetings of which they were formerly members; and consequently (to my knowledge) there is now no insubordinate meeting held, claiming the name of "Friends" within the limits of Ohio Yearly Meeting, except those of the Binns connection above alluded to. F.

Ohio, 10th mo. 21st, 1881.

Confidence and Safety.—"There are many persons who do not perceive the difference between feeling safe and being safe; or between confidence and safety. Men are often in the most danger when they feel the utmost sense of security. On the other hand, men may feel the utmost alarm, and yet be in perfect safety. There was a man who crossed the Mississippi river on the ice. Fearing that the ice might be thin or rotten, he began to crawl upon on his hands and knees, and so worked his way along in great anxiety and trepidation. Just as he gained the opposite shore, excited and exhausted, another man drove past him, on the trot, sitting upon a sled loaded with pig-iron. The poor fellow had his fear for nothing. The ice was firm, and he might have walked boldly over. Thousands of the doubts and fears which afflict the souls of good men are as vain as were the anxieties of this timorous man.

On the other hand, there are times when persons who feel the greatest confidence are really in the utmost danger. In the days of Noah and Lot men feared no danger, they felt no alarm, and yet they perished suddenly and miserably. So there may be persons to-day who are in danger, though they fear it not. There are others who are safe, though they can hardly believe it.

Seeking a Crown.—A French officer, a prisoner on his parole, met with a Bible, and was so struck with its contents that he was convinced of the folly of skepticism, and of the truth of Christianity. When his associates rallied him for taking so serious a turn he said:

"I have done no more than my old school-fellow, Bernadotte, who is become a Lutheran."

"Yes, but he became so," they answered, "to obtain a crown."

"My motive," said the officer, "is the same; we differ only as to place. The object of Bernadotte was to obtain a crown in Sweden; mine, to obtain a crown in heaven."

A Rich Hunt.—Some weeks ago Cornelius de Boer, a Volendam fisherman, was fishing for anchovies in the Zuyder Zee. On drawing in his nets, he found entangled in them a large stony mass covered with mussels. Had it been night-time he would have certainly thrown it overboard again. On inspection he found the mass was an aggregate of little heaps of coins, which examination proved to be mostly silver pieces, 450 in number. They were chiefly ducatoons; there were also a few Spanish and other gold pieces. They were all dated between 1660 and 1680. There were also in the petrified mass some small plates, some of them whole, some broken.

SECURE.

The winds blow hard. What then?
He holds them in the hollow of his hand;
The furious blasts will sink when his command
Bids them be calm again.

The night is dark. What then?
To Him the darkness is as bright as day;
At His command the shades will flee away,
And all be light again.

The wave is deep. What then?
For Israel's host the waters upright stood;
And He whose power controlled that raging flood
Still succors helpless men.

He knoweth all: the end
Is clear as the beginning to his eye;
Then walk in peace, secure, though storms roll by,
He knoweth all, O friend!

AUTUMN WOODS.

Ere in the northern gale,
The summer tresses of the trees are gone,
The woods of Autumn, all around our vale,
Have put their glory on.

The mountains that infold
In their wide sweep the colored landscape round,
Seem groups of giant kings, in purple and gold,
That guard the enchanted ground.

I roam the woods that crown
The upland, where the mingled splendors glow,
Where the gay company of trees look down
On the green fields below.

My steps are not alone
In these bright walks; the sweet southwest at play,
Flies rustling, where the painted leaves are strewn,
Along the winding way.

And far in heaven, the while,
The sun, that sends the gale to wander here,
Pours out on the fair earth his quiet smile,
The sweetest of the year.

Where now the solemn shade,
Verdure and gloom where many branches meet;
So grateful, when the noon of summer made
The valleys sick with heat?

Let in through all the trees
Come the strange rays; the forest-depths are bright;
Their sunny-colored foliage, in the breeze,
Twinkles like beams of light.

The rivulet, late unseen,
Where bickering through the shrubs its waters run,
Shines with the image of its golden screen,
And glimmerings of the sun.

Oh, Autumn! why so soon
Depart the hues that make thy forests glad;
Thy gentle wind and thy fair sunny noon,
And leave thee wild and sad!

Ah! twere a lot too blest
Forever in thy colored shades to stray;
Amidst the kisses of the soft southwest,
To rove and dream for aye;

And leave the vain low strife
That makes men mad—the tug for wealth and power,
The passions and the cares that wither life,
And waste its little hour.

Selected.

Selected.

—Bryant.

Selected.

THE HEAVENLY SCULPTOR.

"Thy hands have made me and fashioned me: give me understanding that I may learn thy commandments."—Psaln cxix. 73.

Shrink not from suffering. Each dear blow,
From which thy smitten spirit bleeds,
Is but a messenger to show
The renovation which it needs.

The earthly sculptor smites the rock;
And the relentless hammer rings;
And from the rude, unshapen block,
At length, imprisoned beauty brings.

Thou art that rude, unshapen stone;
And waitest, till the arm of strife
Shall make its crucifixions known,
And smite and carve thee into life.

The Heavenly Sculptor works in thee;
Be patient. Soon his arm of might,
Shall from thy prison's darkness free,
And change thee to a form of life.

—T. C. Upham.

Testimonies to the Truth.

Now, my friends, they that have believed are to wait to receive his power, according to the exhortation of our Lord Jesus Christ to his disciples, "Wait until you be endued with power from on high," Luke xlv. 49. Many people make a profession of belief in the Lord Jesus Christ, but do not come to know this mighty power to work sanctification, redemption and salvation. Let all any every one of you be concerned in waiting upon God, and attending upon Him, that you may receive strength, and power and ability from Him, whereby you may be enabled to perform your bounden duty which God requires of you. He hath shown unto man what is good, and what the Lord requires of him, which is to do justly and love mercy and to walk humbly with God. Let every one of us that have believed wait for power to perform that which may answer the requirements of God, that we may receive ability from Him to enable us to perform our duty that we may not only be professors of the blessed truth of God, but possessors of it that we may not only be professors, but possessors of Life, whereby we may live to God through Jesus Christ, and perform our duty acceptably to God.

It is a blessing to be found in that which gives acceptance with God. Now there is no acceptance with God but as we are found in Christ Jesus, in Him that was the promised seed, who God promised should break the serpent's head. The serpent beguile Eve through subtlety. Now God promise that the seed of the woman—that is Christ Jesus—should break the serpent's head. It is through Him that redemption and salvation are known; it is through Christ Jesus the Mediator between God and man, the man becomes reconciled to God, and no other wise. He tasted death for every man, and He died that He might destroy him that has the power of death, that is the devil. It is through Christ the mediator that we are reconciled to God, and for this, saith the apostle, was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil. Sin is all ages hath been the work of the devil, and the devil is the author of sin; but the Lord Jesus Christ, the Mediator, is the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him. So that whatsoever your profession may be of God, or of Christ, his servants ye are if whom ye obey; now consider whose servants on are, whether you are servants of sin, or ought by Christ Jesus, and redeemed from a miserable life, and from a vain conversation.

We cannot serve two masters, where there is such a contrariety, as light is to darkness;
we cannot serve them at one and the same time, there must be a cleaving to the one;
we that you cleave and join yourselves to that which is good, to that principle that God hath placed in your hearts, and this will save your souls, this will lead you to God.
Luke xiii. 21. The kingdom of God is like avenue, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened.
God hath given to every man a measure of grace that brings salvation. This grace hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying godliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; yet too many people have not had reverence to the grace of God given to them, but they trample upon it, and do despite to the virtue of grace; the grace of God in Christ Jesus is extended to all the children of men, without respect of persons; God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation, he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted of Him. Acts x. 34, 35.

Now, my friends, we cannot work righteously but by the ability and assistance of the grace of God; now this grace is from Christ Jesus. 1 John, xvii. For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Christ Jesus; that grace came by Christ that worketh sanctification. Now the law did not make the comers thereunto perfect, nor purge the conscience, but the bringing in of a better covenant did, by which we draw nigh to God.
There is no drawing nigh to God but through Christ Jesus, no redemption but through Him;
He is a complete Saviour; He doth not only cleanse in part, but He saith to the utter-most, all that come unto God by Him; He is a complete Saviour, He that hath begotten and desires in our souls, whereby we breathe after Him, and are raised to pant and desire that which is good; and as there is a drawing up to Him that hath begotten these desires in the soul, the Lord, in his good will, will answer these desires; see that ye be humble and meek minds, and lie low before Him, and wait on Him, and He will in the time perfect the work which He hath begun.

My Friends, I testify among you at this time, there is not a living desire in the soul to that which is good, but Christ is the Author of it.
He is the Author of eternal salvation to as many as obey Him. It is He that begun the work; He met with us by his power and spirit when we were strangers to God. For we, as well as others, were in the broad way, going on and in hand with a multitude to do evil, and did not seek God till He did first seek us; we did not desire the knowledge of his ways; we had raised desires in our souls; He met with us in the way of his judgments, causing terror to take hold of transgressors, so that we could not take delight in vanities and pleasures as we had done, because his terrors took hold of us, blessed be the name of the Lord. It was good for us that we were afflicted. Before we were afflicted we went astray, but now we have learned his righteous judgments. Judgements upon the unjust we have found to be very to the just. Blessed be the name of the Lord that did seek us out, that met with us, that put a stop to us in our way, that we could not delight in vanity as we had done.

The Lord brought us to a consideration of our ways and doings; He manifested to us, if I live and die in this way I am in, I am undone forever; I am miserable for ever if I do not know redemption and salvation of Jesus Christ. The Lord manifested to us, by the shining of his Divine Light in our hearts, that we were in the broad way that leads to destruction. We read of the narrow way that leads to life, and of the broad way that leads to destruction; we read of the narrow way, but we did not know ourselves to be in that way.
When we saw the broad way that leads to destruction, this began a breathing in our souls, and an earnest desire that we might know
the way that is pleasing to Him.

And there being many opinions in the world, many of us were hurried in our mind, and where we saw anything of sobriety and weightiness of spirit, we were willing to try them all, that we might know the mind of God. Friends, God raised a travail in our souls, and appeared farther to us; God that commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shined into our hearts; whereby a discovery was made of that which was good, and of that which was evil. This the Lord discovered to us, by the shining of his Divine Light and Grace in our inward parts, so that we need not look abroad; we retired inward, we saw that we had business enough at home; we saw that when we had grieved the good Spirit of God, we had trouble for it; and when we answered the breathings of the Spirit we had peace within us; so that we must distinguish between that which gave acceptance with God, and that whereby the Spirit of God was grieved from day to day.

Now, my Friends, we came under a travail;
God by his light and grace discovered to us his way, so that now we are come to a certainty of the way; Christ is the way to God, and if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature, he is born again, born of the Spirit. You should all of you be concerned, and consider what you know of a change wrought in you by the power of God, whether you have received virtue from Jesus to stop the bloody issue of sin. It is an easy thing to make a profession, and to call yourselves Christians;
but it is a weighty thing to be a Christian, to be so in reality, united unto God through Jesus Christ; to be a Christian, is to be a follower of Christ in the way of regeneration and self-denial; except a man be regenerate and born again, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. There are many people would go to God's kingdom when they die, but do not mind being prepared for it; many have been pleading for sin in their life, but would go to God's kingdom when they die; where must people be cleansed from sin, but on this side the grave? There is no repentance in the grave, nor no redemption out of hell.
This is the day of your visitation; God hath prepared means whereby we may be accepted of Him. Consider of it, the gate stands open that leads to the holy city; there is none can enter into God's kingdom in their dilemmas, their hearts must be purged, their minds purified, they must know the work of sanctification, if they will enter into God's kingdom.
Now the preparation of the heart, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord.

(To be continued.)

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

"A Thing to Cry Over."

A newer sensation can hardly be given to a European than New York waters afford on a bright day, with the great white ferry-boats, to which Europe has no parallel, on their several tracks, the pert little tugs darting through among them, and screaming every now and then like impudent boys in a crowd, while the dignified ocean steamers hold the middle of the stream or repose at their wharves on either shore. Liverpool docks are greater, but for variety and vivacity New York within
"The Narrows" is unique.

I was taking in a part of this most animating scene from the end of a river-barge when my attention was drawn to a well-dressed young man, reeling in his gait, loose in his speech, and all unwittingly making himself disgracefully ridiculous. He was tipsy, and many of the passengers were heartlessly enjoying his wretched follies. Beside me stood a man in middle life, of decent, but not fashionable dress or address, looking at the spectacle with such sad and pitying eyes that he could not escape notice.

"They should hardly laugh at the poor fellow," I ventured.

"It is a thing to cry over," he said, with inexpressible feeling. "If the silly youth had been his son he could not have put more emotion into his simple words."

A few sentences were exchanged. His accent soon satisfied me that my companion was a north of Ireland man, at least by birth, and a religious man; and as we were going up the Hudson together it was natural to ask and answer questions, to identify places and people known to both of us, and to feel interest in a countryman met in another land.

The exhibition which had led to our introduction had turned his thoughts to his own past in a way that spoiled the pleasure of his trip. In vain I pointed out the places as they came in view; named to him the points of interest in the receding city; drew his attention to the Palisades walling up the river's western bank for a score of miles, the rich-colored wood covering the debris which ages had brought down to the base of the long precipices. Handsome villas, with sloping green terraces dividing them from the eastern bank, bright and busy towns on either side, the Nyack creeping in at a branch in the great wall, as if Rockland county, with its waters and pastures, wanted to get one peep at the noble Hudson, and the free expanse of Tappansee, where the stream widens among its hills into the loveliest of lakes—all these appealed to him in vain. The scenes of his own life, vividly recalled, banished the loveliness from his view. In spite of my reluctance to draw out what was personal and obviously painful, he went on bit by bit, as if it were a relief to him to tell me what made the poor tipsy simpleton to him "a thing to cry over."

He was born and bred—I use almost his language—on a farm in Ulster, Ireland, of that class which, while its members are but tenants, have held by a tenure so secure that they feel as independent as freeholders. He had little taste for farming; disliked the irksomeness of work and of watching little things; and this he saw was the only way to live on a farm. If it were not that the families generally did the work within themselves, and worked hard at that, they could not live.

He married a wife, a nice girl, who had served her time in — to a dressmaker, and who shared his feeling, and they set up a little business. It was in the market town close by his own place.

"My people," said he, "were respectable, and I got credit to start with; but I did not know the ways of the trade. My old neighbors used to drop in, and my wife and myself wished to be kindly, and we had a deal of treating, and this cost money, and we soon ran behind in rent, in our bills, in every way."

"I could not bear to go down there, and we managed to sell out, pay part, and promise the rest, for our creditors knew who we were, and we moved to Glasgow. Were you ever in Glasgow?"

"Yes," said I, "I know Glasgow very well." "Then you know how many mills and works and shops it has, and how crowded the people are together. You may think the change it was to us to go into two rooms in the High street — you may mind the High street — and have nothing but these to ourselves. But necessity has no law. I got work, and we paid a little of our debt, and I was getting a rise in wages, and we had two nice children. They have in Glasgow what they call the Fair every July; for a week little work is done, pleasure is the only thing; and oh! it is too often pleasure like that poor fellow's drinking — men and women, aye, and children. Why, I have seen men and women in the broad daylight lying dead drunk on Glasgow Green, and nobody seeming to mind it. Somebody had to stay at the works this week, and I was glad to earn the money. At six I came home, meaning to take Bessie, that was her name, a walk; but when I came home she was out, and the two children were by themselves and crying dreadfully. I did the best I could, put them in bed, and went to look for Bessie. I found her under the — I found her — like that man, only worse. She did not know me — could not speak. The women with her were drunk, too."

"If somebody had run a knife into me it could not have been so bad. Then I found from the publican that it was not the first time. I had bills to pay, and it was not the last. I used to take a drink myself — not to be drunk — but this stopped me. I never tasted it again; please God, I never will."

"From that on it grew worse — money bought little or nothing, it seemed. I had no heart to work, no heart to come home, no heart to look at the children; but I earned and tried hard with Bessie. I got a minister to come, got her promise against it, got her clothes to go out, but it was no use; if she was doing better awhile, one of these drinking times, when everybody seemed to go that way, would come, and things would be as bad as ever."

Then I thought if I left the place and came to America it would be better, and she promised me it would. I saved the money. I sold my watch, and we came. It was useless. It seemed as if she had become another woman. Her natural affection left her. She would take the children's clothes and sell them for drink. It made her mad, and it killed her. We had a little boy, our baby, and she was found dead, when I was at work, with the child — we called him Thomas, for my father — sitting on the floor by her, trying to waken her."

He took longer to tell this than I have done, for he could not keep back the tears.

I expressed my sympathy with him.

"Thank you, sir," he said, "that's years ago, but I can't forget it yet. Only there's one thing, I never said a hard word to Bessie, thank God; I never did," said he, and I could well believe it, as I looked at the honest face. "But oh! when I think of her going before her Maker in that way!" he added, with flowing tears.

"Well, I hope," I said, "the children will be a comfort to you."

There was a long pause before he spoke, and then it was with so much evident pain that I regretted my words.

"One," said he, "the second, is; she is a good child. The oldest is not steady; I can do nothing with her, and my boy, the little boy I told you about, can't be kept from drink. That's my trouble now. I gave up the place I had in Jersey, and I am going out to Ohio, to a town where I am told liquor is not to be had, to try and save him. It breaks my heart a second time, and I can't altogether blame him, for at the time I took some, and his mother took too much, and it looks as if it was put into his very nature, that he couldn't help it. Oh, sir," said he, turning to me directly, and becoming eloquent in his vehement feeling, "fathers and mothers ought to be told that when they are drinking they are putting the feeling into their children that will ruin them; they will be scourged with the whip they made themselves."

We parted with some words of hope to him, some entreaty that he would not even yet lose heart, but believe in the Saviour from sin, direct his children to Him, and get strength from Him. If he sees this page he will know that I am trying to act on his honest, true words. Oh! that they could be put into the ear and heart of men and women in Ireland, in Scotland, where a "Glasgow Fair" is a national disgrace, in England, in America. — John Hall in the Episcopal Recorder.

When the children of Israel were taken to Babylon, though it was the finest city in the world, fifteen miles across, adorned with its hanging gardens, its palaces, its temple of Belus, its orchards, its walks, and filled with luxury, all that could attract the eye or please the taste; yet they hanged their harps upon the willows, and could not sing the Lord's song in a strange land. But we find, that when in the fiery furnace the three children were walking in the midst of the flame, and the fourth, like unto the Son of God, was with them, then they sang a song of rejoicing, which has been preserved for the instruction of the Church in all ages. Thus it is with us. Our Lord was made perfect through suffering; it tracked his every footstep. As with the Master, so with the servant. He forewarns us that tribulation is the path to his kingdom, the experience of his children confirms the same. Let us not faint, then, nor be weary. He walks with us, as with the holy children in the furnace; we will join them in their song of thanksgiving. — M. A. Schimmelpennick.

"There is no greater mistake," said Dr. Bushnell, "than to suppose that Christians can impress the world by agreeing with it. No, it is not conformity we want; it is not being able to beat the world in its own way; but it is to stand apart and above it, and to produce the impression of a holy and separate life. This only can give us a true Christian power."

Religious Items, &c.

The Future of Islam.—The political and religious connection of Morocco with the Sudan is a very close one, and, whatever may be the future of the Mediterranean province fronting the Spanish coast, it cannot be doubted that the Moorish form of Mohammedanism will be perpetuated in Central Africa. It is there, indeed, that Islam has the best certainty of expansion and the fairest field for a propagation of its creed. Statistics, if that could be obtained, would, I am convinced, show an immense Mohammedan progress with in the last hundred years among the negro races. The Christian missionary makes his way slowly in Africa. He has no true brotherhood to offer the negro except in another life. He makes no appeal to a present sense of dignity in the man he would convert. What Christian missionary takes a negro to wife or sits with the negro wholly as an equal a meat? Their relations remain at best those of teacher with taught, master with servant grown man with child. The Mohammedan missionary from Morocco meanwhile stand on a different footing. He says to the negro "Come up and sit beside me. Give me your daughter and take mine. All who pronounce the formula of Islam are equal in this world and in the next." In becoming a Mussulman even a slave acquires immediate dignity. This is a bribe in the hand of the preacher of the Koran, and one which has never appealed vain to the enslaved races of the world. Central Africa is already said to count 10,000,000 Moslems. — The Fortnightly Review.

Transfer of Denomination.—The Moravia congregation which met in the building the corner of Twelfth and Oxford streets, Philadelphia, has gone over to the Reformed Episcopal fellowship. Some dissatisfaction had existed with the subordination to the General Synod of the Moravians which meet once in ten years in Germany, and to the Provincial Elders' Conference at Bethlehem Pa. The meeting-house was erected almost entirely by funds supplied by the wife of the pastor, and the Conference required the title to be made over to them, which the trustee refused.

Religious Equality in China.—The National Baptist states that formerly Chinese convert to Christianity were compelled to pay tax for the support of idol-worship, repairing the temples, &c. In 1862, the French Minister obtained an order exempting "the professor of the Roman Catholic religion from giving anything toward receiving the gods, idols, troop processions, theatrical performances, incense offerings, and such like things."

This exemption did not extend to Protestants. Last year the subject was brought to the notice of James B. Angell, (President of the University of Michigan) United States Commissioner to China. He appealed to the Chinese government, and as the result, this exemption is now made to apply to Protestants as well as Romanists.

In the treaty negotiated with China by the Commission, one of the stipulations is, that any American vessel carrying opium into the Empire shall be forfeited to the Chinese government.

Clifton Springs Sanitarium.—Dr. Foster, the proprietor of this establishment, has executed a deed conveying it and the rest of his estate to a board of trustees representing different religious denominations. The object of the nation which is valued at several hundred thousand dollars, is the gratuitous treatment of diseases of missionaries and ministers and their families, and teachers. The doctor reserves the use of a dwelling during life for himself and wife, and the right to draw an amount, not exceeding $1000 per annum, from the income of the estate, for his own support. A singular religious frenzy has broken out in Nicaragua. The people affected believe themselves the recipients of Divine communications. Whenever a person feels the inspiration of a "communication," he rushes to the meeting-house and rings the bell, when the whole population assembles to hear the message from on high.

Natural History, Science, &c.

For "The Friend,"

Importance of Pure Air.—The surest of all prophylactics is active exercise in the open air. Air is a part of our daily food, and by the most important part. A man can live seven meals a week, and survive the warm summer day with seven draughts of fresh water, but his supply of gaseous nourishment is to be renewed at least fourteen thousand times in twenty-four hours. Every breath drawn is a draught of fresh oxygen, every expiration of breath is an evacuation of gaseous excrements.

The purity of our blood depends chiefly on the purity of the air we breathe, for in the respiratory of the lungs the atmospheric air is brought into contact at each respiration with the fluids of the venous and arterial systems, which absorb it and circulate it through the whole body; in other words, if man breathes the vitiated atmosphere of a room all day, and of a close bed-room all night, his life-blood is tainted fourteen thousand times in the course of the twenty-four hours with foul vapors, dust and noxious exhalations. We need not wonder, then, that ventilated dwellings aggravate the evils so many diseases, or that pure air should almost a panacea.

Hunters and herders, who breathe the pure air of South American paupers, subsist for years on a diet which would endanger the life of a city dweller in a single month. It has been repeatedly observed that individuals who attained to an extreme old age were generally poor peasants whose avocations required daily labor in the open air, though their habits differed in almost every other respect; also that the average duration of life various countries of the Old World depends so much on climatic peculiarities or their respective degree of culture as on the chief occupations of inhabitants; the starved Hindoos outlive the well-fed Parsee merchant, the unkempt Bulgarian enjoys an average longevity of forty-two years to the Western citizen's thirty-five.—Pop. Science Monthly.

Microscopic Investigations.—Duter, a German scientist, has vividly demonstrated to the eye the circulation of the blood in the human body. The patient's head was fixed in a frame which supported a lamp and a microscope. The lower lip was fastened to the face of the microscope by elips, the inner face being uppermost; a strong light and microscope were brought to bear on the face of the lip, and the wonderful procession of the blood corpuscles through the minute capillaries plainly seen, the colorless corpuscles appearing like white specks dotting the red stream.

Artificial Amber.—According to the Chronique Industrielle, considerable quantities of beautiful objects of artificial amber are now being produced in Vienna, and sold as of real amber. The substance employed is chiefly colophony, or resin obtained by decomposition of turpentine, though several other ingredients are used to give it the requisite qualities. The imitation is so perfect that the product has the electric properties of true amber. Ingenious manufacturers have even introduced into the substance foreign bodies, insects, &c., to make similarity more striking. Natural amber requires a temperature of 255° to 287° C. to fuse it, while the imitation becomes liquid at a much lower temperature. Also, true amber is attacked but slightly by ether or alcohol, and only after a long time, whereas the other loses its profile on contact with these liquids, and becomes rapidly soft.

Household Perils.—Under this head the Boston Journal of Chemistry names several dangerous substances which find their way into households. There are two or three volatile liquids used in families which are particularly dangerous, and must be employed, if at all, with special care.

Benzine, ether and strong ammonia constitute this class of agents. The two first-named liquids are employed in cleansing gloves and other wearing apparel, and in removing oil stains from carpets, curtains, &c. The liquids are highly volatile, and flash into vapor as soon as the cork of the vial containing them is removed. Their vapors are very combustible, and will inflame at long distances from ignited candles or gas flames, and consequently they should never be used in the evening when the house is lighted.

Explosions of a very dangerous nature will occur if the vapor of these liquids is permitted to escape into the room in considerable quantity. In view of the great hazard of handling these liquids cautious housekeepers will not allow them to be brought into their dwellings, and this course is commendable.

As regards ammonia, or water of ammonia, it is a very powerful agent, especially the stronger kinds sold by druggists. An accident in its use has recently come under our notice, in which a young lady lost her life from taking a few drops through mistake.

Breathing the gas under certain circumstances causes serious harm to the lungs and membranes of the mouth and nose. It is an agent much used at the present time for cleansing purposes, and it is unobjectionable if proper care is used in its employment. The vials holding it should be kept apart from others containing medicines, &c., and rubber stoppers to the vials should be used.

Oxalic acid is considerably employed in families for cleansing brass and copper utensils. This substance is highly poisonous, and must be kept and used with great caution. In crystalline structure it closely resembles sulphate of magnesia or Epsom salts, and therefore frequent mistakes are made and lives lost.

Every agent which goes into families among inexperienced persons should be kept in a safe place, labeled properly, and used with care.

✦
If heaven is lost, all is lost.

The Power of Mothers.—I was in the company of a talented Christian lady when a friend said to her, "Why have you never written a book?"

"I am writing two," was the quiet reply. "Have been engaged on one for ten years, the other five."

"You surprise me," cried the friend. "What profound works they must be!"

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be," was her reply; "but when He makes up his jewels my great ambition is to find them there."

"Your children?" I said.

"Yes, my two children; they are my life work."

I rejoiced to hear this Christian mother's outspoken words of love and faith, and said in my heart, if all mothers builded over against their own house in this manner what would there be for reformers?—Congregationalist.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 5, 1881.

We received a few days since a letter from one who has become convinced of the truth of the principles held by Friends, chiefly by the perusal of the writings of its earlier members. The doctrines and practices to which those writings bear testimony agreed with the teachings of the Spirit in his own heart; and he felt himself in unity with the people who held the same views and were led in the same path as our worthy predecessors in religious profession. Living in a situation where no Friends reside, he has had but little opportunity of personal intercourse with any under our name.

It is interesting to notice the effect produced on the mind of such an one, uninfluenced by any of the prejudices or prepossessions which are apt to grow up where doctrinal controversy exists, when made acquainted with the diversity of views and practices which are to be found in our borders. It is, perhaps, the nearest approach we can have to the judgment which would be given on the matters at issue by George Fox, Robert Barclay, and other authors of that period, whose writings have in measure moulded his opinions, if it were possible now to appeal to those ancient worthies.

The letter of our correspondent may help to show some how their actions affect the minds of others.

My attention has been rather forcibly drawn to the strange position occupied by the "progressive or modern Quakers," by receiving a few days ago a copy of the Friends' Review, containing an account of a meeting held in the State of Indiana during Ninth month, and called Indiana Yearly Meeting. This article, which had been marked for my especial attention, together with "Western Friends in Court" now appearing in "The Friend," have not failed to leave their impression on my heart. To one who has so recently become convinced of the truth as held by Friends—truth as held, taught and practised by Fox, Penn, Barclay, and all the early Friends—it seems strange, almost unaccountably strange, that people who have so little in common with those Friends who first united to form a religious Society, should still adhere to the name. My knowledge of Friends, as thou art aware, has been derived almost entirely from reading their standard writings; but from the knowledge thus obtained it appears to me that any unprejudiced mind must see that the Reformed Friends, as some love to style them, have sadly departed from some of the very foundation principles of their fathers. Should an article appear in "The Friend" professing to give an account of a meeting among the early Friends in England, in which it should be stated that the exercises were opened by the reading of the 53d chapter of Isaiah, by William Penn, after which the whole congregation united in singing a hymn, and that then prayer was offered by George Whitehead, after which George Fox spoke from some portion of Scripture, there would be no objection. But to pronounce it a fabrication. But if such things were once inconsistent with Friends' manner of worship, why should they not be now? I am surprised that any minister among Friends should make the statement that "waiting upon the Lord is doing his will," without explaining that he can only know the Divine will as he knows the will of all carnal reasoning, to hear that voice which he speaketh inwardly. I said these things were almost unaccountably strange, for I think my experience of eleven years in the ministry of a church practising a stated form of worship, during which I was at times grasping after the true spiritual nature of worship, has opened my eyes to the danger arising from a desire in man to do something—which desire, if yielded to, will lead to an activity which is vain and by which the Master can never be glorified. I cannot think that the eleven years to which I have referred were entirely without profit. The Master had compassion upon my ignorance, and granted seasons of precious heavenly visitation, and as the truth concerning the nature of true spiritual worship opened to my mind, I felt I was commissioned to show the same to the people, and I hope that teaching has not been without its effect. But because of these occasional seasons of heavenly visitation, shall I return to a formal worship? No, I have been shown a more excellent way. And while I would not in any sense despise the human instrument, of whom the Master is pleased to make use, yet it hath been shown to me, in the language of John, in his first epistle, "Ye need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you all things, and is truth and is no lie."

Perhaps thou wilt think I write rather freely and energetically for one who is not a member of the Society, but I love the Society, and more, those principles on which it was founded, and that spirit which animated its first members. I hope that these modern departures in matters of worship, &c., will be over-ruled to the benefit of the Society and the praise of our Divine Master. While it rends the Society, I have confidence that it will stir up many who believe and love the principles of the fathers, to wait for the same spiritual anointing which they had. Thus the whole Society will be aroused to a new spiritual life. I hope that thou wilt not make me dependent upon the state of things.

I am hopeful and trustful, although humbled. I feel like exclaiming: Let all the earth keep silence before the Lord; or in the language of Scripture: "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord!" Zech. ii. 13.

Our attention has been called to a remark appended to an account of Ohio Yearly Meeting, on page 79 of our journal, which speaks of epistolary correspondence as being "more important to our own Yearly Meeting than it is to that of Ohio." This sentence has been regarded by some of our readers as implying a comparison between these two Yearly Meetings as to their religious weight, &c. As no thought of the kind was in the mind of the writer, it did not occur to him that the expressions used could be so understood. The motive that prompted the remark was the belief, that the advantages to be derived from the open and unmistakable reaffirming of our real position, as shown by the official records of our Yearly meeting, would be greater to ourselves than they would be to any one else.

Our friend, John Bell, of San Jose, California, desires us to mention for the information of Friends visiting that State, that meetings of Friends are held at San Jose, and in the new City Hall at San Francisco—the latter at 11 o'clock on First-days only.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Ex-Governor Morgan, of New York, having declined the Secretaryship of the Treasury, the President nominated and the Senate confirmed Charles J. Folger, of New York, to be Secretary of the Treasury. Thomas L. James, of New York, to be Postmaster General (to succeed himself), and Frank Hatton, of Iowa, to be First Assistant Postmaster General, to succeed Tyner, resigned, have also been confirmed by the Senate, as were also a considerable number of other appointments. The extra session of the Senate closed on Seventh-day.

Copious rains have fallen in Virginia, New York and the interior of this State, and nearly all the streams are reported to be rising.

Sixteen young Indians, half of them girls, and all with members of Sitting Bull's tribe, have arrived at the normal school at Hampton, Va.

The steamer Gilchrist, which left Davenport, Iowa, on Fifth-day night last week, for a trip up the Mississippi, with a valuable cargo and fifteen passengers and a crew of thirteen, became disabled by the breaking of her main rods, soon after leaving the wharf, and was dashed against the Government bridge connecting Davenport and Rock Island. The boat, on striking the bridge, careened, the weights fell off the safety-valves, and the steam from the boiler rushed into the saloon, scalding many of the passengers. The boat drifted with the swift current down the stream and sank. Of the 28 persons on board, 17 are known to be lost. It is stated that the boat was not fit for passenger service, and that the crew, at the time of the disaster, were under the influence of liquor.

The Mississippi river continued to rise on Second-day at St. Louis, and was 19 feet above low water mark the same night. The flood is the heaviest ever known at this season of the year, and has only been exceeded by the great spring freshet of 1851. All railroad travel south and west from Quincy remains suspended, except on the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, where the levees in places are being broken and the low lands completely flooded. All the inhabitants of the Spy Valley have moved to the high grounds or taken refuge in Quincy. People living north of Burlington have lost heavily in crops and live stock, and have been driven from their houses to the plains. The Mississippi is completely inundated, and many of its inhabitants have gone to Warsaw and Keokuk for safety.

Two-thirds of the village of Edgefield, South Carolina, was destroyed by fire on Seventh-day night. Only three stores remain in the business section. The loss is estimated at $100,000. The fire started in a stable, and is attributed to incendiarism.

The whalers Atlantic and Hunter have arrived at San Francisco from the Arctic Sea. They saw nothing of either the Jeannette or the Rogers.

Two immense icebergs were seen from St. John, Newfoundland, on Seventh-day morning southeastward. The National Bank of Newark, New Jersey, was closed on Second-day, in consequence of the wickedness of its cashier, Oscar L. Baldwin. The latter made a confession to the Directors on First-day, and it is said, informed them that "nothing was left of the resources of the bank except the building." Baldwin is stated at $2,400,000. It was sunk in stock speculation, and it is said, in sustaining the morocco manufacturing firm of C. Nugent & Co. The share of the latter, however, was small, being only about $150,000. Cashier Baldwin is held in $25,000 bail each.

The railways of the United States report gross earnings of $615,000,000 and net $256,000,000 for 1880, showing that $360,000,000 was paid out for wages and supplies.

There were 34 deaths in this city last week, being the same number occurred during the previous week, and 44 more than during the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number 179 were males, and 162 females: 60 died of consumption, 23 of typhoid fever, 19 of marasmus, and 15 of diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½, 101½ a 101½; 4½, 113½; 4½, 114½; currency 94, 132.

Cotton.—There was no essential change in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 1½ a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 9 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour was dull and lower. Sales of 1600 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7.50 a $7.75 for clear, and at $7.75 a $8 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family flour, yellow, at 77½ cts.; western do., at $7.60 a 8 cts., and patents at $8.25 a $9. Rye flour is steady at $6.

Grain.—Wheat is inactive and 3c. per bushel lower. Sales of 4400 bushels red and amber at $1.39 a $1.42 Rye is lower, and quoted at $1.06 for Pennsylvania. Corn is dull and inactive; Pennsylvania extra family yellow, at 71 cts.; mixed at 70½ a 71 cts.; steam at 70 cts.; No. 3 at 70 cts., and rejected at 69 cts. Oats are in fair demand, but steady. Sales of 9500 bushels including white at 50½ a 52 cts., and rejected and mixed at 48½ a 49 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 10th mo 20th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 315; loads of straw, 65. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.30 to $1.45 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.25 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; Straw, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, and prices were in fact higher; 4000 head received and sold at the different yards at 3 a 6½ cts. per pound, the latter rate for yearlings.

Sheep were lower: 14,000 head sold at the different yards at 2½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 3 a 8 cts. per lb.

Hogs were rather lower; 5000 head sold at the different yards at a 10½ cts. to be made, as to quality.

William Harcourt, speaking at Glasgow on the 25th ult., after receiving the freedom of the city said that both the late and the present Government were reluctant to proceed at an early stage against the Land League, because it was not desirable to suppress agitation, but to be made to turn the agitation into a real grievance; but when such an agitation allowed illegal ends, no Government would fail to be supported in any and all measures it might take for the safety of the society. The task, he said, was difficult and painful, but the Government, having its hands to the plough, they might rely upon its not turning back.

A number of arrests have been made in Ireland under the coercion act.

Gambetta, speaking at Bolbec, in the department of the Seine-Inferieure, said that all interests should be harmonized under the Republic. The democrats and republicans must not be misled by the importation of the American party and mistrust of the superior classes.

Glatneuf, member of the Chamber of Deputies for the Department of Eure-et-Loire, presided over a meeting in Paris on the 24th ult., which, after a speech by Lef Chotteau, unanimously adopted a proposal to demand the abrogation of the decrees against the importation of the American party into France. Representations have been made to Gambetta in the same sense.

The Times correspondent at St. Petersburg says a question of Jewish emigration to America is still a subject of concern to the Russian Government. It is stated that another attempt is to be made to turn the tide of Jewish emigration and settle them in the province of Kherson and Ekaterinoslav.

A fire at Manila, in the Philippine Islands, on Ninth mo. 15th, caused a loss of $1,000,000.

CORRECTION.—In essay "Excessive Dissipation in last (12th) No. of 'The Friend,' p. 91, for bought read banquet.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

An adjourned Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Committee room, Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, Fifth-day, Eleventh month 17th, 1881, at 8 o'clock P. M.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary

DIED, Tenth month 8th, 1881, LYDIA ANN, wife of Samuel B. Smith, a member and overseer of Gurn Preparative and Flushing Monthly Meeting, aged years 9 months and 21 days. This dear Friend was faithful wife, a loving mother and a kind neighbor. She bore a long, and at times, a very painful illness with true Christian patience; remarking near the close of her life, "The Master's will he would be glad to do. And we trust and believe that through redeeming love and mercy her end was peace."

—, on the 16th ult., at his residence in this city BENJAMIN H. COATES, M. D., in the 84th year of age, a member of Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 12, 1881.

NO. 14.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

per annum in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
No. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
No. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 98.)

The town of Reading is beautifully located in a valley or basin among the high hills on the eastern side of the Schuylkill river.

It was laid out by Thomas and Richard, who in selling lots reserved a quit-rent, which subsequently became a source of dispute between the purchasers and themselves. The meeting-house built by Friends in 1751, did not have been the first place of worship in the town. After the separation of 1777, the meeting ceased to be held, and of Exeter Monthly Meeting sold their interest in the property for a moderate sum, which has been invested; and the fund is the possession of that Monthly Meeting. Ten years ago the meeting was revived; and few Friends residing in the town meet in winter form, which is large and airy.

Several public meetings were held in this town, as well as in various places in the surrounding country. At one of these, which I been favored with the presence of, the Master, a woman was present who seems to have been much impressed with what she heard and felt there. She afterwards spoke of it to one of her friends. It was the last meeting for worship she attended; for she was laid on sick soon after it was held, and in about a week was removed by death; she made, as thought, a peaceful close. This occurrence was calculated to awaken serious reflections, and lead to self-examination as to whether the service required by the Head of the Church had been fully and honestly discharged.

From Reading, the road northward winds up the mountain ranges which furnish an abundant supplies of anthracite coal. One of the narrow and steep ravines are used on trestle-work, from which the travelers may look down to the ground 125 or more feet below him. This is rather startling to those nerves are weak; but the ever-varying views of mountain and valley which present are grand and beautiful. We greatly enjoyed the ride between Reading and Catawissa, where we emerged on the North Branch of the Susquehanna river.

From the narrative of Moses Roberts, which appeared inserting in another number of "Notes," a meeting of Friends appears to have been held in the neighborhood of the present town of Catawissa, as early as 1775. The town itself was laid out in 1787, by William Hughes, a member of our Society who had removed from Berks county. The venerable Margaret Plowman, who is still living, in the 91st year of her age, and whose father was half-brother to this William Hughes, states (under date of 9th mo. 20th, 1881), that it was originally called Hughesburg, but afterwards the Indian name of Catawissa was adopted.

In the reports sent up to the Yearly Meeting in 1780, from Philadelphia Quarter, it is stated that in one case a meeting had not been kept up; "it being a new settlement on the frontiers of Pennsylvania, called Catawissa, most of the Friends having been violently seized and drove from their habitations by a number of armed men, and some of them committed to prison on unjust suspicions, so that the meeting is for the present wholly discontinued."

The outrage on these Friends was only one of a long series to which our members were exposed during the stormy period of the revolution. Feeling themselves conscientiously bound to obey the government under which they had lived, they could take no part in opposing it by force of arms; nor could they make affirmation of allegiance to the revolutionary authorities. Hence many of them were called on to suffer by fine and imprisonment, for conscience sake.

The Catawissa Friends were living in a peculiarly exposed condition. The people along both branches of the Susquehanna river were greatly harassed by attacks from the Iroquois Indians and their allies, the refugees from the Colonies who were under British influence.

It was to check these incursions, that, in 1779, an army under General Sullivan had collected at Easton, marched through Wyoming Valley, laid waste the home of the Six Nations in Central New York, and driven the Indians to seek protection from the British troops at Fort Niagara. But this destructive campaign brought little relief to the settlers in Northumberland county. War parties were continually fitted out at Fort Niagara; and coming through the wilderness, carried death and destruction to the isolated settlers over a wide range of frontier country. It was in this year (1780) that Benjamin Gilbert's family were carried away captives from Northampton county. The Pennsylvania Archives contain abundant evidences of the distress occasioned by these attacks, and of the consequent unsettlement of the people, as is shown by the letters to the Governor of Pennsylvania from Sunbury and other places.

Under date of "April 24, 1780," Col. Hunter writes: "The savages have made their appearance on our frontiers in an hostile manner. The day before yesterday they took 7 or 8 prisoners about two miles above Fort Jenkins, and two days before that carried off several people from about Wyoming. This has struck such terror to the poor scattered inhabitants of this county, that all the settlers above this will be in the towns of Sunbury and Northumberland before two days. Our case is really deplorable."

On the 9th of the same month, William Macley writes to the Council: "Col. Hunter this moment calls on me. A fourth party of Indians struck last night at 9 o'clock, at his plantation on the west branch of Susquehanna, about 15 miles from this place. A man and child were killed, and a woman taken. We do not know the strength of this party. The inhabitants have been flying this week past. I believe there will not be one family in Northumberland town before tomorrow morning. I will not attempt describing our distress."

On the 17th another letter mentions that one man had been killed and three wounded by the Indians at Swart's plantation on the west branch.

On the 18th of 5th month, a writer from Northumberland says: "The savage enemy made a stroke on the inhabitants of this much distressed county at Buffalo Valley, and killed four men."

The settlers at Catawissa appear to have been left unmolested by the Indians. This was probably due, in part at least, to the reputation which Friends had acquired as lovers of peace, who abstained from all warlike proceedings; and of being friends to the natives, whose rights they respected and used persistent efforts to protect. But this exemption from attack awakened the jealousy of neighboring settlements, which were in too irritable and excited a condition to form a just judgment, or to properly weigh the effect of the principles of peace and good will to men. They placed greater reliance on military operations stimulated by the reward offered by the revolutionary government of Pennsylvania of "$1500 for every Indian or Tory prisoner taken in arms against us, and $1000 for every Indian scalp."

On what insufficient grounds the peaceable inhabitants of Catawissa were accused of holding treasonable correspondence with "Tories" and Indians, will appear from the following documents forwarded to the Supreme Executive Council, and preserved among the Archives of the State.

DEPOSITION OF HENRY O'NEILL, 1780.

North'd Co. ss.

Personally appeared before me the subscriber, one of the Justices of the peace for the county aforesaid, Henry O'Neill, and after being duly sworn as the law directs, depose that on the 24th inst., being in company with Peter Simerman at Catawissa Mill, and as they were engaged in repairing the Mill pond, heard two whistles as they supposed on the Charger of a Gun, but took no notice but soon heard an Indian hallo and saw him wave his hand as though he wanted them; this Dep't asked the Indian what he wanted, the Indian asked if Ellis Hughes was there, this Dep^s answered no, he then asked if Job Hughes was there, this Dep^s answered no, he then asked if it was Tories that lived at the Mill. Peter Sinnerman answered not but that it was Yankees, then the Indian answered aye—aye—twice and did not seem well pleased took up his Gun and went up the hill, then this Dep^s returned and Sinnerman asked if they would load the Canoe, O'Neil answered not, he then asked this Dep^s if they would tell that they saw an Indian, to which this Dep^s answered yes.

HENRY O'NEIL,
mark.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 27th day of August, A. Dom. 1780.

THO. HEWITT.

THOMAS HEWITT TO PRES. REED, 1780.
August 29, 1780.

Sr, Inclosed you have the Copy of Henry O'Neil's Deposition, taken Before me in the presence of a number of the respectable Inhabitants of North's County, which Evidently shews the Dismal situation of this County from the number of Disaffected persons in it. The Deposition of Henry O'Neil, together with the former Conduct of a Number of the Inhabitants of Catawisse and the places adjacent, forms a Long Chain of Circumstances, that they held and always holds a Correspondence with the Enemy, who, from their situation, being surrounded with Mountains on the one side, and the North East Branch of Susquehanna on the other, Gives them an opportunity of holding a treacherable Correspondence with the Enemy without Discovery; they have lived peaceably at home in the most Dangerous times, Negroes and other suspected strangers being frequently seen among them. Every Incursion the Enemy has made into this County and all the Disaffected families in this fly there for protection, whilst the well-affected are obliged to Evacuate the County, or shut themselves up in Castles. By the Confession of Ellis Hughes, he went up to Wyoming with a flag when the Enemy was in possession of that place; by the Confession of Casper Reyer, Duncan Beeth and Others, that they were sent to Niagara by David Fowler and Others, the Inhabitants of Catawisse and Fishing Creek; The Indian that came in a peaceable manner to that place last Spring; together with many more Circumstances that might be produced.

I therefore Humbly request the favour of you to Lay this accusation before Council, hoping the Hon^{ble} Council will Grant such relief in the premises as they in their wisdom shall think proper.

Y^r most Obed^t Humble Ser^t,

THOMAS HEWITT.
J. W.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Popular Quakerism.

Any attempt to popularize Quakerism or to make it palatable and inviting to the unenlightened mind, will, so far forth, be simply to kill it. The Omnipotent Author of the Christianity He himself came to introduce, made no abatement in the requisitions of his will in order to gain converts or win to his standard. The great work of the religion of Jesus is the subjugation of the fleshly will in man; submission to his cross; and, through the obedience which is of faith, the formation of a new creature in the place of the carnal mind of the fallen Adam. This involves a change of heart and life; a baptism comparable to fire and the Holy Ghost. It calls for deep plunges in the laver of regeneration; and such a crucifixion of the natural will and affections as to make it to the last turned from and rejected until, as in the beginning, the Spirit of God moves upon our dark hearts, and He says, "Let there be light," or until the Father of mercies draws, through a sweet and loving obedience to his dear Son, into heavenly union and a closer walk with Him.

Entertaining these views, the writer has been fearful lest the widespread religious activity of the present day, was not duly authorized, neither leavened by the renewing of the Holy Ghost and by prayer. While some of those thus engaged, there can be no doubt, have a worthy motive, and while that motive at its first presentation may seem a plausible one, such, meanwhile, should ever bear in mind that in every religious work the incontrovertible truths enunciated by the forerunner of Christ and by that Divine Lawgiver himself have lost none of their applicability or force, viz: "A man can receive (or take unto himself) nothing, except it be given him from heaven;" and, "Without (or apart from) me ye can do nothing." Now, bearing in mind that it is often much easier to enter upon some professedly pious labors, than to submit ourselves to the transforming discipline of the grace and cross of Christ, is there not cause for grave fears, that at such a time of weakness and outwardness as this, when the church is draped in garments of mourning, or has fled for safety into the wilderness, that unsanctified efforts may be made, like to putting forth the hand unbidden, as in the case of Uzzah, to stay the tottering ark? and who may cry, "Lo, here is Christ; or lo, he is there;" ya, even as is written, "Show signs and wonders to deceive, if it were possible, the very elect?" Is there not danger also of our presuming that a revival has been inaugurated, where the chief end thereof seems but to lead back to what our forefathers in the Truth were, by the Spirit of Christ, led out from?—a revival not warranted in the followers of a Saviour, who calls all his to that watchful, waiting, prayerful, importuning state, represented by the precept, "As the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God," &c. Is there not danger at such a time, of our substituting semblances of the truth for the Truth itself? Of attempting to bridge over the narrow way of self-denial and a cross that crucifies to the world, in order to make it more easy and inviting to the natural mind? Is there not danger, too, of making means so plausible, unto an end so desirable, stand proxy for those "sacrifices of sweet smelling savor" made, of life, by fire unto the Lord, which involved an entire change in, or destruction of the oblation offered? In short, is there not danger of forsaking the fountain of living water, for cisterns of man's device that can hold no water?

If the heart is not right in the sight of our Holy Head and High Priest without whom we can do nothing, it will be in vain to say, "We have eaten and drunk in thy presence; and thou hast taught in our streets." That which the dear Master requires for the building up of his spiritual house, is lively stones—humble, contrite, penitent, passive, prayerful hearts—"an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." The Church wants workmen and workwomen who are experimental witnesses of the truth as it is in Jesus; those whose eyes have seen, and whose hands have handled of the word of life. She needs such as are skillful in lamentation, and who are willing to suffer for Him who endured so much for them—for all—and who was himself made perfect through suffering. While there are those who seem willing to do much for the cause of Truth, they neither manifest a willingness to suffer for it, and thus to know Christ and "the fellowship of his sufferings being made conformable to his death," nor to separate from that which hinders its vitality, spread and growth. That which is wanted is more living, practical examples of what genuine Quakerism leads into,—more of the denial of self—more of giving up all for Christ—more of not loving our lives unto the death—more of inwardness—more of the life of righteousness—more union from the Holy One—more of the precious gem, humility—more obedience to the Spirit of truth which leadeth into all truth.

Did not the secret of the success of the early Friends in influencing and stirring the hearts of others as well as of their own spiritual attainments, very much lie, next to the great outpouring of the Holy Ghost or of power from on high, in their thorough dedication and espousal of the cause of Christ with continually operating example they set, that at whatever cost, they were in earnest in their unwearied pursuit after eternal life? They counted not their lives dear unto themselves and preferred persecution, prisons, the loss of their estates, with every temporal thing, rather than give up their testimony for Truth, their fidelity to Him who had bought them with the costly sacrifice of suffering and blood. What would be the effect to-day, the successors of such a noble ancestry were to unfurl the banner these so nobly bore—"holiness unto the Lord;" having the same inscribed in living characters upon their lives and conversation? What were their living epistles for Christ known and read by all men? Would there not be a stir in camp, as in that of Dan formerly? Would not the heaven of the kingdom work as in early day, when not from an afflicted remnant only but from the whole of the people, would go forth the inviting language, "Come a have fellowship with us," for "our fellowships" is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ."

Were this our condition, there would be need of getting up expedients of our manufacture, like to patching up a remedy no sewing of fig-leaves together to cover known nakedness; no putting "a piece of new (raw or unwrought) cloth unto an old garment," whereby "the rent is made worse but instead thereof, a getting down to the root of things in ourselves, and realizing the indispensable transformation, consisting, child-like submission to the yoke and sufficient grace of the Lord Jesus.

The sentiment has been ventured, with allusion has been made to the reduced condition of some meetings, to the effect that, that is needed to restore primitive vigor them, is First-day schools. Can First-day school teachings renew a lost soul, or engrave Christ the living Vine. We want something deeper; something vital and searching; something that has union abiding; something that not only teaches abiding Christ but baptizes, renews and makes alive in Him. First-day schools for acquiring knowledge of Holy Scripture have their use particularly in respect to those who, otherwise, would not come to the knowledge their precious doctrines and precepts. I commend Timothy in that "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures," But after any have attained all the knowledge any can of the letter and text of this book of books, there still remains the indispensable requisite—the illuminations of the Holy Spirit—Christ to open them to our understandings, for all searching or study of them will avail but little, even though we become as mighty and eloquent in them as Apollos was, unless they are instrumental in leading us to their Author and Teacher—their aim and end in order that we may sit at his feet as little children, and experience the grace that came from Him to lead us into all truth. The knowledge of truth is very desirable; but it is Truth itself, brought home to, and received into the heart, that saves. Thus our blessed Lord said to the Jews: "Ye search the scriptures; in them ye think ye have eternal life; and yet they are they which testify of me. And ye will not come to me, that ye might have life." Valuable as these sacred records are, they are not other things of the Spirit of God cannot be received or comprehended by the natural man; "for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Written for our learning by holy men of old "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," it requires a measure of the same heavenly anointing, in order to understand and savingly apply them for our instruction in righteousness.

The following is from the pen of that well-instructed scribe unto the kingdom of heaven, Thomas Scattergood: "All our religious activities must be performed in the name of Jesus, in his power and strength. If it was not for his active man, less would be done, and no appearance, but what was done would be able to more effect; the Lord will bless his work. Not thousands of rams, nor ten thousands of rivers of oil are what is wanted, not a great appearance of doing, and saying, 'Lord, Lord'; but doing and suffering the will of God. This mysterious work is confounded to man's wisdom and activity! Lord, keep us from sliding in slippery places—grant us power, mercy and love to go with me, that I may move with it, and stay with it, that I may seed under suffering—is religion long enough men? Grant ability to say in sincerity, Where thou art, there let thy servant be, even if it is in suffering and death."

Land-Slips in Switzerland.

A correspondent of the New York Times writing from the scene of destruction, under date of 9th mo. 19th, describes the disaster which befell the village of Elm a few days ago. Though the most destructive of the landslips occurred there, yet it was only one several which have taken place in Switzerland the present season.

Large tracts of country have been undermined by incessant rains and the overflow of mountain streams. The famous road from Chamonix to Chamouny has frequently been impassable. Whole sections of it have given way, and suddenly, without warning, dropped the valley, thousands of feet below. In one case a family of four persons, with horses and carriage, was hurled into the abyss, dashed to atoms against the sharp rocks, or persons who braved the dangers of the road, once most frequented, narrowly escaped in their lives, and now there is much talk of prohibiting carriages from going over it, or roads once popular have suffered utterly. Land-slides of a more or less serious character have been of frequent occurrence. At Leisigen, on the lake of Thun, near Interlaken, a land-slip of most extraordinary character has been in progress for some time past. The movement of the mountain is hardly perceptible, yet it is gradually burying the village out of sight. Several houses are already covered with mud and stone from the moving hills, and though the best efforts are being made, it is not possible to save the place from destruction. At one time it was feared that the same danger threatened Grindelwald, famous for its glaciers, but fortunately that village escaped. Many of the rich fields near by, however, have been covered and destroyed by mud and stone-slips from the surrounding mountains. At Krithal, in the Canton Basle, the same destruction has come upon many an acre of good land. In one case an extensive wood slipped from the mountains upon the meadows in question, and strange to relate, the trees are still standing intact, as though they grew where they are.

But these and many other minor misfortunes of a similar character which might be related, are as nothing compared to the terrible calamity which has fallen upon this once lovely village of Elm. Three thousand and odd feet above the level of the sea, it nestled half in the valley, half clinging to the hillside in a deep basin formed by great mountain peaks which towered above. Three well-sized brooks, coming from the glaciers comparatively near at hand, united above the village to form the little river Sernf, which flowed through it to the lowlands far away. For years past the inhabitants of the Sernf Valley have found in the extensive slate quarries of the Tschingelalp or Plattenberg, one of their chief sources of revenue. The berg or mountain in question rises to a height of several thousand feet just behind what was the village. It is composed, as the event has proved, of a loose, scaly material exceedingly liable to crack and give way. Into the base of this crumbling and treacherous mountain the quarrymen of Elm dug in former years without any regard to the laws of science or the simplest principles of engineering. Recently they have been more cautious, but their caution came too late. In a word, they cut away the foundations of the mountain, and at last, as a natural consequence, it has fallen upon them. That there was some danger of a land-slip from the Plattenberg has long been known in Elm. Within the past three or four months slight falls of stone and mud have been of frequent occurrence after heavy rains, yet the people never for a moment thought of leaving the beautiful home to which they were so much attached, and even experts who examined the mountain seem to have had no idea of the full extent of the danger to which they were exposed. So in fancied security and entire ignorance of the awful fate which was in store for them they lived on.

"Meanwhile, the almost unparalleled rains of summer were slowly but surely completing the work which had been begun by the thoughtless or ignorant quarrymen scores of years ago. The end came on the evening of the 11th inst. During the early part of that day the people of Elm went about their usual vocations in the usual way and without any anticipation of the terrible calamity which was so near at hand. At 5 o'clock in the evening, while many of them were out in the fields, some one was heard crying, 'Look at the Plattenberg—the Plattenberg!' Those who followed the direction and who are still alive, say that for a moment it seemed to them as if every peak above the slate quarry was in motion; then there came a rumbling noise, like far-off thunder, and in a moment they were blinded by clouds of dust.

"When they could see again they found that a great slice of earth and stone had slipped down from the Tschingelalp, burying fine houses and covering acres of good land. Men and women were at the same time seen struggling among the ruins, and from all sides friends, neighbors and relatives hurried to their aid. Unhappily, they hurried also to a terrible death. Even while they were engaged in their work of love the mountain above them moved again. This time the sound of thunder was not far distant, but only too near at hand. The pine trees on the grassy slopes were seen to sink. A great cloud of dust and steam covered the whole valley, thousands of tons of stone were hurled through the air. An all-powerful wind pressure carried everything before it, there was a horrible crash, a sound of madly rushing torrents, and all was still. Then the dust and smoke cleared away, the sun shone in a cloudless sky, and it was seen that as far as the eye could reach the once blooming Sernf Valley was covered with from 40 to 160 feet of black stone, moraine, dirt and slime. Forty dwellings, the best in the village, together with dozens of stables and outbuildings, were buried far out of sight, torn to pieces by the air-pressure, strewn broadcast on the mountain. One hundred and eleven of the people of Elm were swallowed up in the general ruin. At least 12 strangers—Italian quarrymen—shared their fate. It was useless to think of rescuing any who fell in that awful death slough. Far out upon the edge, from a strong house, which was partially covered with the slime and stone, four persons—a gray-headed 91 years, and a mother with two children—were taken out badly injured but alive. Every other human being overtaken in the path of the avalanche was forever buried out of human sight.

"The extent of the landslip is almost beyond belief. To give anything like an adequate idea of it is no easy task. At Elm a great mass of the Plattenberg, a mass 1,500 feet wide, at least 2,000 feet high above the valley, and according to the engineers, from 60 to 100 feet deep, fell over upon the village, its farms, gardens and meadows. Tons of rock were dashed entirely across the valley, and now rest quietly 300 feet high upon the hillside. The air pressure was so great that houses were lifted up from their foundations and carried a distance of 1,000 feet. A barn built of heavy logs, and filled with hay, was carried entirely across the valley and overturned 200 feet on the mountain opposite the Plattenberg. An iron bridge which crossed the Sernf was torn up, carried scores of feet away from its abutments, and now rests on end more than half buried in mud and loose stone. The whole valley, as far as it can be seen from the village inn, which is still standing, very closely resembles the bed of a glacier which has receded. As I have already stated, the masses of stone and earth which have fallen are everywhere piled up to a height of very many feet. At least 500 acres are covered in this way. The river Sern has made for itself a new channel through the debris, and has flooded and ruined much of the land below, land which was not directly harmed by the avalanche of stone. So in one way or another the whole valley has been injured beyond all hope of repair. The loss in property will reach not less than 2,000,000; at the lowest estimate 123 people have lost their lives. The state engineers, fearing further landslides, have forbidden those who have escaped to return to the houses which remain standing, and in consequence more than 800 men, women and children who but a few days ago were prosperous and well to do are now almost without a roof to cover them."

"Wounded in the House of His Friends."

BY A CONGREGATIONALIST CLERGYMAN.

I went into a book store. Having some curiosity to know what sort of books that particular establishment offered for sale, I looked the stock carefully over. It consisted, almost exclusively, of works designed or fitted to promote unbelief in the Scriptures and in God. Was I surprised? No; for I knew the bookseller was an outspoken unbeliever.

I passed into another establishment. It was large, handsomely furnished, indeed almost palatial in size and appointments. Its shelves were loaded with thousands on thousands of beautifully made and attractively displayed volumes. On looking them over I found very many of them to be in the interest of unbelief—some of them after a very subtle and concealed fashion, but many without any concealment whatever. Not a few of these bore the imprint of the firm. Some of the most specious and dangerous of all the modern assaults on religion were included in the latter class. They were books which no careful, Christian father would have in his house for any consideration. They were books which few Christian pastors could see circulating freely among their people without grief and alarm. And yet here they were, splendidly advertised and in course of being sent through all the arteries of trade with the immense push and commercial facilities of a great, veteran, Christian corporation. Was I surprised? By no means. I had known the firm for years, and could have directed inquirers, off-hand, to the greatest publishers and distributors of infidel and atheistic writings on this continent. No, I was not surprised; only puzzled for the hundredth time to understand how Christian people could conscientiously lend themselves and their resources to such work. Am I alone in my perplexity?—Recorder and Covenantant.

It is the religious influence which prevails at the institution of learning rather than the direct religious teaching that affects the lives of the students. That is really an infidel school in which the teachers do not show in their daily walk and conversation that God is in their thoughts and that their faith in Christ is a living, active principle. The fact that infidelity is not taught directly, that the faculty show "respect for religion," does not meet the requirement for the proper education of the young persons of religious families. It is chiefly in the interest of the young themselves that we urge upon parents that they send their children where they will have religious training. The Christian that does not wish to have his children under religious influence all the time, will do well to look into his heart and ask what it is that he calls religion.—Christian Advocate.

Selected.

LABOR.

Live for something, be not idle,
Look about thee for employ;
Sit not down to useless dreaming;
Labor and its sweets, enjoy.

Folded hands are ever weary;
Vacant minds are never gay;
Life for all has many duties,
Do we only find our way.

Live to bless the lot of others,
In their trials bear a part,
Think how oft a word of kindness,
May relieve an aching heart.
Make the world around you happy,
Even the cheerful smiles you wear,
Bud and blossom by the wayside
And may overshadow your care.

Lend a hand to those less favored,
Let the balm of Gilead flow,
Scatter sunbeams o'er their pathway;
There is work for all to do.

Let us for each other labor,
Guide the hand by heart with rest,
We will then feel good out pouring,—
Blest to see our brother blest.

Faithful in the Master's vineyard,
Prompt to answer duty's call,
He, the busy, happy gleaner,
Reaps the harvest best of all.
Wield the armor, brethren, higher,
Love and labor for the Lord,
And be firm that the faithful labor
Yields a sure and rich reward.

Selected.

WATCH, MOTHER WATCH.

Mother, watch the little feet,
Climbing o'er the garden wall,
Bounding through the busy street,
Ranging cellar, step and hall;
Never count the moments lost,
Never mind the little frosts;
Little feet will go astray;
Guide them, mother, while you may.

Mother, watch the little hand,
Picking berries by the way,
Making houses in the sand,
Tossing up the fragrant hay,
Never dare the question ask
"Why to me this weary task?"
These same little hands may prove
Messengers of light and love.

Mother, watch the little tongue,
Prattling eloquent and wild,
What is said and what is sung
By the happy, joyous child;
Catch the words while yet unspoken,
Stop the vow before 'tis broken;
This same tongue may yet proclaim
Blessings in a Savior's name.

Mother, watch the little heart,
Beating soft and true for you;
Wholesome lessons now impart;
Keep, oh, keep that young heart true;
Thence extracting every weed,
Sowing good and precious seed,
Harvest rich you then may see
Ripening for eternity.

Selected.

NOVEMBER.

Yet one smile more, departing distant sun!
One mellow smile thro' the soft vapory air,
Ere, o'er the frozen earth, the loud winds run,
Or snows are sifted o'er the meadows bare.
One smile on the brown hills and naked trees,
And the dark rocks whose summer wreaths are cast,
And the blue gentian-flower, that, in the breeze,
Nods lonely, of her beauteous race the last.
Yet a few sunny days in which the bee
Shall murmur by the hedge that skirts the way,
The cricket chirp upon the russet leaf,
And man delight to linger in thy ray.
Yet one rich smile, and we will try to bear
The piercing winter frost, and winds, and darkened air.

—Bryant.

THE REAPER.

In among the bearded barley,
In among the rustling rye,
Toils the reaper, late and early,
While the summer hours go by.
Bending o'er swarth and windrow,
Gathering, blinding golden sheaves,
Over all his honest labor
Heavenly benediction breathes.

Reaping, reaping, toiling, toiling,
Underneath the burning sun,
Ploughing, sowing in the spring-time,
Reaping, 'ere the whole is done.
This for bread, and bread for living,
And the living is for death,
And the death for life immortal—
But the reaper draws his breath,

Hard above the whetted sickle,
Thinking as he cuts the grain,
Little of the endless circle
He is helping to maintain.
Sowing, reaping, birth, and sleeping,
In a never-ceasing chain,
Follow still, and still awaking
Breaks the winter night again.

For "The Friend."

Letter of Nathan Kite.

The following letter of the late Nathan Kite was written more than fifteen years ago to a Friend who at that time was engaged in holding religious meetings of a public character.

The family visiting, "from house to house" to which his thoughts were turned, was formerly practised to a greater extent than has been common amongst us of late years. For very many years, the Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia annually recommended this good labor to its subordinate meetings; and the reports which came up from them, generally showed, that several of its Monthly Meetings in each year had been engaged to perform this service by committees, or otherwise.

Philadelphia, 3d month 19th, 1866.

Dear —: Last night as I was thinking of thee and thy First-day meetings among those who are not Friends, my mind reverted to scenes and feelings I had when lying apparently near death's door, some years since.

I seemed to look down on the fruitful field of Chester county and some parts of Delaware county, and it seemed to me that a large part of the inhabitants were as sheep without shepherd. I knew that the ancestors of many, perhaps of most of the inhabitants had been valuable, consistent members of the Society of Friends, and outward prosperity had, from generation to generation, been permitted to rest upon the offspring. Fine houses, nob barns, fertile fields, everywhere greeted the mental eye as I mused over the country, and spoke of outward blessings.

But how had it fared spiritually with the inhabitants? The greater portion, much to greater, had lost all connection with the Society of Friends, and there was little to remind the observers that they were the descendants of those to whom the cross of Christ the self-denying walk of the Truth, were so strange—a many went to no place of worship as a regular duty. Surely they were as sheep lost in the wilderness.

I felt my heart affected as I thus beheld them; and it seemed that the time was drawing near when the Great Shepherd of the sheep would send forth delegated shepherds who from house to house would be led on weary yet availing embassy to gather some of these wanderers into his fold. It did seem left as they were to themselves, as though "no man spot in heathen or nominally Christian land, claim greater sympathy from the humble faithful disciples of the Lord Jesus?"

So vividly did the whole land apparently pass before me, so earnestly was I affected by the sight, that I would then have been willing to go from house to house with such as the Lord might send with a message of mercy and call of redeeming love, to come enter into his vineyard, and labor; to come away from formalism, from infidelity, from indifference, that they might witness, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, an awakening into spiritual life, an earnest concern for the well-being of their immortal souls, and through the effectual baptisms of the Holy Ghost, experience at last the washing of regeneration, even the new birth unto holiness.

As these views dwelt with me, I thought that if ever I should have any service in the Church, if restored to bodily health, it would be among those scenes, and with those people who were so brought into sympathy with. I do not think I ever hear of any concern leading me into labor for any portion of these neglected people; but I feel a warm interest herein, and at times I earnestly look for some to stir more deeply, more fully in the matter, — ah, if the Master saw it right to send Samuel, in the evening of his day, to finish his earthly service by a home-visiting, soul-awakening call among these neglected ones, wouldst thou rejoice. Nay, I think I would gladly be a member of the meeting he belongs to, go with him from house to house in the labor.

Well, I do not wish to set any one to labor to that to which the Master does not call them; but I wish my friend — to know, that whenever she gives up to the Master's will to service in any degree touching on those for whom my mind is sickened and since has been so interested, it gives me satisfaction.

Thy friend,

NATHAN KITE.

What it Costs.—A gentleman was walking in Regent's Park in London, and he met a man whose only home was in the poorhouse. He had come out to take the air, and excited the gentleman's interested attention.

"Well, my friend," said the gentleman, getting into conversation, "it is a pity that a man like you should be situated where you are. Now may I ask how old you are?"

The man said he was eighty years of age.

"Had you any trade before you became penniless?"

"Yes, I was a carpenter."

"Did you use intoxicating drink?"

"No, oh, no, I only took my beer."

"How much did your beer come to a day?"

"Oh, a sixpence a day, I suppose."

"For how long a time?"

"Well, I suppose for sixty years."

The gentleman had taken out his note-book, and he continued figuring with his pencil while he went on talking with the man.

"Now, let me tell you," said he, as he finished his calculations, "how much that beer cost you, my man. You can go over the figures yourself." And the gentleman demonstrated that the money, a sixpence a day for sixty years, expended in beer, would, if it had been saved and placed at interest, have yielded him nearly eight hundred dollars a year, or an income of fifteen dollars a week for self-support.—Dr. Richard Newton.

Testimonies to the Truth.

(Continued from page 107.)

I do not question, but here are many tender-hearted ones, that have tender desires and breathings of soul after God, that desire to know peace with God, and reconciliation with their Maker. Now, my friends, there is not another mediator besides Jesus Christ, He is the alone Mediator and Redeemer; it is He that gave himself a ransom for us; it is He that reconciles man to God, and we must be found in Him, if we will come to have acceptance with God. So let every one of you consider with yourselves, how far you are broken off from your evil ways; we are all by nature children of wrath; consider how far you are broken off from the wild olive-tree, from that which is corrupt by nature, and whether you be grafted into Christ; if thou beest grafted into Him, thou receivest strength, and nourishment, and ability from Him. And for this end we have waited after we have believed, we have waited for power; many a time we have travelled many miles to a silent meeting; people have wondered what encouragement we could have, to travel to a silent meeting; indeed we have had great encouragement to meet together, and we have travelled in great hazard and jeopardy; yet we have met together, and the Lord hath made us living witnesses of the fulfilling of that promise: "That where two or three are gathered together in my name, I will be in the midst of them." This was that which beautified our meetings, and we were willing to wait; there was a disposition of soul in us, that if the Lord did hide his face from us, we were troubled; if we did not enjoy the Lord, and find Him in the midst of us, it brought a great concernment upon our minds and spirits, and we were willing to reflect upon ourselves, and examine within ourselves, what was the matter that the fountain did not send forth its living streams as at other times, and what was the reason it was withheld from us.

Friends, this was a great exercise upon our minds, but the Lord, graciously manifesting himself, appeared to us, causing the cloud many times to vanish away, and the light of his countenance shined on us, and our spirits were revived, and we were comforted; and this was a great encouragement to us to wait upon God, seeing our own weakness to perform that which is our bounden duty, which God required of us; of necessity this brought a constraint upon us to wait upon the Lord, that we might renew our strength; seeing our own weakness, insufficiency and infirmity, there was a necessity that constrained us to wait for a Saviour, for a Redeemer. Isaiah xl. 31: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint."

My friends, we have need of supplies from God every day, we have need of our daily bread, and God gives bread to the hungry soul. He filleth the hungry with good things; this is that we labor and travail for; now, those that are hungry God takes notice of, and gives bread to; He hath promised, "That those that hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled." See what you are hunting after this day, what is it that your souls do desire? You have presented your bodies here at this time, what is it for? Is it to hear what a man can say? To hear eloquence of speech, to hear some novelties, or is it your end to wait upon God? I would have every one of you to wait for yourselves, you that have been acquainted with the manifestation of the Spirit, wait in it; feel your minds exercised towards God, wait at his footstool; this was Mary's choice, when Martha was cumbered about many things, Mary attended at the footstool of Jesus, her attendance was upon Him. So, friends, let us all look unto the Lord, and wait upon Him, wait for his appearance, and for his salvation to be manifested to us; wait that you may know that arm of power that wrought tenderness in you, and did beget desires in your souls after that which is good; wait that you may be strengthened in that power, that you may be a growing people, that you may grow in grace and virtue, that you may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. There are degrees of grace, and there are several statutes and degrees of growth; you may read of several statutes, I John ii. 13; children, young men, and fathers; "I have written unto you fathers, because ye have known Him that is from the beginning; I have written unto young men, because ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one; I write unto you little children, because ye have known the Father."

Now see how far you that make a profession of the truth, are grown into the life of it; see how far it hath prevailed, so as to season your souls, and to make you savory to God, that you may not only stand in a profession, and be professors of life, but possessors of life, of the life of Jesus, that you may receive life and ability from Him every day, so as to be enabled by his power, to perform what He requires of you. Now, there is no more required of us, but faithfulness according to the ability of grace given; the Lord God hath been free in his love, and hath communicated to us a talent or talents; now, it is those that are faithful in a little, that He will commit more unto; but do not expect a greater talent, or more to be communicated, till you have been faithful in a little, which hath already been made manifest to you; see that you be every one concerned for yourselves, mind your travail, "Lay aside every weight and burden, and the sin which doth so easily beset you, and run with patience the race that is set before you, looking unto Jesus, who is the Author, and will be the Finisher of your faith." If thou dost give up thyself to Him, He that is the Author, will be the Finisher of thy faith, to the joy and comfort of thy soul. He will perfect the work He hath begun in thee.

I would have neither old nor young, to satisfy yourselves with an outside profession of the Truth of God; but see that you be converted, that you be broken off from the wild olive, and ingrafted into Christ; see that there be a thorough reformation wrought in your souls, and that you be separated from that which is evil. What doth an outward separation signify, if there be not an inward separation? 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18: "Wherefore come out from amongst them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." Wait upon the Lord, and know an inward separation, for what will it signify to change the name, and retain the corrupt nature, the old nature, and to live in pride, vanity, lust, covetousness, and other abominations? What doth it signify to make a profession of Christianity, while people live in these sins from day to day? Consider how it is with you, how you stand related to God. I do not question, but that all here make a profession of God, and Christ, and true godliness; some are too much like to those that profess God in words, but in works deny Him, being abominable, and to every good work, reprobate. I would have better hopes of you that are here present; there are many that make a profession of Christianity, that are vile in their lives, and ungodly in their conversations; more like heathens than weighty, sober, solid Christians; their lives do not speak them to be Christians; they have the name of Christians, they are called so, but their lives speak them to be otherwise.

(To be continued.)

A Street-Car Scene.—The amount of one's usefulness depends more upon the spirit than upon the means. The first movement to a noble charity comes often from the sympathizing poor calling the attention of the thoughtless rich to some immediate suffering.

No one noticed a humble market-woman seated in one of the crowded Philadelphia horse-cars as it made its way on a certain morning towards the centre of the city. She was middle-aged, and very plain of face and plain of dress—but her soul was beautiful, for she was one of the children of God, and ever quick to do a Christian deed. By her side sat a poor, worn-looking mother, trying to hold two little children on her lap. She was evidently in trouble, for her face was very sad, and tears rolled frequently down her cheeks. When the market-woman saw this, she kindly took one of her children upon her own lap, and began talking with her and the child, and trying to impart some comfort. The act of sympathy soon won the mother's grateful confidence, and she told her story. Her husband, a working mason, was employed at one of the great summer hotels in Atlantic City, New Jersey, and she had just received news that he had fallen and broken his leg. He could send her no money, and she had determined to go to him from Philadelphia on foot—a journey of more than fifty miles.

"Bless you, poor soul," said the tender-hearted market-woman, "you're but a weak little body, and you'd never live to get there so, with the two little ones." Then reflecting a moment (for she had but two cents in her own pocket), she spoke out to the passengers, "Ladies and gentlemen, will you listen to this woman's story?" and she repeated it exactly as she had heard it. Immediately one of the gentlemen passed a hat up and down the car, and a sum of money was collected sufficient to pay the poor woman's passage to her husband on the railroad, and her expenses in Atlantic City for a month.

The spirit of the humble market-woman, and her genuine kindness, so pleased a wealthy and benevolent lady who happened to be in the car, that she made her acquaintance—and the result was an arrangement by which hundreds of needy ones besides the poor mason's wife received encouragement and help. Ann B.—the market-woman, became the wealthy lady's agent to distribute her charities among the worthy poor, and for years in the homes of want and sorrow in the great city, no name has been more welcome or more warmly blessed than hers. Everywhere the homely alms-bringer carried also some treasure of cheerful counsel and words of Christian peace. Her business as a huckster brought her in contact with the roughest characters when she made her night purchases at the wharves, but her pure and simple goodness every one knew and respected. She made her station glorious. "I don't know anything about the Christianity of de big churches," said a negro stevedore, "but I know Ann B.—and I believe in her God."—Condensed from Youth's Companion.

Theatre.

Many of us, in looking back on our experiences of fifty years of life, must recall some instances of merciful interposition, when our own will, purpose and determination have been set aside by an unseen but powerfully-felt agency, and we, with our will and purpose set, have been compelled to take an entirely opposite course from that we had planned, or have been mysteriously, or I would rather say providentially, hindered from carrying out our determined plans.

When quite a young man, I had an intense desire, almost amounting to a passion, to adopt the theatrical profession. I was fascinated by the theatre, stage-struck, enamored of all dramatic representation.

The gorgeous dresses, the music and lights dazzled me. I went home to my lodgings fascinated, carried out of myself. How mean and poor was my little bedroom, and what a dreary monotony of life mine was, plodding in a shop to learn a trade! Trade, profession, occupation, business—all was tame, slow, groveling, compared with the glorious, the grand, the bewildering pursuit of the actor. Again and again I enjoyed the delicious enchantment, and fully determined that I must be an actor—I must strut my hour upon the stage. I envied the poor stick who came on to remove the tables and chairs, the poor, despised supple; even the doorkeeper was an object of interest. Yes, I was smitten.

I left New York, and for awhile I worked in Providence, where I became acquainted with some gentlemen attached to the theatre, lost a good situation through neglect of my duties and fascination for the stage, and obtained an engagement at the Lion Theatre, Boston. Surely I am now at the summit of my ambition, my permanent engagement on the staff of artists at a regular theatre. Before, it had been an occasional appearance to fill up a gap at a temporary place of entertainment. Alas! I found the gold to be tinsel. Here I acquired a thorough distaste for all theatrical representations, and all the genius and intellect displayed by the most famous actor has not, and never can, reconcile me to the sham, tinsel crowns, the pasteboard goblets, the tin armor, the paltry spangles, cotton for velvet, all make-believe, the umbats, and the sham blood. Even the nightly disguise became an annoyance; the putting the face, corking the eyebrows, pendulating the wrinkles, the doing up with false whiskers, hair, moustache, the French chalk, the rouge, the burnt cork, to say nothing of the habiliments, rendered the whole thing at the last odious to me; and I never felt meaner, or had less self-respect, than when I was bedizenized to do some character. How men of ability and common sense can submit to this caricaturing, night after night, passes my poor comprehension.

In that theatre I found some men of education in the higher walks of the profession; but O, the disenchantment! The beautiful women were, some of them, coarse and profane; the noble gentlemen often mean, tricky, and sponging. In fact, the unreality of, the terrible temptation to the lower forms of vice, especially to those of a nervous, excitable temperament, increased by the falsehood and fiction involved in their profession, in seeming to be what they never were or could be, studying virtue to represent it on the stage, while their lives were wholly vicious, repelled me.—John B. Gough.

The truly serious mind is often bowed under a sense of the awful necessity there is to be deepened and grounded in the one true and saving faith. This is not to be attained by any act or contrivance of man, but by and through unreserved obedience to the guidance of that principle, which, though in different places and ages it hath had different names, is, however, pure and proceeds from God. By the gracious condescension of the Heavenly Parent, the knowledge necessary to salvation is rendered attainable by the lowest as well as the highest capacity, and therefore requires not the exertion of extraordinary endowments to comprehend its nature or experience its efficacy. The great mistake of many in all ages, and especially of the present day, has been, that losing sight of this clear, indisputable truth, their minds have wandered into curious and unprofitable speculation about things no ways necessary to be known, and thus swerving from that humble dependent state wherein alone there is true preservation, they have become bewildered in a maze of perplexity and doubt. The meek and the humble, those of pure hearts and contrite spirits, who are obedient to the call and engaged to do the will of their Lord and Master, these are they who shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, and be made wise in the things pertaining to salvation; while every attempt out of this teachable, child-like disposition, to comprehend the Divine mysteries, or to grasp at the knowledge of things not clearly revealed, will prove but a fruitless application of those excellent talents bestowed upon us for the noblest purpose, and instead of their rounding to the praise of the Great Giver, will, in proportion to their extent, become a snare to their possessors.—An Ancient Epistle of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

An Old Prayer.—One of the liturgies put forth by Edward VI. contained "a prayer for landlords," which indulged in some pretty plain speaking. The following is a sample of its quality: "We heartily pray Thee that they (who possess the grounds, pastures and dwelling places of the earth), may not rack and stretch out the rents of their houses and lands, nor yet take unreasonable fines and incomes after the manner of covetous worldlings, but so let them out to others that the inhabitants thereof may both be able to pay the rents, and also honestly to live, to nourish their families, and to relieve the poor. Give them grace also that they may be content with that which is sufficient, and not join house to house, nor couple land to land, to the impoverishment of others, but so behave themselves in letting out their tenements, lands and pastures, that after this life they may be received into everlasting dwelling places."

Quenching Thirst.—Nearly a hundred years ago Dr. Lind suggested to Captain Kennedy that thirst might be quenched at sea by dipping the clothing into salt water, and putting it on without wringing. Subsequently the captain, on being cast away, had an opportunity of making the experiment. With great difficulty he succeeded in persuading part of the men to follow his example, and they all survived; while the four who refused, and drank salt water, became delirious and died. In addition to putting on the clothes while wet, night and morning, they may be wetted while on two or three lines during the day. Captain Kennedy goes on to say, "After these operations we uniformly found that the violent drought went off, and the parched tongue was cured in a few minutes. After bathing and washing the clothes, we found ourselves as much refreshed as though we had received some eternal nourishment."

The bare possibility of the truth of the statement makes it a humanity for any aper to give it a wide publicity, since here are few readers in any hundred who may not go to sea and be shipwrecked. We personally know that wading in water quenches thirst, and very few remember being thirsty while bathing at the sea-shore while swimming in our rivers. When the fearful horrors of dying with thirst are remembered, and the more fearful madness which is the certain result of drinking sea-water to allay thirst, it is certainly well to encourage individual experiment in this direction, and to solicit an authenticated report of the same.—Hall's Journal of Health.

A Ship's "Log."—The speed of vessels is approximately determined by the use of the log and log-line. The log is a triangular, or quadrangular, piece of wood about a quarter of an inch thick, so balanced by means of a late of lead as to swim perpendicularly in the water, with about two-thirds of it under water. The log line is a small cord, the end of which—divided into three, so that the cord hangs from the cord as a scale-pan from a balance-beam—is fastened to the log, while the other is wound round a reel on the ship. As the ship moves through the water, the log, while the line is unwound from the reel as the ship moves through the water, the length of line unwound in a given time gives the rate of the ship's sailing. This is calculated by knots made on the line at certain distances, while the time is measured by a sand-glass of a certain number of seconds. The length between the knots is so proportioned to the time of the glass that the knots unwound while the glass runs down show the number of miles the ship is sailing per hour. The first knot is placed about five fathoms from the log, to allow the latter to get clear of the ship before the reckoning commences. This is called the stray-line, the log-book, sometimes called the log for brevity, is the record that the proper officers keep of the speed of the ship from day to day, and of any and all matters that occur that are deemed worthy of note, of the winds and storms, and especially of ships that are sighted.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Roman Catholic Schools.—The Roman Catholic priest of St. Mary's Church in Pittsburgh, announces that he will refuse absolution to any parent or guardian who sends children to the public schools of that city instead of the Roman Catholic parochial schools. A member declares that in case of the priest's refusal to spiritually minister to his family in the manner prescribed by the usages of the Roman Catholic Church, recourse will be had to the civil law.

Spirituality.—In a recent Baptist gathering at Reading, some good sentiments were expressed. Such as the following: "We need more religious meditation, more shutting out of the world, more acquaintance with God. Vital piety is at the bottom of all ministerial success. The Spirit of God in the heart of man is the life-principle of the church, the real church. A Christian is a son of God; but he becomes such only by generation and birth. The Spirit is the producing cause of faith and repentance. The Spirit does not leave man to himself after creating him anew. Rather, the Spirit is an ever-present agent."

Jewish Christians.—The Church Union contains an account of a meeting lately held in New York City, at which it was concluded to organize "a Jewish brotherhood without regard to denominational connections, to meet as Jewish Christians, the purpose being to encourage one another, and to render such aid as circumstances would admit of." Such a brotherhood, it was thought, might be very helpful to young converts whose isolated position is one of peculiar trial.

Independent Catholics.—J. V. McNamara, late Bishop among the Independent Catholics, has joined the Baptists. He professes a call to preach in Rome and Ireland.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Jewish House-Cleaning.—The strange immunity of the Jews from the ravages of pestilential diseases, even under circumstances of a social kind most favorable to them, can, I think, be fully accounted for on this ground and no other, that by the yearly complete cleansing of the house, the accumulation of the organic substances which act as the poisons of the spreading diseases, is prevented. Once in twelve months certainly, the Jewish house is absolutely cleansed of the perilous stuff that plagues are made of.

The above remarks of Dr. B. W. Richardson may serve to satisfy some of our readers, who find their comforts abridged and themselves inconvenienced for a time, by the purifying operation to which our nice house-keepers annually subject their houses and all the contents.

A Good Samaritan.—I read with much interest in your last issue the following passage: "I observed a curious thing one day lately. Some food had been thrown to the starving birds by some good Christian, when a rook came down and flew back to where he had left another rook sitting in a very weak-looking condition, and fed her with what he had picked up. This he did twice in my sight before taking any thing himself. It was a very interesting sight, and I was very much pleased with it."

I was particularly struck with it, because I had some time previously received from a correspondent in Wales, a stranger to me, a precisely similar account of another of these birds. "What I wanted to mention was this: One day, in the bitterest of the weather, when I was sure our friend, the rook I have spoken of, was indeed reduced to great extremities, the bird, nevertheless, performed the following good deed: It picked up a bit of bread, carried it to another rook which sat on the terrace wall, too shy to come nearer, and fed it there. Nor was this after having satisfied its own hunger, for it had only just alighted." When I put this little story down I had a misgiving that any one who might read it would scarcely be disposed to believe it, as beyond credibility. I was therefore much gratified at having so soon afterward seen such an exactly similar fact recorded in corroboration of it, as above. It was, indeed, I think, a very touching incident, and one to make every one, I should hope, who reads it, have much good feeling for all God's creatures.—Land and Water.

No amount of training can make a gentleman or gentlewoman unless the gentle spirit be within. A recent writer has well said that the root of manners springs from the soil of the heart. "Politeness may be a social virtue," he adds, "but it can only be true and sincere when springing from refinement of mind. Kindliness of heart will cause its influence to be felt in a degree bearing towards all; and the secret of art in manners may be found by acting on the principle of making every one as happy as lies in our power."

From Evangelical Messenger: "It is better to have thorns in the flesh with grace to endure them, than to have no thorns and no grace."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 12, 1881.

We have received a printed copy of the Minutes of Western Yearly Meeting of Friends of the Smaller Body, held at Sugar Grove, Indiana, and commencing 9th mo. 16th, 1881.

From this it appears that epistles were received from the corresponding bodies in Iowa, Kansas, Canada and New England; and replies prepared to these communications. A committee of men and women Friends was appointed to attend at Western Yearly Meeting and present the epistle.

The committee appointed last year to extend labor to subordinate meetings reported, and were continued "to labor, as ability may be afforded, with meetings or individuals, for their restoration and establishment in the doctrines, testimonies and usages of our Society."

The answer to the queries show a concern to maintain the testimonies of Friends to plainness, simplicity of dress, language and deportment. The members are reported to be clear "of importing, vending, distilling and the unnecessary use of all intoxicating liquors."

"A meeting for worship and a Preparative by the name of Poplar Grove, in Howard County, has been reorganized, and attached to Westfield Monthly Meeting."

Reports were received from Committees on Peace and Temperance, Education, Books and Tracts, and First-Day Schools for Scriptural instruction; and those committees were continued under appointment.

One feature in the proceedings which differs from the practice in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, is the submission to the Yearly Meeting of a report from the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, containing a summary of the answers to the queries addressed to the members of that body, and the minutes adopted by it to embody the exercise felt in it when those answers were under consideration.

There are seasons in the experience of the Christian when the comforting feeling of the Divine presence is much withdrawn; and days and weeks pass by while the mind is oppressed with an apparent coldness and insensibility as to spiritual life and warmth. At such times he is ready to exclaim with Job, "Oh, that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when His candle shined upon my head, and when by His light I walked through darkness; as I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle."

Such dispensations we believe have their use. They tend to humble the individual, to show him his dependence on the Lord for his own spiritual food, to awaken more earnest hunger for that bread which comes from God, to make him willing to labor in the Lord's cause, and to awaken the petition, "Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priests' offices, that I may eat a piece of bread." After passing through such a proving season, it is a relief to have the mind brought under religious exercise, and a willingness is felt to perform services which are in the cross to our own natural inclinations. The subject to persons such as these is accepted as an evidence that we are not altogether cast off, and we are affected as was the prophet Isaiah, who, after the live coal from off the holy altar had been placed upon his lips, was willing to perform the errands of the Lord.

Surely the advice given to the "overseers and watchmen of the flock" by the minute sent down from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to its branches, in 1850, is applicable to all:—"to be found diligent in their respective allotments, remembering that the time of their probation is short; that, as those who must give account, they may discharge with uprightness and singleness of heart to the Lord, their religious duties to Him and to the Church."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Lionel S. Sackville-West, the new British Minister, arrived in Washington on Seventh-day afternoon.

The public debt was diminished during the 10th month $13,321,458, which makes the decrease since 6th March 30th—the beginning of the current fiscal year—$55,064,345, or at the rate of $165,000,000 per year. The statement of the assets and liabilities of the Treasury at the Treasury at the end of 10th month, owned $167,755,609 gold coin and bullion, against $169,122,024 at the beginning of the month; that the amount of silver owned at the end of the month was $37,146,570, against $42,447,784, at the beginning. It is notable that there were outstanding $66,327,031 silver certificates, against a total of standard silver dollars in the Treasury of $66,576,378, so that the limit of the issue of silver certificates on the present stock of silver dollars has about been reached.

The Second Comptroller of the Treasury, in his report for the fiscal year ending on the 30th last, shows that 12,635 against claims and claims of every kind were settled in his office during that period, and that the amount allowed thereon aggregated $114,476,554.

According to the report of the Government examiner the assets of the Merchants' National Bank of Newark, N. Jersey, are $2,495,252, and its liabilities $4,146,252. The schooner "Golden Fleece," which left San Francisco on 7th month 18th, with Lieutenant Ray and the Signal Service party, to establish a meteorological station at Point Barrow, returned on Seventh-day afternoon. The Captain reports that on 10th mo. 7th, he took the whaling bark, Dawn, in Behring's Sea, and learned that in the latter part of 9th month the Dawn had spoken the U. S. States relief steamer Rodgers in the Arctic Ocean. Captain Perry, of the Rodgers, had circumnavigated Wrangel Land, establishing its insular character, but failed to find any trace of the Jennette. He intended to enter on Wrangel Land or on the neighboring Siberian coast.

The U. S. steamer Alliance, Captain Wadeigh, arrived at Halifax on the 1st inst., on her return to New York from the Arctic seas. During her four months' cruise on coasts of Norway, Greenland and Iceland, she had not saw nor heard anything of the missing Jennette.

The total catch of mackerel at all the New England ports, including Boston, for the season ending 11th mo. 1st, was 321,430 barrels, against 240,961 last year.

It is stated that Chang Chao Yee, the new Chinese Minister to the United States, is also accredited to Peru, and that he will go to Peru, after settling arrangements at Washington, for his permanent residence. Our State Department has not received any official information of his appointment.

A signal station is to be established on the volcano of Elicol in the Sandwich Islands, in connection with the weather service of the United States.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health states that there were 324 deaths in this city last week, 11 more than during the same period last year, and 17 less than during the week ending 10th mo. 29th, 1881. Of the number 163 were males, and 161 females; 50 died of consumption, 18 of diphtheria, 17 of typhoid fever, 17 of old age.

Markets.—C. U. S. 3½'s, 101½; 4½'s, registered 112½; coupon, 112½; 4's, 110½; currency 5's, 132.

Cotton.—There is no material change to notice in prices of the various grades of cotton. The market is at 11½ to 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans. Retractions.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ & 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull and prices favor buyers. Sales of 1700 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7.50 for clear, and at $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $6.22; western do. do. at $7.25 & $7.75, and patents at $8 & $9. Rye flour moves slowly at $5.62 to $6.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and 1 c. per bushel lower. Sales of 2700 bushels red amber at $1.39 & $1.41. At the option 1000, 5000 bushels at $1.40 & $1.42; 1000 bushels do. sold at $1.43 for 12th month. Rye dull at $1 for Pennsylvania. Corn is in moderate request. Sales of 8000 bushels, including yellow, at 70 cts.; mixed at 68 & 69 cts.; steamer at 69 cts.; No. 3 at 69 cts., and rejected at 68 cts. Oats are dull and unchanged. Sales of 9500 bushels, including white, at 50 & 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 48 & 49 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at former rates 4500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ & 7 cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

Sleep were in demand and prices were a fraction higher. 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2½ & 5½ cts., and lambs at 3½ & 7 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were in demand; 5000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 7 & 10 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—The English Old Testament Company have finished their seventy-first session. The second revision of Isaiah was carried as far as xlv. 14.

The British Board of Trade returns for 10th month, show an increase in the value of exports of £2,539,021, and an increase in the value of imports of £3,571,253, as compared with the same month of the preceding year. The number of applications to the Land Commission to fix fair rent, now reaches sixteen thousand. The Freeman's Journal predicts that the Land Court will fail because of the overwhelming mass of business.

An application has been made to the Dublin Land Court, to fix the rent of a holding in Cork, where the valuation is £27, and the present rent £113. Lord Justice O'Hagan said the figures were very startling.

A curious plan has been adopted in some parts of the West of Ireland, with the view of keeping the "no rent" manifesto before the tenants. It takes the form of a promissory note which has been circulated among the farmers attending a fair at Moate, county Westmeath. The note is a promise to pay rent on the day Parnell, Davitt, and other suspects are released. It is intended that the note shall be signed by the tenants and sent to landlords.

Truth says that the late Baron James Rothschild incurred losses on the Bourse in 10th month, amounting to $16,000,000, and that his anxiety caused the bursting of an aneurism.

The same correspondent says he is assured that negotiations are still actively proceeding for absolute cession of all territory north of the river Mejerda, in Africa, to France. The insurgents number about fifty thousand fighting men, and a march is necessary in an almost unknown country before the French can come up with them.

Berlin, 11th mo. 1st.—Corrected complete returns from 335 election districts show that, of the successful candidates 44 are Conservatives, 22 Free Conservatives, 100 members of the Centre party, 31 National Liberals, 24 secessionists, 35 Progressists, 3 members of the city of Berlin, 15 Poles and 17 Protestants and Protesters. The politics of four of the successful candidates are not defined. One hundred second ballots are necessary.

The first complete railway tunnel, carrying 100 passengers, passed through the St. Gothard tunnel recently in Italy.

The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Standard says: "Last week numerous Nihilist proclamations were distributed about the city, and several copies were thrown into the barracks of the Imperial Guard. It is stated that the Czar has lately received many threatening missives."

The correspondent of the Times at Darjeeling, India, says the deaths from epidemic choleraic fever at Umritsar amount to 9000, or ten times the normal rate of mortality for the past few years.

Fifteen thousand immigrants are reported to have arrived in Lima this year.

Advices from Buenos Ayres of the 8th ult., state that the Government of Chili has sent a special mission to Peru to conclude a treaty of peace or to provide for the complete military occupation of Peru. Advices to the 11th report that the United States Minister at Santiago has advised the Chilean Government that his Government would not interfere in the negotiations for a treaty of peace with Peru.

WANTED.

A young woman Friend is wanted in a Friend's family to assist in the teaching and care of the children, and in some of the lighter household duties.

Apply through this office.

THE CORPORATION OF HAVERFORD COLLEGE.

An adjourned Annual Meeting of "The Corporation of Haverford College" will be held in the Lecture room, Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Fifth-day, Eleventh month 17th, 1881, at 3 o'clock P.M.

EDWARD BETTLE, Jr., Secretary.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

New Frankford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at her residence in Germantown, Pa., Fifth month 23rd, 1881, SARAH ANN MATLACK, in the 70th year of her age, an esteemed member and overseer of Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends.

Her sudden decease took place in Frankford, on the 26th of the Eighth month, SARAH A. DEACON, wife of Benjamin H. Deacon, and daughter of Robert R. Levick. Her desire was to seek for an increase of that living faith whereby we shall be enabled to serve the Lord with the whole heart, and with increased diligence and fervency of spirit.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, ELEVENTH MONTH 19, 1881.

NO. 15.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 106.)

The letter of Thomas Hewitt to Pres. Reed, printed in the last number of these "Notes," is not the only evidence remaining of his readiness to act on mere vague suspicions in oppressing his peaceable neighbors who were willing to co-operate in the military movements which he favored.

He had already been a prominent actor in the seizure, imprisonment and exile of a number of the inhabitants of Catawissa. This is the occurrence which caused the suspension of the meeting for worship at that place, reported by Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting in 1780. On the 9th of the Fourth month of that year, fifteen of the Catawissa people are arrested and taken prisoners to Sunbury. Several of these were not members of our Society, and were soon after released on giving bond not to return to the county till after the conclusion of the war. Others, who felt themselves to be innocent men, against whom no relation of any law could justly be charged, were unwilling so to compromise their standing, and refused to be bound, demanding an open trial. This they could not obtain, and so of them, who were members with Friends Moses Roberts and Job Hughes—were sent to Lancaster gaol, where they were imprisoned for many months. Their wives were soon afterwards turned out of their homes by armed men, not even allowed time to take care for their journey, and with their seven children (one less than five weeks old), compelled to make their way as best they could across the mountain wilderness lying between them and Berks county. In its precincts they finally found friends who gave them shelter till the storm was overpast. Much of the valuable property they left behind was plundered and destroyed.

The mittimus signed by Thomas Hewitt, which accompanied the prisoners to Lancaster, stated that they were committed to gaol, upon suspicion of high treason. "These severity of injustice with which they had been treated, awakened the earnest sympathy of their fellow-members, who made repeated efforts to procure their release, and to induce the authorities to examine into their case and give them an opportunity of maintaining their innocence. Their efforts were for a long time ineffectual. Several of them called on President Joseph Reed, who told them that the only information that had reached the Council was a letter from a magistrate in one of the back counties (probably Hewitt) which stated that the prisoners were supposed to hold intercourse with Indians and white people who had committed divers outrages on the frontier inhabitants, and that a paper had been found in the pocket of one of the white men who was slain, containing the names of the prisoners. The Council would not enter into an examination. Several interviews were afterwards had with Chief Justice McKean and Judge Atlee of Lancaster, to induce them to try the cases of these Friends, or to release them on parole till wanted—but they seemed unwilling to bring the imprisoned Friends into court. It is quite probable that they were desirous of sparing the committing magistrates the reproach of a public exposure of their harshness and injustice, knowing that there was no accuser, and that no proof of guilt could be produced against the Friends.

The Friends of that day testified, that they found no foundation for the story of a paper being found on a slain refugee with their names inserted; and expressed their belief that the sole cause of the cruel treatment was enmity and a thirst for plunder. Though stripped of nearly all their outward substance and cruelly oppressed, they were preserved in patience and resignation of spirit. The Meeting for Sufferings at its meeting 6th mo. 22d, 1780, having appropriated £20 for their support in Lancaster gaol, they wrote a letter to John Pemberton, a few days afterwards, acknowledging the reception of the money. In this letter they say: "We are pretty well in health, and desire to be resigned under confinement, until the Almighty shall be pleased to make way for our deliverance. We desire the prayers of all faithful Friends." With part of the money sent them they purchased leather, and settled down in prison to making shoes.

After about seven months' imprisonment, each of the two sufferers drew up a statement of his case, which was entrusted to a committee of the Meeting for Sufferings to be laid before the General Assembly of Pennsylvania. In these documents, testimony is borne to the merciful overshadowings of Divine favor, and the continuance of the Lord's loving kindness, comforting and supporting under this unjust confinement. There could to give bail is placed on the ground of "being conscientiously scrupulous of doing anything that may be a precedent for wicked and designing men to oppress the innocent by." The assembly is asked to consider whether liberty (which was the pretext for the war) "is not in danger of being turned into cruel slavery, tyranny and oppression by such arbitrary proceedings;" and "whether the government you are establishing is not in danger of being more corrupt than that from under which you are come, if such work as this is allowed of and acknowledged."

No decisive action appears to have been taken by the Assembly in consequence of this address, and the patient sufferers were continued in prison for a year or more afterwards. Their case was kept under the care of a committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, who seem to have made efforts for their relief from time to time.

In the latter part of the year 1781, Friends of Philadelphia were much abused by the populace for not illuminating their houses on one occasion. This drew forth a calm and dignified statement of the grounds of the testimony, our Society has always borne against military operations and all things connected therewith—a testimony which is the legitimate result of the teachings of the gospel of Christ. The document also referred to the settlement of Pennsylvania by their ancestors, who encountered the hardships attendant on moving into the wilderness in order that they might enjoy the peaceable exercise of their conscientious convictions; and it alluded to the hardship it was, that their successors in religious belief should be vilified and abused for the maintenance of the same principles.

This statement was presented to the Supreme Executive Council and also the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and 2000 copies were printed for general distribution. It was adopted by the Meeting for Sufferings on the 22d of 11th month, 1781, and at the meeting of that body on the 20th of 12th month following, information was received of the release of Moses Roberts and Job Hughes from their tedious imprisonment. It is probable the release may have been one of the results of the effort to plead the cause of truth which so shortly preceded it, but of this I have found no definite statement.

Moses Roberts drew up a narrative of the circumstances and motives which led to his settling at Catawissa; and of his seizure and imprisonment; which throws so much light on the early history of Friends in that neighborhood and is so interesting in itself, that it is here inserted.

A Narrative of my going to and living in the New Purchase in the County of Northumberland, and of my being taken prisoner by Thomas Hewitt on the 9th day of the 4th mo. 1780, according to the best of my remembrance.

About the time that I married, I removed from Plymouth township in the County of Philadelphia, to the township of Oley in the County of Berks, and settling on a farm lived there some years; and the first time that I saw the New Purchase, George Nagle, High Sheriff for Berks County, summoned me and others to view some land in dispute and serve on a Jewry between the Proprietors of Pennsylvania, plaintiffs, and Samuel Wallace, defendant. Although I did not use to be forward in serving on Jewrys, yet I felt an uncommon freedom to attend on that. So at the time appointed I went with the Sheriff and others to view the land at Muncy, and when we came amongst the inhabitants of the New Purchase, I lamented the loose and irreligious lives and conversations of the people. Yet there was something that attracted my mind much to the country, which I could scarcely account for; and sometime after I returned home I felt drawings of love in my heart to visit some friendly people about Catawsey, and to have a meeting amongst them for the worship of God; of which I acquainted my friends at Maiden Creek, and their consenting, I performed it and returned in company with my uncle Mordecai Lee; and found great inward peace to attend my mind in so doing.

And still my mind and inclinations drew me much into the New Purchase; and with the consent of my friends, I several times visited them, and had meetings for worship near Catawsey aforesaid, and was felt the sweetest rest and inward peace with God in my soul for my obedience. And still it often worked in my mind both day and night, that I should endeavour to settle a meeting for the worshiping of the Lord Almighty in the New Purchase. And at length I was persuaded in my conscience that the love of Christ constrained me to go there and live with my family; of which I acquainted my friends of Exeter Mountain. And after some time of consideration they left me to my liberty, which was about two years after my first going to Muncy. And about five years ago, I removed with my family, and settled on a piece of land which I bought of Ellis Hughes, near Catawsey. And we concluded to meet together twice in the week for to worship the Father in spirit and in truth, according to Christ's directions to the woman of Samaria. And I was often confirmed in my mind by the consolation of soul that I felt, that I was in the way of my duty.

(To be continued.)

J. W.

For "The Friend."

Moonshine Religion.

The Bible tells us that in the beginning, "God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night." And John, in the wonderful revelations which he had, and which are left on record for us, represents the true Church under the figure of a "woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars." Does not this represent the true and living Church, crowned with glory and honor from above? A church clothed with the sun of righteousness—adorned with the brilliancy of the greater light and the stars of heaven? Being ruled by Christ, the life and light of men—the true unchangeable and everlasting light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world; and in which "the nations of them that are saved shall walk." While the moon—"the lesser light"—the borrowed light—the reflected light—the changeable light—has to be kept under foot; for it is not to rule in the great and notable day of the Lord. And so far as we undertake to scan the things which belong to the heavenly day, by the lesser light which might be compared to the light of reason—the light of education—the light of cultivated intellect, &c.—so far we fail; not knowing the scriptures nor the power of God. But the moon, or the "lesser light," like all other reflected or borrowed lights, as alluded to above, is good in its place; but should be kept under foot, in comparison with the great unchangeable and everlasting light of God's eternal day. The smaller lights are to rule, and properly so too, in the darkness of this world, in order to enable us to see and understand concerning the needful things rightly belonging to the outward or natural man. But let us, as spiritual men, seeking a spiritual inheritance beyond the grave, while we have the greater light for our guide, believe in it, and be led and ruled by it, that we may become the children of that light, and of God's eternal unchangeable day.

I sincerely fear that some of the religion of the present day is what we might call a moonshine religion; which is ruled by a light that has no more stability or vital warmth about it than the light of the moon—a light which can never bring life and immortality to light because it lacks the gospel power—a light that can never shine more and more to the perfect day; because it waxes old and changes; and is forever ebbing and flowing like the waves of the sea—a light which is only reflected, by spells, from the great unchangeable and everlasting light, the Sun of righteousness. Christ is the unchangeable light of the world. And they that are ruled by Him, and follow Him, will not walk in darkness (spiritually) because their life and light is everlasting, and "cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness neither shadow of turning;" but is the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

The Psalmist tells us, and we have great reason to believe the truth of it, that man is "fearfully and wonderfully made." And we see he is endowed, by his beneficent Creator, with a heavenly wisdom, and an earthly wisdom—a heavenly light and an earthly light—a greater light and a lesser light; the greater light to rule in heavenly things, and the lesser light to rule in earthly things—all right and good except as perverted by sin. But as it now is, the prevailing religious element seems to be too much ruled by that which may be compared to "the lesser light," making our religion very much like a moonshine religion, without vitality and warmth, or growth in the immortal life; too destitute of that quickening Spirit which first moved on the unstable element and said "let there be light and there was light." But as our faith is so we may expect it to be with us. If our faith stands more in the wisdom and eloquence and light of men, than in the light and power of God, we shall be left to the wisdom of men, which is foolishness with God; and the Divine power will forsake us. If we prefer the moonshine light to the splendor of the gospel day, or to that light which clothes the true Church, we shall be left to our choice. "He will give us our request, but send leanness into the soul." But instead of this, let David's prayer be our prayer: "O send forth thy light and thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me to thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles." O God! For "in thy light shall we see light." Then shall our light rise out of obscurity; and our darkness be as the noonday." And the glorious time will come when "the sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but the Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory; and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

Now choose ye whom ye will serve, or what light ye will follow. "If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him." Or the time may come in which it will be said, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone." For the Lord's Spirit will not always strive with man. He that is filthy will be left to be filthy still; while he that is holy, will be holy still; and will "shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and forever." But let us remember, "these are they which came up out of great tribulations, (did not sink under them,) and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood (or life-giving virtue) of the Lamb." And have joined "the general assembly and church of the first born," in that holy "city that has no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it; for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 10th mo. 31st, 1851.

For "The Friend."

Winter and Its Dangers.

This is the title of one of the series of American Health Primers. The present volume is from the pen of Dr. Osgood, and its contents are appropriate to this season of year, when winter weather will soon be upon us.

The subjects most prominently treated by Dr. Osgood, are the effects of cold and impure air on the system, both of which are more difficult to guard against in winter than in summer.

The animal heat of a living body is generated by the slow process of combustion which is continually going on within it, by which the worn out portions of the system are removed, and their place supplied by new material derived mainly through the digestion of food. The blood from within conveys warmth to the skin, and there loses a certain portion of its heat, which is regained on its return to the internal organs. When an animal is long exposed to a degree of cold so intense that the loss of heat from the body is greater than the supply, the temperature becomes lowered to a point where the functions of the body cannot be carried on, and life ceases. It is to prevent the too rapid waste of the vital heat, that clothing is worn. This has no warmth in itself; it simply acts by its non-conducting power to prevent the escape of the internal heat.

In cases where the chilling of the system is not carried so far, evil results may still follow. One of the first effects of cold is to cause the contraction of the muscular fibres in the small arteries so abundantly diffused through the skin. This throws the blood inward, and produces increased pressure on the heart and larger arteries. When, therefore, cold weather comes on abruptly, sudden deaths among the fragile and aged are common, the cause being apoplexy or arrest of the heart, perhaps consequent on the congestion of the lungs.

The checking of the perspiration, which is constantly going on through the pores of the skin, is another effect of chill or sudden cold. This throws increased labor on other organs of the body, and frequently leads to inflammation or other disease, which is apt to settle in the weakest part of the system.

These considerations clearly point out the necessity of varying the clothing with the weather. Perhaps as good a general rule can be given is, to wear such an amount of, and of such a kind as will keep all parts of the body in a state of comfort. Young children of course are helpless in this respect, and must wear what their parents put upon them. It should be borne in mind that the power of producing heat is less in them and in the aged than in the more vigorous period of middle life; and therefore both of these classes require warmer clothing than will suffice for one of the strength of his days.

Dr. Osgood says: "There are now word strong enough to characterize the folly of those parents who think it right to 'harden' their children by forcing them to face the cold sufficiently clad. "By this means," sharply says one writer, "children are hardened out of the world." If it were possible to compute the number of children who lose their lives simply because they are not warmly enough dressed, the statistics would startle fathers and mothers."

Winter clothing should be worn loosely, so that there may be a layer of warm air between it and the body. Any portion that binds the skin impedes the circulation, and thus produces evil, as well as being less effective in retaining the natural warmth.

Wool should always be worn in cold weather next the skin, as it is much more effective in retreating from cold and chill than linen or cotton goods. The doctor says a "hatred of woolen undergarments on the part of women is as common as it is inexplicable. It causes a loss of many treasured lives." He mentions several cases that occurred in his own practice. In one of these the patient suffered from terrible headaches and neuralgia. By putting on heavy suits of merino underwear, the overtasked system was relieved, and the aches and aches disappeared. In another case, the woman had been subject to severe attacks of bronchitis from the 11th to the 15th months. The slightest change in the weather brought her a sore throat. "In her case," he says, "I recommended a light suit of merino next the skin, over this a second of heavy, all-wool merino, both suits being made in one piece, so that there were only two instead of four neckpieces at the waist. Wearing this protection, the lady has not had a cough once during the past winter. She was formerly one of the bitterest enemies to woolen underwear. It irritated the skin. It kept her in a constant fever. It ruined the fit of her dresses, &c. I had the greatest difficulty in overcoming her prejudice to what she finally accepted as her chief protection."

Winter clothing should protect all parts of the body. "The habit of piling clothing upon the upper parts of the body, while the limbs and feet are neglected, is both injurious and dangerous. If a person is attempting to protect the lungs, he will succeed better by wearing heavy drawers, stockings and boots, than by neglecting the feet and overloading the chest."

As much clothing is needed in the damp, chilly weather of the Eleventh month as in the dry, clear cold of mid-winter. Moist air is a good conductor of heat, and in such weather the body loses warmth rapidly, and becomes chilled if not sufficiently clad. Our author gives this caution: "I cannot too strongly impress the fact that many lung diseases are contracted during these uncertain seasons by improper dress. The winter underwear should be put on early and worn late, if a day be very warm, the change must be made in the outside garments."

One of the chapters of Dr. Osgood's book is headed, "Inattention to Pulmonary Food." His title, he says, was "suggested by the story of a physician who had vainly tried to reveal upon his patient—a nervous, hysterical lady—to admit fresh air to her chamber. He never failed to find the atmosphere of the room close and sickening. The patient's hobby was a search for the cause of her low tone of system. Her physician argued in favor of fresh air. But nothing could induce that woman to have her window opened. At last, in desperation, the doctor one day said, "I have concluded that the whole cause of your condition is dirty food." Being extremely fastidious in regard to her meals, the patient for a moment was speechless with indignation, but finally burst out with, "Doctor, what do you mean by such language? My food dirty!" "Oh!" he said, "I did not mean to refer to the food you eat. That, of course, is in a proper condition; although, if it were not quite clean, it probably would do you no harm. I was alluding to the food you give your lungs, and through them to your blood. With all the earnestness of a conscientious man and physician, he then again explained to her the condition of the air she constantly inhaled. How it reeked with carbonic acid, decaying matter, personal effluvia; how unwashed and foul it was, and expressed his astonishment that she, a dainty, fastidious person in other respects, could breathe over and over again the air which had once swept out her lungs and those of her attendants. The patient became so embarrassed as to be unable to reply. But the startling revelation to which she had listened converted her. The doctor never again had occasion to allude to the matter."

Pure air is necessary to health at all seasons, but the subject is mentioned among the dangers of winter, because at that season a free circulation of the air is not so readily procured, and the danger of injury from coal, illuminating and sewer gas, and other impurities, is greater, as well as that from breathing an over-heated and unnaturally dry atmosphere produced by heating apparatus.

For "The Friend."

Overmuch Learning.

It has, perhaps, been well said, that "Learning is an excellent thing, when it is not the best thing a man has." The danger lies in giving it too much place; or, in other words, of making an idol of the human understanding. This is especially to be apprehended in the youthful aspirant of the present day, of enlarged opportunity, of cumulative ambition, of sanguine hopes. But is not the true light in which this power should be considered that of the hand-maid of religion? Without this agency and aid, may it not promote our ability to do mischief; and that scripture be painfully verified, "He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow?" Knowledge, oftentimes, so far from being wisdom is but as the light of the moon to it—bright and attractive, but without warmth or influence. Whereas wisdom, which primarily leads to, or is an humble experimental acquaintance with our own extreme frailty and weakness, induces, at the same time, a childlike dependence upon, and trust in the unfailing Source of everlasting strength; and thus, like ballast to a ship, steadies and preserves us when in imminent danger of being puffed up with high thoughts of ourselves—our extensive knowledge and advantages.

Is not one reason why "Not many wise men, after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble" were, according to the Apostle, called to proclaim the precious truths of the religion of Jesus, in part to be attributed to the danger of such trusting too much to their own abilities and learning, and an arm of flesh, instead of that simplicity, and meekness, and filial trust and dependence, becoming "babes in Christ" who have no might of their own? Most true it is that those whom the Lord loves and honors, and upon whom He bestows his richest gifts, have ever been such, whether learned or unlearned, as have felt their own impotency and littleness; and that without Him they are nothing and can do nothing promotive of his cause or honor. Thus Paul, learned and distinguished and faithful as he was, laid all his worldly wisdom at the feet of Gamaliel, where he obtained it; and counting all things as loss and dross compared with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Saviour, determined to know nothing among those to whom he went to preach the gospel of life and salvation save Jesus Christ and him crucified. His learning was ever held subordinate to the great aim of his new-born life, and was esteemed by him in proportion to the help it gave him to promote the spread of Christianity among his fellow men. He gloried in his infirmities, that the power of Christ might rest upon him; and his chief delight in the possession of every temporal blessing was, in that he had something of value in the world's account to offer in willing sacrifice upon the altar of fidelity and allegiance to Christ.

The writer does not mean to plead for ignorance—which would be to err on the other hand—neither against a wholesome liberal amount of useful learning; but only the excessive or overmuch attention to it for its own sake independent of its need for the necessary duties of this life, and its aid in the advancement of Christian truth. "Knowledge puffeth up," and can the motive be a worthy one, which prompts to the pursuit of it in order that the possessor may revel in the worldly advantages of notoriety, distinction, and esteem among men? May it not, in this sense, be idolized as well as riches or worldly fame? What difference does it make to us, as respects our actual bondage, whether the bond that holds us be a golden or an iron chain, whether made of silken thread, or of hempen cord? Whatever habitually obstructs obedience to the saving light of Christ in the heart, or intercepts that communion with Him which gives life to the soul, must be rated as an idol. The danger consists in pursuing it too exclusively, and too far; and without a single eye to the last suffering here, which it cannot ease, and the great avail hereafter, which it cannot propitiate. Human learning is not able to sustain the mind in trouble, nor solace and support it on the bed of languishing and of death. Hence the superlative importance, in the language of a wise and good man, of "appropriating all the gifts of Divine Providence to the purposes for which they were intended." And whether learned in all the knowledge of the schools, after the manner of this ambitious sage, or "unlearned and ignorant" as were some of the apostles of our Lord, we may alike manifest as did those of the latter class, that "they had been with Jesus;" and were more engaged to lay up treasure in heaven, than in seeking after the perishable emoluments or honors of this fading and deceitful world.

The contemplation of that august event which transpired or culminated nearly nineteen hundred years ago on Mount Calvary, with its consequences immediate and remote—its purchased redemption, its saving grace, abiding anointing, and Spirit of truth as our guide into all truth—is calculated so to humble under a lively sense of our obligations to redeeming love and mercy, that with contrite hearts and subdued spirits we are brought to look upon all that the world calls great as comparatively too insignificant and evanescent to claim much of our consideration or regard; and that a mind disciplined by Christian principle, and leavened with Christian emulation, love and hope, are the only safeguards against the overmuch or immature desire for the fruit of the tree of knowledge.

At a meeting in Japan where a number of our Christian girls were gathered together, the subject was—How to glorify Christ by our lives." One of the girls said: "It seems to me like this: one spring my mother got some flower-seeds, little, ugly, black things, and planted them; they grew and blossomed beautifully. One day a neighbor coming in and seeing these flowers, said: 'O, how beautiful! I must have some, too; won't you please give me some seed?' Now, if this neighbor had only just seen the flower-seeds, she wouldn't have cared for them; 'twas only when she saw how beautiful was the blossom that she wanted the seed. And so with Christianity; when we speak to our friends of the truths of the Bible, they seem to them hard and uninteresting, and they say; 'We don't care to hear about these things; they are not so interesting as our own stories'; but, when they see these same truths blossoming out in our lives into our kindly words, and good acts, then they say: 'How beautiful these lives! What makes them different from the others lives?' And when they hear that 'tis the Jesus-teaching, then they say: 'We must have it, too!' And thus, by our lives, more than by our tongues, we can preach Christ to our unbelieving friends.—Advocate and Guardian.

The doctrines of Christian experience, of this modern or regressive movement, are summed up in two sentences. An instantaneous justification, by the "exercise of faith in the blood of Christ." An instantaneous sanctification by the exercise of faith in the "cleansing power of Christ." This "two experience" doctrine is about as far removed from the doctrine of early Friends as is the doctrine of any other denomination in the world. And as for Scripture teaching; either as a doctrine, or by types of examples, it is utterly without foundation; and the sooner it is abandoned by its misguided believers the better it will be for the world and the Church.

Any doctrine that teaches that God justifies an unholty thing, or that a man may be justified and in a "saved state," and yet not sanctified, is putting a premium on wickedness, whether they so intend it or not. Mixed audiences of sinners, backsliders, &c., are taught that they may all "go out of this house justified and saved to-night," if they will only exercise faith in the "blood of Christ." But if such teaching is true one night, it would be true the next night. If a man believed such a gospel, he might sin all day, the next day, and be justified at night. We believe that the practical effect of such teaching is to establish sinners in a feeling of self-complacency, that it does not matter if they do sin, for they can get justified the next time one of those revivalists comes around and preaches his instantaneous doctrine.

Christian experience is a spiritual change, the "old man," or old nature, or "life of the flesh," is slain or crucified, and put off; and the new nature, the "new man," or life of the Spirit is put on. It is a deep spiritual work. It is no mere imputation; it is through the renewing of the Holy Spirit. It is presented to us in the New Testament as a being "born again," "risen from the dead," "adopted as a son," "created anew," "baptized," "circumcised," "justified," "translated into the Kingdom of God," or sanctified; these are not different parts of salvation or experience, but the various Scripture words by which, in metaphor, the one great change from nature to grace is presented to us. Each type or metaphor, is complete in itself; only based on, or adapted to different views of the condition of man in the fall.—From The Western Friend.

ASPIRATION.

Selected.

With timid hand a little laid,
From hunger faint and ill,
Knocked at my door one autumn night,
At twilight gray and chill.

For broken bits of food he begged,
In such a humble way,
That, had my heart been made of steel,
I could not say him nay.

He entered when I bade, and crouched
Within a corner dim;
And ate in hungry haste the food
I quickly proffered him.

Bright home life glimpses strange and sweet,
Through open doorways stole;
And warmth and love awoke to life
The hunger of his soul.

That little, pleading, wistful face,
Undimpled by a smile,
I oft recall, at twilight gray;
Though years have lapsed the while.

Thus I through doubt and darkness pressed
My way, and we were saved,
And at the door of Faith and Hope,
In humble accents pray:

"O, grant me, Master, but the crumbs,
That from thy table fall;
And I indeed shall grateful be,
Although this gift be all."

Grateful, indeed, but not content;
I crave a richer store,—
"Dear Lord! the bread thy children share, Give me forevermore—"

"And let the warmth and light and love
Of kinship, peace impart,
In royal measure that shall fill
And satisfy my heart."

Selected.

LIVING WATERS.

There are some hearts like wells, green-mossed and deep
As ever summer saw;

And cool their water is, yes, cool and sweet,
But you must come to draw.
They hoard not, yet they rest in calm content,
And not unsought will give;

They can be quiet with their wealth unspent,
So self-contained they live.

And there are some like springs, that bubbling burst
To follow dusty ways,

And run with offered cup to quench his thirst
Where the tired traveller strays;
That never ask the meadows if they want
What is their joy to give;

Unasked, their lives to other life they grant,
So self-bestowed they live!

And one is like the ocean, deep and wide,
Wherein all waters fall;
That girdles the broad earth, and draws the tide,
Feeding and bearing all;
That broods the mists, that sends the clouds abroad,
That takes, again, to give;
Even the great and loving heart of God,
Whereby all love doth live.

Selected.

THE LAND OF THE LIVING.

Beautiful was the reply of a venerable man, to the question whether he wot in the land of the living? No; but I am almost there."

Not yet; though the fiat I feel has gone forth,
Not yet has the summons been spoken;
The frail, feeble link that connects me with earth
Not yet has been shattered and broken.
The kindred and friends of my earlier years,
Have long in the grave-yard been lying,
I, faint would depart from this valley of tears,
And pass from the land of the dying.

A few of the friends of my manhood are spared;
Alas! they are dull and repining;
They talk of hopes withered, of talents impaired,
Worn spirits, and vigor declining;
I suffer like them, yet I do not complain,
For God the assurance is giving
That soon shall I lay down my burden of pain
And haste to the land of the living.

I weep not for those whom on earth I loved well,
They are only removed to a distance;
The shroud and the pall, and the funeral knell,
Were their passport yet to deathless existence;
Like them may I soar to the realms of the blest
And join in the angels' thanksgiving;
In the land of the dying, sink softly to rest,
And awake in the land of the living.

Gold and Silver in the Desert.

BY H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

Another of the puzzling things in the Bible story of the wandering Israelites, is the abundance of gold and silver and precious stones which those fugitive slaves appear to have had ready on any call for religious gifts and offerings in the wilderness. Although they had been held in bitter bondage for generations, and therefore might fairly be counted poor in this world's goods, they first supplied golden ear-rings in sufficient quantity for a molten calf; and then, when that gold had been taken from them and destroyed, they responded to the summons for the tabernacle building and furnishing, with such an abundance of gold and silver ornaments, and of costly jewels, as would put to shame the contributions of wealthy givers in the richer cities of the world to-day in their highest enthusiasm of church erection. How can this be shown reasonable and consistent? Even the recorded fact, that the departing slaves had "borrowed" jewels of gold and jewels of silver, every man of his neighbor, and every woman of her neighbor, in the land of Egypt, without a thought of ever returning them, only throws a shade, in the popular mind, over the morality of the Israelites, without sufficiently making clear the possibility of their seemingly unstinted wealth. Here it is again that light is found in the unchanging peculiarities of the lands and the people of Egypt and Arabia.

To this day the women of both Egypt and Arabia adorn themselves with gold and silver coins and other ornaments, to an extent quite unknown in more enlightened lands, and far beyond their apparent wealth—as shown in their garments or their dwellings. Bracelets, anklets, ear-rings, nose-rings, finger-rings, brooches, necklaces and ornaments for the hair, are seen, not alone on the persons of the rich, but on those also who are scantily and coarsely clad, and who live in mud huts. Several causes combine to give prominence and permanency to this custom. There are no savings-banks in those lands, in which to deposit one's accumulations; nor are there any safe modes of investment at usury. The lack of confidence between man and man akes each person cling to what he has, as safe hands only while it is in his own lands. Therefore each new gold or silver coin as it is obtained is likely to be punctured, and attached by a wire to the string of coins already wound about the owner's head, hanging from the neck; and so the weight hoarded personal treasure grows. The more oppressive a system of bondage becomes in such a land, the more the enslaved will prize gold or silver for its own sake, and the less regard will be paid by those of that class to outer dress, or to an uncertain home and its furnishing.

Moreover, the system of polygamy, with its iniquities and hardships—prevailing in those lands to-day as it prevailed in the days of Moses—tends to make this loading of the person with gold and silver a temptation, and a certain sense a necessity, to the women there. A daughter of Archbishop Whately, who has done a wonderful work in the training of native children and youth in her mission-schools in Cairo—brought out this fact most emphatically as I talked with her in her school-rooms. Pointing to little girls—even led out of homes of poverty—who were busily adorned with strings of coins and thin ornaments of silver or gold, she spoke of the love of this kind of display prevailing among these people universally, and of her situation in rebuking it under the circumstances in which the women of Egypt found themselves, as otherwise she would be glad

"Any woman who is a wife," she said, "may, by the Egyptian laws, be divorced and sent away by her husband at any hour. Then she must leave her home and go out to get on the best she can. The law guards her, however, in the possession of whatever she may have upon her person. So, you see, that those rings and necklaces may come to be all important to these girls in their need. I can hardly, in conscience, insist that they shall strip themselves of that which alone is their property possession in the eye of the law."

Whatever causes may have led to this habit at the outset, the fact of it is indisputable; and the people themselves would perhaps be unable to tell why they indulge in it. The hoarding of gold and silver in coin and ornaments for the person is well-nigh universal in those lands. It begins in infancy; the child grows in years, constant additions are made to its stock of precious metals and personal adornings. A bride's dowry is reckoned upon her person. A wife's wealth is tried there. The men, meantime, store their treasures in coin and jewels out of sight, but out of mind. As we were traveling in the desert, near the site of Kadesh-barnea, one evening, there was a sudden halt in the camel train, and a jabbering in Arabic was heard among our Bedawin attendants in the darkness. Asking what had happened, we were told that my camel driver had lost out of gold and silver coin, and wanted to go up and hunt for it. That driver had every appearance of poverty; there were no ornaments of gold or silver on his person, and he did not yet been paid for his present camel-ride; but in a knotted corner of a coarse shawl wound about his single short and dirty outer garment, there had been tied up a stock of gold and silver that would have supplied him with parched corn or barley flour for the remainder of his natural life. The knot in his girdle slipping as he fingered it complacently in the darkness, his money had suddenly gone from him; and that was the cause of the jabbering. Then it was that a Yankee pocket-lantern did good service with its small wax taper, and as its light pointed out the missing money on the desert, there was a new light shed on the Bible story of the gold and silver in that same desert forty centuries ago.

That this has been the state of things in all the intervening ages, in both Egypt and Arabia, the testimony of sacred and profane history bears ample witness. Look at the paintings and sculptures of the Egyptian tombs and temples in evidence of this! See also the treasures of gold and silver and precious stones, in the shape of personal ornaments, unearthed from the tombs of Egypt, and gathered in the museums of Boulaq, Turin, the Louvre, and London! Read the story of Gideon's triumph over the Midianites at the plain of Jezreel, and of his request for a share of the spoil in this very line in the days of the Judges! "And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you, that ye would give me every man the ear-rings of his prey: (for they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ishmaelites)." The Bedawin of to-day are descendants of those Ishmaelites. "And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment, and did cast therein every man the ear-rings of his prey. And the weight of the golden ear-rings that he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold; besides ornaments, and collars, and purple raiment that was on the kings [sheikhs] of Midian, and besides the chains that were about their camels' necks." To-day the goldsmiths and silversmiths of the bazaars of Cairo and Jerusalem and Damascus are multiplying the personal ornaments of the women and children of the East to an extent unknown in the newer countries of the West, but always prevailing in the unchanged and unchangeable lands of Egypt, Arabia, and Syria. And on the desert to-day the Bedawin men and women have gold and silver ornaments upon their persons, and gold and silver coin hoarded away from sight, to an extent which brings the Bible story of the treasured wealth of the Israelites in that desert within the limits of entire reasonableness and probability.

Why, I have seen a Bedawin woman in that desert with a single scanty and filthy blue cotton garment, hurrying out of sight into her coarse black goat's-hair tent, faintly weighted down with her swaying head-dress and necklace of hanging coins, and with heavy nose-ring, and ear-rings, and bracelets, and anklets, of silver. And an old sheik, in the mid-desert, whose dress bespoke a disregard of appearances, if not a lack of means, asked my permission in securing the release of his nephew from custody at Jerusalem. He was ready to pay a thousand dollars, if necessary, for the employment of an English-speaking lawyer, and other thousands, if need be, for a ransom. He had the hoarded gold, and he could have brought it out if he had really become interested in the casting of a golden calf, or the building and furnishing of a tabernacle. If indeed no such use was made of it, he would pass it down to his children, and so its accumulations would increase, generation by generation, in his tribe and household. And so it has been in all these centuries.

(To be concluded.)

Testimonies to the Truth.

(Continued from page 116.)

Now, friends, I hope and believe that many of you here present, do abhor those abominations that are acted among many that are called Christians; you that hate and abhor these abominations, do not you retain that which is evil in the least degree; but now there are some that may abhor to be seen in abominable pride, and yet there may be something of that nature that doth in secret remain; and though they may seek to hide it from men in their profession, yet God will find them out; "If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear my prayer." See that you be a clear people, a people redeemed to God; do not halt between two opinions, that so you may come forth clear for God; you whose understandings God hath opened, see that you be preaching for God; do not keep correspondence with the spirit of the world, though you may have commerce and dealing among men; be watchful, keep yourselves from the evil of the world, as Christ prayed for his disciples, John xvii. 15: "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil." So that we must have a care that we partake not with them in their sins, lest we partake with them in their plagues.

Take heed of mixtures; this was an abomination in Israel; they were not to sow their land with mingled seed or grain, nor to wear garments of linen and woollen; take heed of the spirit of the world, do not mix with it, lest you be corrupted by it, and the enemy prevail. Sin will harden a people, the longer they go on in a course of sin, and the longer people take liberty in that which is vain, the harder they will grow, and the more stupid and benumbed, if they answer not the call of God to come out of the abomination of the world. God calleth us to purity and holiness, for without holiness, saith the apostle, no man shall see the Lord; they shall not see God to their comfort, to their joy and consolation. See that you be found in that holy way which God hath cast up; many men have been casting up ways of their own devising, but God hath cast up a way for the ransomed of the Lord, that the waytaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein. The unclean beasts have not trod in this way; the ransomed of the Lord, those that are redeemed from their vain conversation, are they that walk in this pure and holy way, the way of righteousness and truth; see that you be joined to the truth, and that will be for your good; not that God hath need of us, but we have need to be reconciled to Him. Man hath need of reconciliation to God his Maker, for he hath gone astray from Him, and hath been separated by reason of sin, and had need be reconciled.

Friends, I would have you to prize the mercy of God, and the day of his visitation. He hath stretched forth his hand, and his love and mercy have been extended to us; there are many good people, zealous people, that have desired to see the days that we now see, and have not lived to see them, but have died in the faith of this, that God would send forth more of his light, more of his grace to the children of men; and that the light of the moon should be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun as the light of seven days; many good people that are gone to their rest have died in the faith of it, though they never attained to see the days that we have seen. God hath stretched forth his hand to the nations, and sent forth his servants, to declare the glad tidings of peace and salvation, to be perfected through Christ Jesus the Mediator. Now, God hath made us partakers of this grace, and blessing; blessed be the Lord our God, who hath made a remnant partakers of it, that have given up their all, that they might enjoy truth, and be professors of the truth; and the Lord hath preserved this remnant through many tribulations, ever since we have been a people, the love of God, and his almighty power have surrounded us, and He hath gathered us to be a people. Many of us have living experience of the tender mercies and blessings of God; we cannot say that He hath been a bad Master; He hath not laid hard things upon us; He hath fed his flock like a shepherd; He hath gathered the lambs with his arm, and carried them in his bosom, and doth gently lead those that are with young, Isa. xl. 11. The Spirit of the Lord hath led us on gently, and hath instructed us according to our capacities; He hath not laid hard matters upon us, when we were as weak children, but He hath nourished us by degrees, and fed us with the sincere milk of the word, that we might grow thereby, that we might grow in grace, and in virtue and goodness, that you may be strengthened in your inward man, the outward man cannot long subsist without food, but the body without food will grow weak and feeble; nor can the soul live unto God, except it receive strength and nourishment from Him, who fills the hungry with good things, and sends the rich empty away.

Wait upon God, that you may be strengthened, and enabled to perform your duty, and what God requires of you. "Obedience is better than sacrifice, and to obey the voice of the Lord, than the fat of rams." It is in Christ alone that we have acceptance with God, and He is the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him. Acceptance with God is of great value, and much to be desired; O! many an honest heart desires to have acceptance with God, and enjoy his favor; sin in all ages hath made a separation between God and us; sin hath caused man to be driven out of the paradise of God; thou camest unto separation by sin, it was sin that separated between God and thee; thine iniquities have kept good things from thee; there is a partition wall between God and us made by sin, but Christ is come to break it down, and to finish transgression, and make an end of sin, and bring in everlasting righteousness. This every particular man and woman is to wait for, to wait for the salvation of God, and to be in a travail of spirit and soul to know the way of truth; after the truth came to be made manifest to our understandings, and that we were at a certainty in the ways of God, we found a straitness in ourselves, a want of power and ability to perform what God required of us; a want of enlargement from God, and of love to Him; according to the certain knowledge we have of God, let us see that we be found faithful to Him, and wait upon Him for strength and ability to perform our duty.

Now, friends, after there were good desires in our souls, we have found ourselves at a loss, for want of watchfulness; the enemy many times hath prevailed upon us, and drawn us to things that were not convenient, whereby we came to have distress upon us; and many times we were compassed about with sorrow and trouble of mind, in seeing there was such a shortness in ourselves, after we knew the Truth, for to will was present with us, but how to perform that which is good we found not; until we received ability from God, we found a shortness in ourselves, but we found a sufficiency when joined to the Grace of God. So it was with the Apostle Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 7, 8: "Lest I should be exalted above measure," saith he, "through the abundance of revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan, to buffet me, &c. For this thing I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me; and He said unto me, my grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." We have had a sufficiency of grace to withstand the motions of sin, when we came to Christ, we found Him a complete Saviour, that He is able to save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Temperance.—The "Temperance Lesson Book," by Dr. B. W. Richardson, of London, has been placed on the "supply list," as a book of reference for the teachers under the charge of the Board of Education of New York, and as a reading book for scholars of certain grades.

Episcopalian Congress.—A meeting of this body was held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, in the early part of the Tenth month. The correspondent of the National Baptist, in speaking of its proceedings, says it is evident that a large part of the clergy and a considerable section of the laity of the established Church of England, regard it as a branch—a younger sister—of the Church of Rome. They trace the right of its priests to minister in sacred things to an imaginary succession from the apostles through the Romish priests. This foolish doctrine, he says, was brought out very distinctly in the papers read and the speeches made. Civil authority in matters pertaining to doctrine and ritual was disclaimed and denounced. This would be very well, if they did not at the same time seek to be supported out of the tithes collected by the authority of the government. As the correspondent states, they "demand all the privileges of a Free Church with all the pecuniary advantages of a State Church. They make no secret of the fact that they tolerate union with the State only for the sake of the emoluments and social position."

Reformed Episcopal Doctrines.—Somewhat in contrast with the preceding paragraph, are the views of the Reformed Episcopalians as expressed in the Episcopal Recorder of 11th mo. 5th. While adopting the Episcopal form of government they deny that it is of Divine origin, and maintain that "The Lord alone calls to the Ministry, and no Bishop or House of Bishops can give it or take it from those whom He sends forth." They "deny that Regeneration is in any way connected with [Water] Baptism, and affirm that it is the work of the Spirit." Though using a Liturgy, they "affirm that all the services of the Prayer Book are only forms of prayer; and, therefore, perfectly worthless, unless energized by the Spirit."

This affirmation is a testimony to the truth so steadily maintained by the Society of Friends, that all true worship requires the aid of the Holy Spirit; and it seems a confirmation of the propriety of our practice of waiting on the Lord in our religious meeting to feel the influences of his power and Spirit before venturing to utter words of prayer or exhortation, which are "perfectly worthless unless energized by the Spirit."

Blindness of Superstition.—To one who has been taught to believe that the work of salvation must be accomplished between the soul and its Creator; and that no outward observances can effect, or be a substitute for, the change of heart which our Saviour declared to be an essential pre-requisite to entering the kingdom of Heaven; it seems strange that any can be so blinded as to believe that any spiritual benefit will accrue to them from prayers purchased by money. The following circular sent by mail to a poor laboring man in a Western city, shows that the Romish Catholic clergy still resort to means of raising money, which are founded on ignorance and superstition:—

"New Melleray Abbey, (P. O. Box 1571.)

Dubuque, Iowa, Nov. 1, 1880.

To pay off a heavy debt on our new, half-finished Abbey, we shall have two daily Masses—one for the living and one for the dead—said every day, for a period of 50 years from date, in which those who give a donation of $100 shall participate for 50 years. Those who donate $50 shall participate in the fruit of said two daily Masses for 25 years, and in proportion down to $1, for which donors shall participate in said two daily Masses for 6 months from date of their donation.

FATHER BERNARD, PRIOR.

Collector will please write the name of each donor, the date and amount of donation after number. When the sheet is filled, return to me, with the amount collected. I will endorse it, with a receipt, and return it to you. The donors will then see that the donations have been received, and that the will participate in the two daily Masses."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Animal Sagacity.—I am exposed to some annoyance from a clever old donkey, who being turned out on the green in front of my house, constantly lets himself into my yard to graze on my lawn. This he effects by pushing his nose between the rails of an iron gate, and then pressing down the latch the gate. Expulsion, with ever so striking an appeal to his feelings, avails only a short time for his exclusion, unless the gate is locked.—W. B. Kesteven in Nature.

Electric Light in Collieries.—The Earno Colliery in Lanarkshire has been fitted with electric lamps. The incandescent carbon surrounded by a stout air-tight lantern glass, with steel guards. The risk of accident is considered to be much less than with the ordinary Davy lamp, and it is thought a general introduction into coal mines of electric lighting will much diminish the number of deaths from explosions of gas, which last year amounted in Great Britain to 499.

Falls of Niagara.—A writer in the Episcopal Recorder speaking of the change in the Falls since his first visit in 1826, says the recession in the centre of the Horse Shoe ll, caused by the fall of masses of rock has changed its shape from a curve to an angle.

This recession is not caused by the wearing of the rocks over which the water falls, but by the action of water and frost on the soft shale which underlies the upper limestone, until the latter projects so far as no longer to be able to bear its own weight. This is analogous to the recession of the falls of St. Anthony on the Mississippi, and the falls of Minnehaha in Minnesota, where the limestone bed rock rests upon a bed of consolidated sand. At Minnehaha there is (or was in 1859) a good, dry pathway under the Falls, on the side of the river.

The same process of undermining a harder layer of upper rock by wearing away a softer strata beneath is well shown in the gorges or gorges (as they are termed in the neighborhood), worn by the streams that descend the Adirondack Mountains in New York.

In 1826, at Niagara, the table rock under the falls on the Canada side projected so far to leave a clear space for persons to pass a considerable distance under the Falls, his has since fallen. At that time, Crawford, who kept the only hotel on the Canada side, said that he collected all the eels that he could, by going under the falls and catching them when crawling over the wet rocks in his efforts to go up stream.

Prior to 1826 a fall of the table rock occurred, as well as since. Crawford thus described the former of these.

"As I went with a party on the Table Rock, I observed a fine crack which appeared to be new, but so fine that you could hardly put the blade of a knife in it. After dealing with them a short time, I went back to examine this crack, and found that I could not find my hand in it. I immediately got them to the rock without giving the reason. The next morning, about four o'clock, I was aroused by a powerful jar. I roused my wife, and told her that the Table Rock had fallen. She said I had been dreaming. But I insisted that I felt the shock distinctly. As soon as day was light enough, I went to the spot and found that the Table Rock had disappeared. I returned to the house and called up all who had been on the rock the previous day. They asked what I wanted of them at that time of day. I said that I wished to show them something interesting. We started, and I helped the ladies through the mud, since it had been raining heavily [which I thought an important fact]. When near the spot, I requested them to point out the Table Rock, which we had been standing the previous afternoon. They began to take the bearings of different objects that they remembered. I thought that it ought to be about where they were standing, but there it was not. When they agreed that they could not find it, they asked me where it was. Then, pointing to the rocks below, I said, 'Those are the rocks upon which we were standing.' They then burst out crying like children."

Colliery Explosions.—A recent report of the effect of the English Government, shows the effect of coal-dust in promoting the explosions of fire-damp in coal mines. The fine dust from grain in the manufacture of flour, believed to be a source of danger in flour mills; and, similarly, the experiments on the subject show that a mixture of fire-damp and air, which is perfectly safe from fire, owing to the small proportion of inflammable gas present, will explode when a sufficient amount of coal dust is diffused through it.

When the dust is fine and combustible, it will propagate flame through an atmosphere containing only two per cent. of fire-damp. But dust of any kind, though incombustible itself, as powdered chalk or magnesia or slate, produces a similar effect where a somewhat larger proportion of the fire-damp is present; explosions having been caused thereby by an air mixed with from 3 to 3½ per cent. of the gas. It appears to operate by furnishing, as the particles of dust pass through the flame, successive red-hot nuclei.

The Mountain Nestor or Kea.—This New Zealand Parrot, like the rest of its tribe, formerly fed on fruits and seeds. Since the introduction of domestic sheep into the island, it has acquired a taste for mutton. Many instances are recorded of its attacking not only sick and dying sheep, but even those that are strong and healthy.

Dr. Lätour, of New Zealand, in transmitting a living specimen to the Zoological Society of London, says of it:—"It was caught in the act of attacking some sheep which a shepherd was bringing down off the tops of some ranges in the back country. He luckily succeeded in knocking it over with a stone, cut its wings and brought his captive down. In effecting the capture the shepherd suffered considerable loss as to his trousers and other garments, and not a little injury in scratches from its formidable beak and claws."

"While I have had the Kea, his diet has consisted mainly of mutton, raw; he does not care for cooked meat, but will take it if very hungry."

In his work on the birds of New Zealand, Dr. Butler tells us, that the "penguin" for raw flesh exhibited by this parrot in its wild state is very remarkable. Those that frequent the sheep stations appear to live almost exclusively on flesh. They claim the sheep's heads that are thrown out from the slaughter-shed, and pick them perfectly clean, leaving nothing but the bones."—Nature.

Went to our beloved afflicted friend Mildred Ratcliff; she expressed her gladness at seeing me, and frequently spoke of the goodness of her Lord and Master—with whom she said she had precious communion when left alone; though at other times deeply mourning over the state of the Church. She said she loved the truth and its blessed cause, and believed that the Lord would preserve a faithful remnant, who would be enabled to maintain its doctrines and its testimonies. These would not be permitted to fall to the ground; but the Lord would continue to raise up those whom He would qualify to support them, as in the days of our early Friends, and to bear a plain testimony against wrong things. She was particularly strong in her disapprobation of Friends sleeping in our meetings for divine worship; on account of which, she said some thought she had been too severe; but she was decided that such sleeping (Quakers were stumbling-blocks to honest enquirers after the truth, and that they were denying the faith that would give the victory over all such weakness.)—Wm. Evans' Journal.

"God hath marked each sorrowing day
And numbered every secret tear,
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 19, 1881.

"The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

Under the above heading, The British Friend for the present month comments on a favorable account of the late Yearly Meeting in Iowa, published in one of the "Friendly" journals, which concludes with the statement, "the meeting throughout had been generally very satisfactory."

The Editor states "on most reliable authority," that in the report of the proceedings of that Yearly Meeting some things have been omitted, which render the concluding words of the report inaccurate. He says:

"The reliable authority above referred to is one of the most prominent members of Iowa Yearly Meeting, and he mentions five ministers by name 'who, with some others, all stood compactly together in pressing certain doctrines, and in the most 'progressive' modes of working.' The one doctrine specially urged in all the meetings was the modern one regarding sanctification. It was treated as a gift wrought for us by Christ in his outward sacrifice, and to be received in its completeness by one definite act of faith. This is synonymous with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, once for all—never at conversion, but may be at any time, when we will. This is the entire extinction in our whole being of every disposition or propensity to sin instantaneously. The Holy Spirit is never in the sinner, according to this school of theology."

"In the large public meeting on First-day, the multitude were told that the doctrine of a 'Light within' is a dangerous doctrine, leading to infidelity, and warning was emphatically given never to look within for anything that will ever lead to Christ."

"The duty of regular vocal prayer in the family once or twice a day was urged, and of commencing First-day Schools with vocal prayer regularly by the superintendent, or some one selected by him."

"Our correspondent mentions that he took occasion two or three times to speak on these points of doctrine in the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, and to bring out the doctrines of Friends, which elicited considerable expression of unity. He adds that he speaks of what he had heard, and of what was emphatically and repeatedly proclaimed."

"In conclusion our correspondent remarks that one great means by which the Society is threatened with disruption is what passes in the 'Devotional' Morning and Evening Meetings at the time of the Yearly Meeting. The most extreme views and practices are propagated in those gatherings, which were never so noisy and extravagant before. The Yearly Meeting is much taken possession of by strangers. It might be otherwise if left to ourselves, or with real helpers; but a certain class of ministers attend nearly all the Yearly Meetings."

It is with some hesitation that we republish in our columns such evidences of the weakened, if not lapsed, condition of bodies claiming the name of Friends. Yet, as we believe the safety and ultimate preservation of our Society depend on the maintenance within its borders of those spiritual principles which were preached by its early members, it seems to be a duty from time to time to bear a testimony, however feeble, against those departures therefrom which have introduced confusion and discord among us and must continue to produce such disorganizing effects, while they are persisted in.

The Editor of The British Friend proceeds to make the following remarks, which we doubt not express thoughts which have passed through the minds of many of our readers.

"The question, therefore, which hereupon presents itself, seems to be this—What is the remedy? Providing always, of course, that Monthly Meetings are sound themselves, it is obviously their duty to labor with such ministers as have departed from the faith of the Society, prohibiting them from propagating their unsound views, and if they refuse to take counsel, depose them from the station of minister, and thus prevent them from traveling in that capacity.

"If, unhappily, the Monthly Meeting has become leavened with the same heresy as the ministers, and the Quarterly Meeting is in the like predicament, it would seem that separation is a necessity and the alone remedy. This, we all know, has before been the lot of the Society—for how can two walk together except they be agreed?"

"It puzzles us exceedingly, we must confess, to imagine how ministers, especially in the Society of Friends, can justify their procedure in preaching any doctrine whatever at variance with the Society's heretofore recognized belief. No such practice is tolerated in any other denomination; and, last of all, should it have to be borne among Friends. Even common honesty would dictate that those who deem the faith of a church erroneous, should leave the connection and not obtrude their own altered sentiments to the creation of unsettlement and disquiet."

As appropriately coming under the heading with which this article commences, "The truth, the whole truth," &c., we mention the recent reception of a few lines from one of the members of Ohio Yearly Meeting, who thinks that at their late annual assembly there was more preaching than was best. The writer says: "The multitude of words burdened many minds, both older and younger. More regard to the injunction, 'Be still and know that I am God,' seems to be needed among us."

There is a time to speak and a time to keep silence—and we believe nothing will secure true peace of mind and growth in grace, but dependence on the Lord and faithfulness to his requirements. When He gives the command to deliver a message to the people, his servants must obey; but it is unsafe to utter words in a religious assembly without a fresh feeling that it is his will. When a meeting is gathered into a silent waiting on the Lord and into a wrestling of spirit for his blessing; it is sometimes favored with a covering of holy solemnity, which the true worshipper feels would be marred by any outward declaration.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The tenement houses 53 and 55 Grand street, at the corner of South Fifth avenue, in New York, tumbled down with a crash early on Thursday morning of last week. Nine persons were killed, and one other was fatally injured.

Nine million feet of lumber in Sisson & Lilley's mill yard, at Spring Lake, Michigan, were burned on Fourth-day the 9th inst. The loss is estimated at $250,000; insured for $100,000 in thirty-nine different companies.

A telegram from Quincy, Illinois, reports the waters to be receding very slowly. The losses at that place and in the Warsaw and adjacent districts are estimated at $3,000,000.

During the recent storms the city of Oshkosh, Wis., was flooded because of sixty acres of logs coming down the river. The streets were entirely submerged, and people moored the plank sidewalks to stakes.

No little concern is felt by persons interested in the harbor accommodations of Lake Ontario by reason of the assured fact that the level of the lake has fallen steadily, and in a marked degree, for many years. The records have been accurately kept, and leave no room for doubt. Many wharfs in many ports were formerly 100 feet high, which could not be reached by the water. The entrance to the harbor of Toronto has been kept open only by means of thorough dredging, and now, when rock bottom has been reached, there is scarcely enough water to float the largest of the vessels which seek to pass. Various explanations for the subsidence have been offered, but none of them seems to be adequate.

The crops of Pennsylvania for the year 1881, are estimated by the State Board of Agriculture as follows: Corn, 32,780,000 bushels; wheat, 19,470,000 bushels; oats, 34,230,000 bushels; buckwheat, 1,057,000 bushels; potatoes, 67,420 tons; and apples, $2,225,000 worth.

The number of menhaden rendered on the Long Island coast last season was 86,000,000, which yielded 425,000 gallons of oil and 8500 tons of fertilizer.

Minnesota claims that 40,000,000 bushels of wheat is the lowest aggregate at which the State's yield of this year can be placed. This is several million more bushels than has ever been returned in a single year in a State where an exact system of returns and statistics prevailed. California, which up to this time has been the heaviest wheat producing State, grew thirty-nine million bushels last year to Minnesota's thirty millions. They claim that the average in California has not increased since 1870, and that the yield in California will have a large increase through the heavier yield, it is hardly likely that the whole amount will exceed what is grown in Minnesota. Dakota—Northern and Southern—with Minnesota will probably produce one-tenth of the wheat grown in the United States this year, and the whole amount will be 180,000,000 bushels. Another estimate places the Minnesota crop at nearly or quite 45,000,000 bushels, which would be an advance of 13,000,000 bushels on the crop of last year.

The Supervising Inspector-General of Steam Vessels, in his report for the year ending 6th mo. 30th last, states that the number of vessels in the United States bureau during the year was 4779, having a total tonnage of 1,204,003. Increase in number of vessels compared with the previous year, 243; increase in tonnage, $2,195. The total number of lives lost by accidents during the year ending 6th month 30th last was 208, of whom 150 were lost by sinking and sinking, 48 by explosions, 30 by collisions, 11 by fires, 29 by accidental drownings, and 5 by "miscellaneous casualties."

It is reported that the disease now known as "pink-eye," and in former years called influenza or epizooty, has not appeared to any great extent among the street-vendors of New York, who are usually the victims of treatment, and is dangerous only in case of a relapse. It is not believed to have attacked private citizens to any considerable extent.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health states that there were 359 deaths in this city last week, an increase of 7 over the corresponding week of last year, and of 35 over the week ending 11th mo. 5th, 1881. Of the whole number, 162 were males, and 197 females: 47 died of consumption, 23 of marasmus, 20 of diphtheria, 18 of pneumonia and 18 of typhoid fever. Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½, 101½ to 102½; 4½, registered 118½; 5½, 117½; 6½, 117½; 7½, 118½.

Corn.—There was no essential change in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 11½ to 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 3½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour, quiet, but steady. Sales of 1900 barrels, including Minnesota extras at $7.25 for clear and at $7.37½ a $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra family at $6.60 a $6.75; western do. at $7 a $7.50, and southern at $7.75 a $8.50. Rye flour is dull at $5.75 for Pennsylvania. Corn meal is nominal.

Grain.—Wheat in moderate request, and fully 10 cts. higher. Sales of Delmar at $1.10 a $1.15 and amber at $1.42 a $1.44. Rye is quiet at $1 for Pennsylvania. Corn is in better demand, and options are higher. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including yellow, 169½ a 70 cts.; mixed at 69 a 69½ cts.; steamer at 67 cts.; No. 3 at 67½ a 67½ cts. Oats are steady and in moderate request. Sales of 9500 bushels, including white, white at 50 a 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 48½ to 49 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 11th mo. 12th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 300; loads of straw, 5. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.2 to $1.45 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.25 to $1.35 per 100 pounds; clover, $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 pounds. Best cattle were in demand, at full prices; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3½ a 7 cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were active, and higher; 8000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts., and lamb at 4 a 7½ cts. per lb., as quality.

Hogs were in fair demand; 5500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 7 a 9½ cts. per lb., as quality.

FOREIGN.—The Morning Post, referring to the state and previous occupation of some of the Assistant Commissioners for fixing fair rents, about the Land act, says an influential member of Parliament, when Parliament meets, will move for a select committee to inquire into their antecedents and qualifications.

O'Leary, member of the Fenian triumvirate, has written a letter from Paris declaring that, while he maintains the principles of the Fenian cause, he is not in England, he deprecates the maligning of Englishmen. Gladstone, he says, has given to Ireland a Land act such as nobody a few years ago could have hoped for, and Forster is very much better than most of the Irish Secretaries.

Conradinsky, in his remarks to the Hungarian delegation, said that, during the whole of his ministerial career, he had been convinced that the union of Italy and Austria was a great and important factor in the preservation of European equilibrium.

A St. Petersburg despatch to the Daily Telegraph says: Diphtheria, scarlet fever and small pox are devastating the centre and south of Russia. The severity of the diseases exceeds anything heretofore known.

A despatch from Odessa to the Times says: "Railway traffic in Central Russia is greatly impeded by snow, which has prevented the sowing of winter wheat especially in the Government of Kharkoff."

The Telegraph from London says: "The Foreign Missionary Seminary has received a telegram from Hong-Kong, stating that a terrible typhoon has just ravaged Western Tonnin. Two hundred churches, thirty-four parsonages and colleges and two thousand houses have been destroyed. Six thousand Christians are reported to be ruined and without resources. The losses are immense, and the distress is terrible. The telegram begs for the prompt help."

Heavy rains have occurred in Mysore, India, as prices of food have consequently fallen 25 per cent. Anxiety in regard to the crops has abated.

According to a cable from London, Western Africa is yellow fever, has caused terrible havoc in Senegal.

The loss by the bush fires throughout the Province of Ontario, last season, is estimated at upwards of $10,000,000.

The latest advices from the Island of Antioch concern the previous reports of the destitution of the inhabitants. The crops were much of a total failure, and the fishery and most of the people have nothing but a small quantity of potatoes to subsist upon.

The Mexican House of Representatives has passed bill for the coinage of nickel money to the amount of $4,000,000, in denominations of one, two and three cents. An amendment is pending to the bill, which such tokens legal tender to the amount of one dollar.

H. H. Bonwill having lately returned from a visit to the West, during which she made inquiry into, and in a number of cases personally inspected the needs of the poor, has returned home with a full knowledge of their behalf. In parts of Arkansas, Missouri and Kansas, there are many in need of assistance this winter, and some families quite destitute. In Iowa, also, the are a few families who need to be helped.

Some new and second-hand clothing has already been sent to a few destitute families, and is gladly received; also bedding, and especially money for the provisions, as the late drought has caused great destitution. Any Friend desiring further information will please communicate with H. H. Bonwill, 912 Wallace street, and be prepared to receive any donations or satisfy any enquirers.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,

No. 422 Wall Street.

For "The Friend."

Modified Quakerism—The Signs of the Times.

The declaration made by John Barclay in 1837, that "modified Quakerism cannot stand the fire," is becoming more and more proven as time rolls on. Fresh developments are being made here and there, in this country and in England, which go to show that the present disaffection in our Society is scarcely less injurious, or the signs of the times hardly less ominous, than the fearful, heart-stirring ones which culminated so disastrously about the year 1827. Are there not those who, if they had been told in the beginning of the present difficulties that they would have advocated such views, and given their support to such retrogressions as they are now doing, they would have answered in similar language to that of Hazeel to the prophet Elisha: "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?"

It is the first little departures, the almost un-suspicious steps from the narrow path of pure dependence and watchfulness unto prayer that should be vigilantly guarded, lest as Christian and Faithful were first induced to enter "By-Path Meadow" to become, as graphically described by Bunyan, finally landed in Giant Despair's castle, any of us should be beguiled and then led astray—be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. For sin first deceives, and then hardens. First tempts in little things, and thus prepares the way for the greater seductions of a cruel enemy. A pious writer has bequeathed the following testimony: "It is one of the fatal attributes of sin that it makes men blind and puts them to sleep; so that they do wrong almost without knowing that it is wrong." This insensibility to our true state verifies the apostle's description of "the working of Satan," which he sets forth to be "with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," &c.; which Matthew similarly characterizes thus: "There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect."

As there is nothing save the Light of Christ that quickens man, and shows him his fallen and lost condition, and which also enables, through obedience to its manifestations and reproofs, to come out of the darkness in which we are as children of the first Adam, so there is nothing but this Divine illumination, this Day-spring or power from on high, that can restore or bring back such as may have imperceptibly, and it may be, in part, unintentionally missed their way, so as to be no longer way-marks or fellow-helpers in our Society toward the mark for the prize of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus. That which enlightens the heart of the sinner, and causes the path of the just to shine more and more unto the perfect day, is the light of Christ shining in every heart. The same as William Penn strongly terms, "His gift for man's salvation." In other words, it is the revelation of the Father's will through the appointed means—the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, the Heavenly anointing of his dear Son our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. This is the only way to the Father, the one door of entrance, through the blood of the everlasting covenant by "the cherubims and flaming sword" unto the washed, sanctified, justified state which poor man lost by the fall of our first parents.

Would that all in every land who have more or less missed their way, and have become as wandering stars in the firmament, or as sheep astray from the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions, or who are not prepared to uphold all the doctrines and testimonies of our early Friends in their completeness and simplicity, might retrace their misleading steps, repent, and return to the service or the suffering appointed all in the Church of Christ side by side with those stripped and peeled, who mourn over the desolations, and long that the waste places may again be filled with a united, faithful people. But who, at the same time, can do no other than endeavor, however feebly, yet conscientiously, to maintain the precious doctrines and testimonies—being no less than those of primitive Christianity revived—which have, as a sacred trust, been committed to this religious Society to uphold before the world. But whatever our position in the Church, whatever our allotment of duty, be it either passive or more active, the indisputable truth remains: "One is your master, even Christ." He alone is the true and infallible Teacher. But how does He teach? save by that indwelling, illuminating Holy Spirit which teaches all things; being our "guide into all truth;" and without which we cannot know the deep things of God.

Without the continual "watch," so solemnly enjoined by the Saviour, it is easy for the natural unrenewed man to take up with a superficial religion, a modified Quakerism, a rest short of the true one. These, whether they be public speakers, or of that class the influence of whose daily lives, though silently exerted, is hardly less operative, will show forth the same short-coming doctrine and practice unto the leavening of others within the circuit of their influence. And it is thus that the evil leaven works and spreads. Is it likely any less the case now than when the prophet put forth the testimony to a people who, as he said, "will not hear the law of the Lord?"—"Prophecy not unto us right things; speak unto us smooth things;" even to "cause the Holy One of Israel to cease from before us." But what must be the dreadful end of such prophets whom the Lord hath not sent, and of such a people over whom their divinations and enchantments have prevailed?

May the Lord in his mercy turn back the devourer, and heal the hurt of the daughter of our Zion. May He raise up Aarons and Phinehas' and Davids to stay the plague so threatening. May He again call and sanctify mourning and fasting Nehemiahs who shall not only view the desolations, but by prayer and supplications unto him, the God of Israel, be equipped and empowered to build again the broken down walls of our Jerusalem—"the city of our fathers' sepulchres"—and enable also effectually to rebuke the Sanballats and Tobias' who may mock and despise the workmen and the work; and, so far as they can, hinder the re-rearing of the structure even in troublous times.

The day calls for deep dwelling in the valley of decision; that so "saviours" may be prepared and "come up on Mount Zion, to judge the mount of Esau," and to turn the battle to the gate. Meanwhile, no doubt is entertained by the writer, that He, with whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, will in his own time and way revive his work, will raise u judges and counselors, one here and another there, like to "princes of the provinces," who shall stand for the law and the testimony and "the kingdom shall be the Lord's." The power of the eternal Truth is the same as ever it was; and the Lord can turn and overturn can destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent and through and over all settle a faithful people to his praise and glory. Amen.

For "The Friend."

The Carlisle School for Indian Children.

The second annual report, by Captain J. H. Pratt, addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, at Washington, of the workings of the Carlisle School for Indian children under the charge of the U. S. Government contains much that is interesting and encouraging to those who believe that the Indian capable of making rapid advancement in the methods of civilized life.

At the date of the last report the number of students was 196. That number had been since increased by the arrival of 1 Apache, 1 Menomonee and Sisseton Sioux, 25 Creek 16 Cheyennes and Arapahoes, 10 Pueblos, 1 Osages, 15 Shoshones and Northern Arapahoes, and 1 Gros Ventres. Of the 99 new pupils, only 34 were girls. At the date of the second report, 10th mo. 15th, 1881, there were 267 children at the school, 180 boys and 87 girls.

He says in reference to the work in the school-room:—"This has been conducted accordance with the principles and following the methods first adopted. The instruction is objective, the methods natural. The chief point is the mastery of the English language reading and writing accompanying and waiting upon this language study. We have not aimed to urge the more advanced pupils beyond a practical knowledge of the primary English branches. Our effort is to awaken desire for knowledge and to satisfy that desire. As a means to this end occupation in the industrial departments is of prime importance. We have found that a stated amount of employment in the shop, on the farm, elsewhere, does not retard, but rather advances school-room work, besides giving the pupil manual dexterity, habits of industry and aiding in an early discovery of any natural talent toward a particular business avocation.

"The text books used are Picture Teaching Webb's Model Readers, Franklin's Arithmetic Swinton's Geography, Hooker's Child's Book of Nature, and Knox and Whitney's Elementary Language Lessons.

"No books are used with beginners. The materials employed are objects, pictures, the blackboard, slate and pencil.

"The knowledge of English gained by those who first came to the school the year before has aided their advancement during the past year wonderfully, and it greatly surprises those engaged in teaching Indians in the Indian country, who have visited us, that they make such rapid progress in their studies as in English speaking. They particularly excel in spelling, in writing, and in arithmetic. Here vacation is a period of continued building up and not of retrograding."

Under the head of "Industrial" work, the report states:—

"I can repeat all that I said in my last car's report in regard to the capacity and progress of our boys in the several industrial branches. There is no insuperable obstacle to the way of making skillful and practical mechanics, capable farmers, &c., &c., of our Indian boys. The difficulty of language overcomes, and this may be within the second year training, Indian boys, are, in my judgment, apt pupils at agricultural, mechanical or any of the ordinary labor pursuits, as white boys.

"We have found it better to work half days and to give the other half to school room exercises instead of two days work and four of school as last year. Under this system we have 15 carpenters, 10 blacksmiths and wagon-makers, 11 saddlers, 10 shoemakers, 8 tanners, 2 bakers, 3 printers, a total of 65 apprentices.

"The carpenter and the tailor shop have more than paid all their expenses in the improvements made and the supplies required for the school. Our farm results have been satisfactory as the season would admit. Expenses—rent, labor, and seeds—have amounted to $2,347, while the income has amounted to $2,477.75, leaving a credit balance in favor of the farm of $130.75. I hadly expected to meet the rent of the farm in potato crop alone, but the drought prevented.

"Under your orders we have shipped to twenty-two different Indian agencies articles of manufacture, as follows, viz: 4110 pint pans, 50 one-quart funnels, 117 one-quart pans, 73 quart cups, 73 two-quart funnels, 250 6-quart pudding pans, 395 two-quart coffee filters, 1,188 ten-quart pails, 313 two-quart pans, 427 four-quart coffee boilers, 310 four-quart pails, 54 ten-quart pans, 152 six-quart coffee-boilers, 117 fourteen-quart pans, 8 sets double harness, 10 halters, 2 spring wagons, 2 carriages. Representing a total value of $6,333.46, governed by your Indian department contract prices.

"By authority of the Department 109 of our students were placed in white families, mostly farmers, during the vacation. Previous experience indicated that very great benefits attend the individualizing process of taking student away from association with those who spoke his own language and placing him where he could hear and speak nothing but English, of removing him from those who were on the same level of having to learn civilized habits to a position where he would be the only exception and where all his surroundings would lift him up.

"The results have fully justified our most useful expectations. At the close of the vacation the students thus placed out have improved wonderfully in English speaking, more self-reliant and stimulated to enter industry.

Six girls and twenty-three boys have been allowed to remain in families through the winter. They will assist in the duties of the household and the household for their board, and attend the public schools, thus having advantages for learning civilized habits and gaining knowledge far better than we can at this school. This individualizing seems incomparably the most hopeful, because the rapid and complete plan. I gratefully report the hearty co-operation and interest of many friends who have thus taken our children and treated them as their own."

In his native state the Indian seems almost wholly devoid of prudence or forethought. If the wants of the present are supplied he gives not a thought to the future. Lessons in economy and thrift are therefore of the utmost importance to our Indian students. As a step in this direction I have instituted a system of savings. The apprentice boys and girls have been paid as allowed by Department regulations at the rate of sixteen and two-thirds cents per day when actually employed. Besides the stimulus in their work this has given opportunity for lessons in the proper use of money.

"Three months ago after having many times previously explained to the students the use and benefit of saving at least a portion of their earnings, an account to their credit was opened with a saving bank in town. Each student who makes a deposit has a small bank book which he keeps himself and brings once a month if he wishes to make an additional deposit. Some of the students receive money from their parents and friends, others have earned something from families during vacation. They too make deposits. There is commendable pride in these savings. The total sum thus placed at interest amounts to $668.28, and this system if continued with its present success, will insure to the students when they return to their homes, sums sufficient to be of value in helping them to establish themselves in civilized pursuits.

"It is impossible to over estimate the importance of careful training for Indian girls, for with the Indians, as with other people, the home influence is the prevailing one. The labor and expense of educating Indian boys while the girls are left untought is almost entirely thrown away. Of what avail is it that the man be hard-working and industrious, providing by his labor food and clothing for his household if the wife unskilled in cookery, unused to the needle, with no habits of order or neatness, makes what might be a cheerful, happy home, only a wretched abode of filth and squalor? Is it to be wondered at that he succumbs under the burden, and is dragged down to the common level? It is the women who cling most tenaciously to heathen rites and superstitions, and perpetuate them by their instructions to the children. John Ross, under whose government the Cherokees were so many years a progressive, prosperous people, attributed the comparative failure of the early educational efforts for that people to the fact that nothing was done for the girls. No real progress was made until girls as well as boys received civilized training.

"Perhaps one reason why the tendency to neglect the girls has been so great in the past is that the training of girls involves care and responsibility so much greater. A boy, in addition to the lessons in the school-room, is taught some one useful trade, the girl who is to be a good housekeeper must acquire what is equal to several trades. She must learn to sew and to cook, to wash and iron, she must learn lessons of neatness, order and economy, for without a practical knowledge of all these she cannot make a home.

"The results of the training given our eighty-seven girls are, thus far, equally satisfactory with the progress of the boys. By a regular system of details, each girl takes her turn in the different departments of household training. They take care of their own and the teacher's rooms, and have hours for practical lessons in the kitchen, dining room and laundry. In the sewing-room a number of the large girls cut and fit garments. Forty-five are expert in running the sewing machine and all are taught plain sewing and especially mending. The task of repairing garments for so large a school is a very heavy one. The stockings are darned each week by the small girls, whose skill and neatness are unexcelled.

"Thirty-two of our boys are under twelve years of age. These have been placed under the supervision of a matron who occupies quarters with them and gives them motherly care. Their improvement in health, deportment, &c., has been quite marked.

"Finding much difficulty in obtaining a suitable person to act as disciplinarian for the larger boys, I determined to place Etahleuh Doanmoo, a Kiowa, and the only remaining of the former Florida prisoners, in charge of them. In this responsible position he has shown himself capable, efficient, and trustworthy.

"One of the older Sioux girls gives excellent satisfaction as assistant to the matron.

"The system of monthly reports to parents has been continued during the year and in addition, as soon as the students were able, they have been required to write a monthly letter home to accompany these reports. The letters received by the children from their parents, as well as those from the parents to me direct, are full of growing interest and good sense on this matter of education. The following expressions from parents show the drift of these sentiments.

"The father of two of our little girls, who is a prominent man among his people, writes expressing earnest appreciation and gratitude for the advantages they are receiving, and then he continues as follows: 'I send thanks, with the kindest wishes and good feeling, for the care and attention given all Indian students you have in your school, let them be of whatever nation or tribe they may, for I am satisfied that all any nation or tribe of Indians in North America needs to be equal to any other race of people is education and opportunity, or in other words, enlightenment, and from what I have learned there is no better place where the same may be attained than the Carlisle Training School.'

Divine Grace.—Grace only can restore man to God's image. If learning could have done it, why were the heathens unrestored? Are not the infidels often learned? And would not the advent of our Lord and Saviour have been superfluous, if learning could have repaired the ruins of the fall? Few in the mass of mankind are learned. They are perhaps as one to a million. What is to become of the millions then, if the gospel of Jesus cannot be received with sufficient evidence, without deep learning and metaphysical disputation? What is to prove it to them who have neither books, leisure, nor ability to study, if God himself does not teach them by his Spirit? But blessed be his name, He has taught them, and continues to teach them.

It is among the learned, chiefly, that infidelity prevails. She inhabits libraries, and walks abroad in academic groves, but is seldom seen in the cottage, in the field, or in the manufactory.

The poor and the unlearned do in general believe in the gospel most firmly. What is the evidence which convinces them? It is the witness of the Spirit; and thanks be to Him who said, 'My Grace is sufficient for thee,' 'He that believeth on the Son of God, hath this witness in himself.'—Christian Philosophy, by Vicesimus Knox.

The Late Richard Hall, of Wigton, England.

The British Friend for Eleventh month contains a brief notice of this valued Friend, who deceased on the 17th of 10th month last, aged 66 years.

The last letter I received from him contains encouragement for those on this side of the Atlantic who are concerned "to maintain in faithful integrity the principles and testimonies to which our Society was first gathered." It also laments the extent to which his fellow members had forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters, and were "hewing out cisterns, broken cisterns, that will hold no water, professing to work largely for Him, doing great things in his cause, and yet, alas! forsaking his testimonies and casting his restraints behind us." And it expresses the desire, that "the breathing of the hearts of those who mourn for the desolations of our Zion" may be unto the Lord, "that He may indeed spare his people and give not his heritage to reproach. For surely this people were pre-eminently gathered in his name and power, and were strengthened by Him to maintain the pure standard of Truth and righteousness before the nations."

The account is as follows. J. W.

Some account of this dear and valued Friend, who was well known to a wide circle in the Society, may be acceptable to the readers of The British Friend.

He was the son of Joseph and Jane Hall, of Alston, on the borders of Northumberland, and was born there in the 5th month, 1815. About the age of nine years he was sent to Wigton School, which was then conducted on the old premises at Highmoor. His father and mother became superintendent and house-keeper of the school in 1826, and continued to discharge the duties of those offices till the 2nd month, 1829. Many have been the acknowledgments of old scholars of the great kindness of these worthy heads of the school, and of their deep concern for their welfare. On leaving the school they settled at Waverton, a small hamlet two miles west of Wigton, and about one from the school, which had been removed in the early part of their connection with it to the new house and premises at Brookfield. Richard Hall accompanied his parents to their new home, and this continued to be his residence till within the last few months of his life, a period of over fifty-two years. Here he kept "the noiseless tenor of his way," amidst the pursuits of a useful country life.

Striving to be faithful in the little as well as in the much, he desired to discharge his duties in the fear of the Lord, seeking first his kingdom, and fully assured that all things necessary would be added. Though he took a very humble view of his religious qualifications, he did not allow this to excuse him from any work he believed to be required at his hands, whether in the Church or as a member of civil society. Fully convinced that the principles of Friends are in accordance with the doctrines of the New Testament, he was deeply concerned to uphold them in their integrity, endeavoring to live up to them at all times.

He took a warm interest in the Temperance movement, and endeavored to spread its principles amongst his neighbors.

His warm support was given to the Peace Society. In upholding of our religious testimony against all war, he felt that he could not conscientiously pay a war tax, and refused to pay the addition to the Income Tax, made to defray the expenses of the Abyssinian war.

Ever ready to extend a helping hand to the afflicted, the distressed, and the needy, he retrenched his personal expenditure that he might have the more to give away.

It would have been very far from the wish of our dear friend that anything merely laudatory should be recorded of him. No one could well be more deeply sensible than he was of his own unworthiness. He felt that he had been forgiven much, and therefore he loved much. His soul was anchored on Him who is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," and his desire was that all might both hear and do his commandments, and so build on the sure foundation, against which nothing can prevail.

The close of his exemplary life came on gradually, though his strength failed rapidly towards the last. Feeling his end approaching, he gave a message of "love to all Friends far and near." He frequently advised his children to live in "the fear of the Lord which is a fountain of life preserving from the snares of death." On being asked if he felt he was accepted, he said, "Yes, unworthy as I am, by the mercy of God through Christ Jesus." He also said, "I have endeavored to love the Lord with all my heart, with all my soul, with all my mind, and with all my strength." His voice gradually failed, and after bidding his wife and children separately "Farewell," he passed most peacefully away, to enter, we doubt not, one of the many mansions prepared for the redeemed.

AFTER THE BATTLE.

My wound is deep, I fain would sleep; O Lord,
I stretch my hands to thee:
Do thou according to thy faithful word,
And set thy servant free!

Sore hath the battle been, but victory
Crowned me as evening fell;
Now heart and flesh are failing, let me see
The land where I would dwell.

The battle-field is cold and silent now,
Its thunders sunk to rest;
And I can feel the touch upon my brow
Of low winds from the west:

The clouds of sleep, the last and longest sleep,
Are heavy on my eyes;
They cannot watch, dear Lord, they cannot weep
Beneath thy dark'ning skies.

What time the angel, victory, came down
To bid my conflict cease
And crowned my tired soul with the shining crown
Of Righteousness and Peace;

That instant broke the sound as of a knell
On the faint evening's breath;
And on my parched mouth, like the dew, there fell
The soft sweet kiss of Death;

For victory and death walk hand in hand
Down all the battle-field—
One ruddy as the dawn, the other grand,
But pale behind his shield;

And whom God loves, to whom is victory
On such a field as this,
Receive the radiant angel's crown, and see
The pale cold angel's kiss.

That kiss has made my spirit faint and weak;
Lord, take me to thy breast;
Oh, hold me closely, where the weariest seek
And find Eternal Rest!

Christ, who has been my perfect sun by day,
Will be my star by night;
On my deep rest the Lord shall shine alway,
An everlasting Light.

Dimly I see Him, thro' the clouds that roll
Along the darkening west:
O Lord, my star, by Thy sweet light my soul
Doth enter into rest.

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS.

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
Sails the unshadowed main,—
The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purple wings,
In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell,
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing cell,
Before thee lies revealed,—

Its iris'd ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed.

Year after year behold the silent toil
That reapeth its lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grows,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last found home, and knew the old more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lip, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathed horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings:—

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy lowly quested post!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving this outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."
—Holmes.

God makes us brave to meet each loss
Without a sigh;
To do our work and bear our cross,
Nor question why.

He knows the secret of our way,
And what is best;
The long, dark sorrows pulse with praise,
And lead to rest.

There are, it is true, few things in the treatment of a family requiring more of the wisdom which cometh from above, than the decision continually to be made between exposure and exclusiveness. To act on either principle fully would be almost equally injurious. God has placed us in a world requiring the discharge of active duties amidst its innumerable temptations, and if we cannot defend our children from all, the best we can do is to arm them with principles for the unavoidable encounter — perhaps — padding the shield on the inside with habits. We cannot watch over them till all dangers are past, but a steady eye upon the chief goal will steer us safely through many. Do you remember the inquiry made of good c Thomas Scott on his death-bed? In his large family he had been greatly favored, a they, having now children of their own ar, asked their dying father whether he could name any special course or principle to which this success could be attributed? He replied, with the humility of an aged Christian, that he was sensible of many defects and errors, but that one thing he had aimed at, and to that only could he refer the blessing, and that had distinguished his labors—his incessant endeavor both for his children and himself to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." So much had everything else been regarded as subordinate, that John Scott, his eldest son, and biographer, adds, that he believes "not one among them could have ventured to inform his father at he was about to marry a rich wife."

How strangely diverse from the ruling principle now, even among those who profess to be not of this world.—From Memorials Ann Gilbert.

Testimonies to the Truth.

(Continued from page 118.)

Be not content, my friends, to sit down under bare convictions, lest your carcasses fall in the wilderness; but let all of you travel on, that you may possess the good land, the land of rest; that you may know peace with God for your immortal souls. Israel had much travel in the wilderness after they came out of the dark land, the land of Egypt; now God showed many signs and wonders for their deliverance. He fed them, and sustained them, and though they were many years in the wilderness, their garments waxed not old; God supplied them with food, and caused manna to be rained down upon them, they did eat angels' food; He sent them meat to be full, so they did eat and were filled, for He gave them their own desire, they were not strangled from their lust, but while their eat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them, and their carcasses fell in the wilderness; and for the hardness of their hearts, they never attained to the land of rest; though they drew near to it, they did not enter into it. They hearkened not to those that brought good tidings, and brought a cluster of grapes from the brook Eschol, and said to Moses, "We came to the land, hither thou sentest us, and surely it flows with milk and honey, and this is the fruit of it." Num. xiii. 27. And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once and possess it, for we are well able to overcome it; but the men that went up with him did not, we be not able to go up against the people, for they are stronger than we. And they brought up an evil report of the land they had searched, saying, It is a land that swalloweth up the inhabitants thereof, and all the people that we saw in it are men of great stature; and there we saw the giants the sons of Anak, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers. Thus they hearkened to those that discouraged the people, and their carcasses fell in the wilderness; and they never entered through Jordan with Caleb and Joshua to possess the land, who were men of noble and excellent spirits, and followed the Lord fully, and brought news of the good land, saying, "The land which we passed through to search, is an exceeding good land; if the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land, and give it to us; a land which floweth with milk and honey; only rebel not ye against the Lord, neither fear ye the people of the land, for they are bread for us, their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us, fear them not; but all the congregation bade stone them with stones, though the Lord had done marvelous things in the sight of their fathers in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan; He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through, He made the waters to stand as on dry land, and they passed through the sea as on dry land, and the waters covered their enemies, and there was not one of them left." Psal. lxxviii. and evi. 11. I will sing unto the Lord, said Moses, for He hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea. Exod. xv. 1. These faithful men, Joshua and Caleb, remembered the Lord, were not unmindful of his power, and the Lord subdued their enemies, and made them as ashes under the soles of their feet; and they went on and prospered, and prevailed till they came into the possession of the good land.

Though many fall in the way, and though thy exercises be much, as in the wilderness; and though thou mayst many times question the way, yet God hath prepared a certain guide for man, the Spirit of Truth that Christ promised, John xiv. 16: "And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever, even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him; but ye know Him, for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." Here is a certain guide to lead you into the way of peace and righteousness, where you shall not go astray from God, He will bring all things to your remembrance; and will convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; you must know Him as a reprover, before you come to know Him as a justifier.

My friends, God calls upon us, "Turn you at my reproval; behold I will pour out my Spirit upon you, I will make known my words unto you; I have called and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded, but ye have set at naught my counsel, and would none of my reproval." Prov. i. 23, 24. Though God poureth out his Spirit abundantly, and maketh known his mind and will, yet many hearken not to the reproval of the Spirit of the Lord, but harden their hearts, and rebel against the Light, against God's Spirit that striveth with them; as God's Spirit did strive with the old world, so God will now be striving with the children of men by his good Spirit; if they will hearken to his reprovals, and turn at his reprovals, He will manifest himself more abundantly to them; if people will hearken to his counsel, and obey his voice, and turn at his reprovals, He will make known his will to them. Wo to the rebellious children, saith the Lord, that take counsel, but not of me, saith the Lord, and that cover with a covering, but not of my Spirit. Those that walk in the Spirit, shall be covered with it as with a garment, and be led into all truth; as many as are led by the Spirit of God, are the sons of God; try yourselves what spirit you are of; there is a spirit in man, but it is the inspiration of the Almighty that giveth understanding. God hath opened the understanding of many by his grace, and given them understanding to know Him that is true; they that are led by the Spirit of God, shall not only know his way, but have their hearts enlarged in his way; here is our happiness, to travel on in the ways of God's commandments with enlarged hearts; God hath sent forth his Light and his Truth, and hath prepared a certain guide for man, that he might not mistake his way, as He gave to Israel a pillar of a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, to guide and direct them in their travelling and journeys in the wilderness.

Take heed lest the mystery of iniquity work in your minds and spirits, work to a fleshly liberty, to liberty to sin; the Spirit of God works liberty and freedom from sin, and from the bondage of corruption, not to give way to it. If Christ hath made you free, then ye shall be free indeed, even the Spirit of the Lord is there, there is liberty, a freedom from sin; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, are not of the Father, but of the world. Many people indulge the lusts of their own mind, and embrace pride, vanity and arrogance, those things that are evil, and so corrupt themselves, and go out of the way of God, reaching after the pleasures of the world, and the lusts of it. Here people go astray; but by keeping to the Spirit, when a temptation comes to us to gratify our flesh, the Spirit of the Lord lifts up a standard against it; we have tried ourselves and our own spirits, and in our own strength we could never get forward in the ways of God; we have been convinced of it, that though our understandings have been clear to know the way of truth, yet by our own striving we can never get forward, by striving in our own wills.

Take heed that in your striving, you do not set up self, but humble yourselves to the dust, and sit at the feet of Jesus; learn of Him to be meek and lowly; let him that is the chief among you, be the servant of all; do not strive for high places, and for honor and dignity, and to be accounted of among men; if we may have the favor of God, we should be content to dwell in a low place, to be a doorkeeper in the house of God, we shall think sufficient. I doubt not (will a gracious soul say) but God hath a sufficiency in store for me, whenever He calls me out of the world; Christ Jesus my Lord, is gone before to prepare a place for me, and He hath also promised, "I will come again and receive you to myself, and where I am, there shall my servants be." If Christ be gone to prepare a place for us, we need not question our reward, if the Spirit of God beareth witness with our spirits, that we are the children of God; and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ.

Seek peace with the Lord, seek reconciliation with God in the right way; there are two ways, the way that leads to life, and the way that leads to destruction, the narrow way, and the broad way; be you in that way which God hath cast up; if you are in Christ, He is the way, the Truth and the Life; if you are in Christ, you are new creatures. Consider what you know of a change, of dying unto sin, and living into righteousness; put off the old man with his deeds, and put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. Consider how it is with you, whether you live in sin, or in holiness and righteousness. All sin is of the devil, he is the author of sin. What fruit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed, for the end of those things is death; ye were the servants of sin, but being made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness, and now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end, everlasting life. Here is a good change from being servants of sin, to be made free from sin, through the Mediator, Christ Jesus. Consider of it.

(To be concluded.)

Gold and Silver in the Desert.

BY H. CLAY TRUMBULL.

(Continued from page 117.)

And now as to the "borrowing" of the jewels of gold and jewels of silver, by the departing Israelites, from their Egyptian neighbors, over which there have been so many carping by evil-disposed critics, or by over-anxious readers! That word "borrow" is a mis-translation, to begin with. The Hebrew word means simply to "ask." The habit of asking a gift from one in whose service a person has been, on the occasion of parting, is universal in those lands to-day—as always. The idea is very different from that of asking an alms; although a beggar will cry for "bakshish" (a gift), for the purpose of raising the level of his request for assistance. If an Oriental has served you, he expects to be not only paid for the service according to the stipulated rate, but also to receive from you a gift when he leaves you, as a token of your friendship, and as a proof of your satisfaction with him. This is not in the case of menials alone; it is the same all the way up to those in highest authority. Sheikh Musa, chief sheikh of the Tawara Arabs, who took charge of our party from Cairo to Sinai, and thence on to Castle Nakhli, was a man of character and ability, and of ample means also. A formal contract was made with him to convey our party over that route for a certain specified sum, bakshish included; but when we were at our journey's end with him, we found that unless we gave him a special "gift" at parting, we should seem to be lacking in satisfaction with his services; therefore we added a coin of gold to his board, and gladdened his heart in so doing. And the Egyptian military governor at Castle Nakhli was glad to have us recognize his services—entertaining us with pure oriental hospitality—by paying his full price for a nominal guard over our tents, and then adding as a parting "gift" to himself a showy silk handkerchief and a box of Cairo confections. If we had not been thoughtful enough to proffer these gifts without their asking, we should doubtless have been reminded, as were the Egyptians of old, that a parting "gift" was what might fairly be expected under the circumstances.

A good illustration of this way of asking a parting "gift" was furnished by our accomplished and faithful dragoman, Mohammed Achmed, of whose good qualities I have already spoken warmly. He was a man of intelligence and of wealth—the owner of several houses in Alexandria. He had no need to be in service as a dragoman; in fact, it was probably a loss to him pecuniarily; but he enjoyed the occupation, and followed it with enthusiasm. Our contract with him was a written one. By its terms, all expenses—bakshish for himself, for his attendants, and for our escorts, included—were to be covered by the stipulated price. As we neared our journey's end, however, he asked a "gift" of me; not an outright gift at parting, but the promise of something to be sent to him from America, as a token of my remembrance of him, and as a proof to others that he had served me satisfactorily. He even told me what he would like the "gift" to be; it was a traveling valise of a peculiar construction, like one I had with me on the journey. I willingly gave him a promise accordingly; and he frequently reminded me of it afterwards. A few days before we finally parted, Mohammed came to one of my young friends, and stating the case to him deliberately, asked whether he thought Mr. Trumbull would take offence if he should request him to discount that promise before we separated, and give him its value in hard cash. Being told of this, I spoke to the Dragoman about it, and he expressed the hope that I would not think him grasping; but really he would like a "gift" in his hands while I was yet with him. Accordingly I gave him the money desired, and as he thanked me he suggested that I could yet send him something from America, if I felt so disposed. This was not begging; of course not; but it was a way they have in Egypt, and that they had there in the days of Moses. It was in accordance with this very custom—then as now universal and well understood in that land—that the Lord said, by Moses, to the long-oppressed and hard-working Israelites, who were to go out from Egypt into the land which the Lord had prepared for them: "I will give this people favor in the sight of the Egyptians; and it shall come to pass that when ye go, ye shall not go empty; but every woman shall ask of her neighbor, and of her that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment, and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil [carry away the treasures of] the Egyptians." It was not in dishonesty or unfairness, nor by any deceit or misrepresentation, but it was the most natural thing in the world, that the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they asked of the Egyptians jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment; and the Lord gave them favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they gave unto them "it."

The light of such facts as these, does it seem strange that the Israelites had accumulated much personal treasure during their many years' sojourn in Egypt; that they should ask and receive much more in the same line from the people whom they had served faithfully in all those years, when they were to part with them finally; or that, thus supplied, they should have had abundant stores of gold and silver in the desert.—S. S. Times.

Letter of John G. Whittier to a child in Pennsylvania who asked him how he spent his days in boyhood.

Amesbury, Mass., 9th mo. 17, 1881.

My Dear Young Friend: I think at the age of which thy note inquires I found about equal satisfaction in our old rural home, with the shifting panorama of the seasons, in reading the few books within my reach, and dreaming of something wonderful and grand somewhere in the future. Neither change nor loss had then made me realize the uncertainty of all earthly things. I felt secure in my mother's love, and dreamed of losing nothing and gaining much. Looking back now, my chief satisfaction is that I loved and obeyed my parents, and tried to make them happy by trying to be good. That I did not succeed in all respects, that I fell very far short of my good intentions, was a frequent cause of sorrow. I had at that time a very great thirst for knowledge and little means to gratify it. The beauty of outward nature early impressed me; and the moral and spiritual beauty of the holy lives I read of in the Bible and other good books also affected me with a sense of my own falling short and longing for a better state. With every good wish for thee, I am thy sincere friend.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Syrian Bread.—"Just over against this wall with its amazing stones, are the poor huts of the Syrian peasants of the modern village. Looking in at the open door of one of these lowly homes, we found that it was 'baking day' in Baalbek. Two women were seated beside the oven—a cylindrical earthenware pot three feet high; one fed the fire by throwing in sticks, mere switches, and kneaded the dough into cakes; the other took the third round, flat cakes, of the size of a dinner-plate, laid them on a pad of the same size, and the dexterously clapped them on to the inner surface of the pot. There they stuck until cooked, when they were removed and laid in a pile, whilst the baking of fresh cakes was proceeded with. The women were greatly delighted and amused at our interest in their every-day work. They did not know that we were seeing for the first time a process which we had read for years, and for which we were on the look-out. They gladly gave us of their warm bread, which we found very palatable whilst fresh and crisp; it seemed to be made mainly of corn meal. Thicker loaves are baked in stationary ovens not unlike those of the West, and are sold in the markets of all the Syrian towns. This thin bread is also seen in the bazaars, piled in stacks, and having much the look of big underdone buck wheat cakes. After its first freshness is gone it takes on a leathery consistency, and is used as in the olden time, for spoon as well as bread. A fragment is torn off, doubled up into spoon-shape, and dipped into the stev or leben (curdled milk), and then spoon and relish are safely landed in the open mouth and swallowed together. This is the 'dipping the sop' spoken of in the Gospel. To dip the sop in the dish with another implies closest intimacy; to do so and put the morsel in the mouth of your friend was to give strong evidence of your affection for him. I, too, is so with the Arabs of to-day."—Dulles' Ride through Palestine.

An account of the manner in which Phineas Pemberton and his wife first became acquainted with each other, they being the first of that family who came to America is interesting. Phineas, when a boy, was an apprentice to a grocer in Manchester. It happened, on a market-day, that whilst Phineas was serving the customers, there came in a country Friend and his daughter, of the name of Harrison, to purchase groceries for the family; and, as they waited to be served the daughter, who was but a little girl, employed herself in eating cherries out of a small basket she had brought with her. As soon as Phineas was at liberty he furnished the Friend and his daughter with the groceries they wanted; and the little girl having some of her cherries to spare, gave them to Phineas. Pleased by her generosity, he insisted upon her taking a paper of raisins in return. From this trifling circumstance, an attachment originated which ended but with their lives. They were united in marriage when of a suitable ge; soon after which they emigrated to America, and afterwards became the head of one of the most respectable families in Philadelphia. The young woman's father came to America with them.—From Robert Sutcliff's Travels.

As a gladiator trained the body, so must we train the mind to self-sacrifice "to endure all things," to meet and overcome difficulty and anger. We must take the rough and thorny road, as well as the smooth and pleasant; and portion, at least, of our daily duty, must be hard and disagreeable, for the mind can not be strong and healthy in perpetual sunshine, and the most dangerous of all states is that of constantly recurring pleasure, ease and prosperity. We will find difficulties and hardships enough without seeking them; let us not repine, but take them as a part of that educational discipline necessary to fit the mind to arrive at its highest good.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

The Imprisoned Clergyman.—The Liberator states that it is a curious irony of history that Green, the Episcopal clergyman imprisoned for refusal to submit to the decision of the court in his case, should be confined in a room which was once occupied by imprisoned members of the Society of Friends. "But," it says, "there is a difference in the situation. The Friends acknowledged no law of the State in regard to religion. Green, having sworn to obey his bishop, established by law, and accept the prayer-book, established by law, is in a different position. He has entered into contract, and has violated it. None of the flowers of Fox, and certainly not John Torrey, whose case has been quoted as a precedent, ever entered into any contract with the State to obey any of its laws in regard to ecclesiastical matters."

Intemperance vs. Truth-telling.—The celebrated Dr. Richardson makes a very curious statement, which is confirmed by the experience of the eighty or ninety physicians who attended a late meeting of the Medical Temperance Association; "That whenever strong drink produces a permanent effect upon the human body, there is established in the affected person the habit of falsehood. The word no dispensation can be relied on. It is as the very knowledge of truth, the distinction between true and untrue, has become utterly lost or forgotten."

The Methodist Ecumenical Conference.—The Christian Advocate, in speaking of the effect this Conference in promoting a feeling of fellowship among the various branches of that denomination, says:—

"The spirit of fraternity among the Methodists of the world was greatly increased; in no instances it might be said to have been first kindled. For such had been the geographical isolation of some of the branches of Methodism, that it was their misfortune, and not their fault, that they knew but little of others than themselves. The barriers that separate the seven or eight distinct organizations of English Methodism, if not wholly obliterated away, were so reduced in height and thickness as to admit of a common current running through them, and of a more united influence upon the questions that are vital to Methodism in every form. A similar effect, which we think that every American delegate was conscious, was produced upon the representatives from this side of the Atlantic."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Killing Lions by the Bushmen.—The lions seem to have a wholesome dread of the Bushmen, who, when they observe evidence of a lion's having made a full meal, follow up his spoor so quietly that his slumbers are not disturbed. One discharges a poisoned arrow from a distance of only a few feet, while his companion simultaneously throws his cloak on the beast's head. The sudden surprise makes the lion lose his presence of mind, and he bounds away in the greatest confusion and terror. Our friends here showed me the poison which they use on these occasions. It is the entrails of a caterpillar called N'gwa, half an inch long. They squeeze out these and place them all around the bottom of the bark, and allow the poison to dry in the sun. They are very careful in cleaning their nails after working with it, as a small portion introduced into a scratch acts like morbid matter in dissection wounds. The agony is so great that the person cuts himself, or flies from human habitations a raging maniac. The effects on the lion are equally terrible. He is heard moaning in distress, and becomes furious, biting the trees and ground in rage.—Livingstone's Africa.

The Thumb.—If anybody will look carefully at the end of his thumb, he will find that the surface is ridged with little thread-like ranges of hills, wound round and round in tiny spirals. If he will take a magnifying glass and examine them closely, he will find there is a good deal of individuality in the way in which these are arranged. No two thumbs are exactly alike. The miniature mountain ranges are as fixed and decided as the Alps or Sierras, the geography of the thumb as unmistakable. The Chinese have made use of this fact for establishing a rogues' gallery. Whenever a criminal is examined by the law an impression is taken of his thumb. Smudged with a little lampblack, partially wiped, and then pressed down on a piece of paper, an engraving of the thumb is made, and kept in the police records.

It serves the same purpose which is served by photographing burglars and pickpockets. The accused can be identified with great certainty. Nothing short of mutilating or burning the thumb can obliterate its features.

But this individuality in the skin of the tip of the thumb, strongly marked as it is, yet admits of strong family likeness. Brothers and sisters who will take impressions of their thumbs, will find resemblances among each other that they will not find when comparing them with the thumbs of strangers. Even thus minutely does that strange thing, family likeness, descend. What wonder is it that faces look alike, voices sound alike; how can it seem strange that members of the same family should have dispositions and similarities of temper, of mental aptitudes and hereditary diseases, when such peculiarities as the texture at the end of the thumb, and its ranges of hills, should also have family resemblances in the midst of their indefinite diversities.

Fore-sight of Birds.—Our San Francisco exchanges bring us interesting synopses of a paper read before the California Academy of Sciences by R. E. Stearns, describing the remarkable habits of certain birds, particularly those of the California woodpecker. In Napa county he examined a fallen yellow pine, the bark of which was full of "acorn holes." We quote:

"Its length was 175 feet, and the diameter of its butt was 5 feet 10 inches, and at 90 feet, 3 feet 8 inches. Above the ninety-foot line the woodpecker holes were comparatively few, neither were there any in the first 10 feet of the trunk from the ground. A piece of the bark, 12x12 inches, showed 60 holes. Taking an average of 36 holes to the square foot, it gave 41,040 acorn holes in the bark of this one tree. The holes were drilled to receive acorns of different sizes, for the birds are exact workmen, and each acorn is nicely fitted into its special cavity. Woodpeckers reject the cups, and store the acorns without them. In Knights valley he observed woodpecker holes in a large spruce tree, and he was informed that they also bore into the bark of certain oaks to a limited extent. The acorns were generally considered as laid up for a winter's supply of food; but while in this climate no such provision was necessary, it was also very improbable that woodpeckers would feed on hard nuts or seeds of any kind. The more rational explanation is that they are preserved for the sake of the grubs they so frequently contain, which, being very small when the acorn falls, grow until they eat out the whole interior, when they become a welcome delicacy for the bird.

After the reading of the paper, Lightner, a member of the Academy, stated that he had observed woodpeckers engaged in drilling holes in the bark, when a blue-jay was seen to fly close up to one and inspect the size of the hole. Some active chipping then ensued, when the blue-jay flew away, but soon returned with a green acorn without the cup in his beak. This he offered to the woodpecker, who took it with his beak, and set it into the hole, and drove it home with a few taps, where it remained. This process was continually repeated. Lightner desired to know what were the special benefits derived by this mutual service conducted between a wood-eating and an insect-eating bird.

Stearns said that great numbers of untouched acorns remain in the spring, which have developed no worms suitable as food for the woodpecker, but which supply nutriment to bluejays and squirrels. Thus a community of interest was manifest, explaining their joint labors.—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 26, 1881.

We have received the printed Minutes of the Yearly Meeting held at Baltimore, from the 22d to the 27th of 10th month, last.

Francis T. King and Allen C. Thomas acted as Clerks.

The minute on the state of Society, which was adopted after the consideration of the Queries and Answers, contains among other things, the following paragraphs:

"A free gospel ministry is one of our most important doctrines; it is an essential feature in our faith and organization, and to compromise, or cast it aside, would seriously weaken or destroy our mission as a Society."

"A desire has been expressed that our members should not allow themselves to be affected by a spirit of worldliness. The theatre is a strong temptation to many. The most successful plays are those which appeal to the lowest and most sensual parts of human nature, and are utterly at variance with spiritual life.

Baltimore Yearly Meeting is composed of three branches—Baltimore Quarterly Meeting, Dunning's Creek Four Months' Meeting, and Virginia Half Year's Meeting, so that it occupies the wide range of country from the Susquehanna river to the Allegheny Mountains, and from Central Pennsylvania to North Carolina. The number of members is not large, but it is evident from the Minutes before us, that they have engaged in various fields of labor. These minutes contain reports from the "Peace Association of Friends in America," to aid which the Yearly Meeting contributed $100; from "The Associated Executive Committee on Indian Affairs," to which the same contribution was made; from the "Committee on Home Missions," from the "Committee on Foreign Missions," which had used most of the funds raised for the support of a "Training Home for Girls" on Mt. Lebanon, Syria; from the "Trustees of the Miles White Beneficial Society," who had distributed from their income $1725 for various "charitable objects, $906 for educational purposes, and $275 for the dissemination of books and tracts;" from the "First-day School Association," from the "Baltimore Association," which had expended money for educational purposes in North Carolina and Tennessee, and for repairing or building meeting houses; mostly in North Carolina; from the "Committee on Education," and from "The Committee on Pastoral Care of our Meetings and Members," for whose expenses $300 were appropriated.

The avoidance of such unfriendly expressions as the "Sabbath" for "First-day," which is now used by some who claim the name of Friends, is one of the evidences that Friends of Baltimore Yearly Meeting are more conservative in their views than some others. But we feel doubts as to the real benefit to be derived by Friends from the appointment of committees on almost every branch of labor and testimony-bearing, to which the faithful members can be called; and the absorption of the time and strength of a Yearly Meeting on these collateral subjects. When too greatly multiplied, we believe the tendency is to so fill the minds of those assembled, as to lessen the ability or the desire to enter into that close examination into the spiritual condition of the body, which we have long regarded as the most important part of the duties of a Yearly Meeting.

The use of the word: "Missions," as applied to the labors of members of our Society, has always felt unpleasant to us, because such labors by other denominations have generally been conducted in a manner not consistent with our convictions of the nature of gospel ministry, and of the necessity of continually seeking Divine guidance in the performance of religious duties. The labors of James Backhouse in Australia, of Stephen Grellett on the continent of Europe, of Daniel Wheeler in the South Sea Islands, of Ebenezer Worth at Tunesassah, and of hundreds of others of our fellow-members since the days of George Fox, may in one sense be termed missionary labors; but if we become accustomed to use this epithet in speaking of the services into which our faithful members are led, we are in danger of losing sight of the distinctive principles of the Society of Friends as to ministry and worship. In some cases (we fear in many) the so-called mission laborers under the control of Friends have not manifested a belief in or regard for our principles in their manner of procedure. Thus the Society has become compromised, and its ability to hold up a pure standard to the Truth, has been lost.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—While Charles J. Guiteau, who is on trial at Washington for the murder of President Garfield, was being conveyed on Seventh-day last from the court-room to the prison, he was shot at and slightly wounded in the wrist. The assailant was mounted on horseback, and after firing into the van, he rode rapidly away and disappeared. A man named William Jones had been suggested, but as yet has not been identified by the officers of the van.

The report of Lieut. Berry, accompanied by maps of Wrangel Island, has reached the Navy Department. What was formerly known as Wrangel Land is shown to be an island, about 60 miles long by 20 wide, its shape being such that that of a parallelogram with the north end rounded off.

Professor Swift, of the Warner Observatory, at Rochester, New York, discovered a faint comet on Thursday night, last week, being the seventh of the present year. It is in the constellation Cassiopeia, and has a right ascension of about one hour fifty minutes, declination north 7 degrees, with a motion slowly westward, no tail is visible, but there is a slight central condensation. It is nearly round, and its diameter is estimated at four minutes.

The Superintendent of the Census reports to the Secretary of the Interior that the total population of the United States, as determined by the last census, is 50,155,783.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics furnishes the following information with regard to immigration: "There arrived in the eleven customs districts of this country during last July 503,313 persons, of whom 44,100 were immigrants and 459,213 citizens of the United States returned from abroad. Of this total number of immigrants arrived 5388 were from England, 1251 from Scotland, 51 from Wales, 6067 from Ireland, 11,275 from Germany, 2006 from Austria, 3779 from Sweden, 1743 from Denmark, 608 from France, 598 from the Netherlands, 100 from Switzerland, 24 from Spain, 148 from Holland, 75 from Belgium, 748 from Italy, 557 from Russia, 188 from Poland, 454 from Hungary, 865 from China, 12,716 from Canada, 62 from Cuba, and 422 from all other countries. During the year ended June 30th, 1880, 47,242 immigrants arrived in the United States, an increase of 27,947 over the number arrived during the preceding year. The year of greatest immigration was the fiscal year 1873, when 459,803 immigrants arrived, exceeding the immigration of the last fiscal year by only 2560."

The Secretary from the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., says that the returns of 11th month, from ten principal cotton-growing States, give an indicated yield per acre considerably less than last year. But while the quantity of the crop is reduced, the quality is generally reported as very good. The Secretary of State of Massachusetts has compiled his annual statement of the property and taxes in that Commonwealth. It shows an increase in the total valuation of $63,483,174, of which $38,805,755 is real estate.

Two hundred and fifty presented Jews from Southern Russia arrived at New York by the steamer "Helvetia," making a total of these exiles to date of 2600. It is stated that 10,000 more will arrive during the winter, Hebrew colonies are to be formed in Louisiana and Virginia.

The Governor of Michigan says the sufferers in that State probably require about $500,000 more to provide for their necessities until the next harvest, when it is hoped they will become self-supporting.

The "pink eye" is very prevalent among the horses in Brooklyn, New York. Over 1000 dead horses, victims of the disease, have been removed from the streets of that city during last week. In this city the disease is on the increase.

The small pox has appeared almost simultaneously in various places in Minnesota and Dakota, most of the cases being scattered, though in one or two localities an epidemic is threatened. In Stearns county, Minnesota one hundred cases are reported.

The report of the Registrar of the Board of Health of this city for the week ending 11th inst. states that there were 328 deaths in this city last week, 10 more than occurred during the same period in 1879, and 31 less than during the week ending 11th month 12th, 1881. Of the whole number, there were 123 ten years of age or under; 52 died of consumption 30 of typhoid fever, 19 of pneumonia, 18 of small pox and 16 of diphtheria.

Wheat—No. 3's, 101's 102's 143's, registered 112's coupon, 115's; 4's, 117; currency 6's 132.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice, price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported 12 a 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 71 cts. for export, at 81 cts. for domestic.

Flour—Dull, but steady. Sales of 1800 barrels, including Minnesota extra, at $7.12 for clear, and $7.25 a $7.50 for straight; Pennsylvania extra flour at $6.62 a $6.75; western do. do. at $7 a $7.75, at patents at $7.75 a $8.50. Rye flour at dull at $5.50 $5.75, and corn meal at $3.75.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and rather lower. Sales 3000 bushels Delaware red and amber at $1.41 a $1.42 Rye is quiet at $1 for Pennsylvania. Corn is in high demand. Sales of 8000 bushels, including yellow, 70 cts.; mixed at 69 cts.; steamers at 68 cts.; No. 3, 67 cts. and rejected at 67 cts. Oats are in moderate request. Sales of 9500 bushels, including white, at a 53 cts, and rejected and mixed at 48 1/2 a 49 cts.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 11th month, 1881.—Loads of hay, 402; loads of straw, 1. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.30 a $1.40 for 100 pounds; mixed, $1.20 to $1.30 for 100 pounds; Straw, $1 to $1.10 for 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were dull this week, and prices were rather lower: 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2 a 7 cts. per pound, as to quality.

Sheep were rather dull, but prices were unchanged. 10,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 1/2 cts., and lambs at 4 1/2 a 7 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were in demand; 6200 head sold at the different yards at 7 a 9 1/2 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The Dublin correspondence of the Times says: "The most sanguine hopes of peace and order have been disappointed at the present state of this and the prospects for the winter. Outrages are being out again, which, it is feared, are only the beginning of a series of crimes."

A large meeting of magistrates, land-owners, tenant farmers and the County Council, County Tipperary, have passed resolutions supporting the Government policy in suppressing the Land League, expressing their loyalty to the Queen and the Constitution, and thanking the constabulary for their conduct during the late crisis. The meeting formed a society for mutual protection against boycotts.

A dispatch from Geneva to the Daily News relates that the complete annihilation of the village of Elm, the Canton of Glarus, appears to be only a question of time and bad weather. The summit of the peak near the village is moving.

The British Consular Ministry is gazetted in the Journal as follows:

Garbetta, President of the Council and Minister Foreign Affairs; Waldeck-Rousseau, Minister of Interior; Allain-Targue, Minister of Finance; Camille Desmoulins, Minister of Public Works; Camille Desmoulins, Minister of Agriculture; Camille Desmoulins, Minister of Public Instruction; General Campanier, Minister of War; Antonin Prost, Minister of Fine Arts; Cocheret, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs; Gougeard, Minister Marine.

Deaths from Mecca state that 5000 persons are dying daily from cholera. Steamers at Djiddah refuse to bark returning pilgrims.

The town of Manzanillo, Mexico, was completely destroyed by a storm on the 26th ult, but no loss of life is reported. Four large vessels in port and all smaller craft were destroyed and totally wrecked.

The loss on property, not including the shipping estimated at $500,000.

No settlement has been made of the boundary duty between Mexico and Guatemala, both governments continuing "defiant."

The custom house at Valparaiso, Chili, has been destroyed by fire. Loss $1,000,000.

DIED, 4th month 28th, 1881, UNITY, wife of Aa Stratton, in the 74th year of her age, a member Salem Monthly Meeting, Col. Co. Ohio.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 3, 1881.

NO. 17.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 121.)

Moses Roberts came from Gwynedd in 1767, and married Jane Lee, of Exeter. He was commended as a minister in 4th mo. 1768. After his release from prison, in 1781, his name several times appears on the minutes of the Yearly Meeting. He appears to have died about the year 1789.

After Job Hughes' imprisonment ended, he was again returned to Catawissa; for, when an indulgent meeting was established there in 1787, it was held alternately at his house and at that of another Friend. His name often appears on the records of Catawissa Monthly Meeting. He was recommended as a minister in 1799, and removed to reside in Upper Canada in 1805. The report to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, of Yonge Street Monthly Meeting, Canada, mentions the death of Job Hughes, a minister, on the 26th of 4th month, 1807.

In reviewing these records of the past, the mind is brought into sympathy with the innocent sufferers, who "preferred to endure persecution and imprisonment, rather than sacrifice that peace of mind which cannot be enjoyed except as we endeavor to do the Lord's will. They have long since been gathered to their everlasting homes; and if they continued the end of life to manifest that faithfulness to their Divine Master, and that resignation what He might appoint, which marked the midst of their imprisonment, they have no need received "the end of their faith," even the salvation of their souls,—that eternal life before us as the reward of patient continuance in well-doing. However grievous their hardships may have seemed at the time, yet looking back from the distance of 100 years, they are seen to be of little importance except they contributed to the obtaining of a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." In 1794, reports were sent up to the Yearly Meeting of the establishment of regular meetings for worship at Catawissa and Roaring Creek—in 1795, of the settlement of a Pre-arranged Meeting at those places—and in 1796 at a Monthly Meeting at Catawissa, composed of Friends residing there, and of those at Roaring Creek, Fishing Creek and Muncy.

So far as we ascertained no member of our Society now resides in that section, south of the Susquehanna, our Friend, Watson Hibbs, of Roaring Creek, having been the last survivor. The original log meeting-houses built nearly 90 years ago, are still standing at Catawissa and Roaring Creek, and are kept in repair by those who left us in 1827, who have the control of them and hold occasional meetings therein; though the number of their members is so reduced that no regular meeting for worship is held in either. In Catawissa one elderly woman was the only representative residing in the place.

Roaring Creek is the name given to the valley of 10 or 12 miles in width, lying south of Catawissa Mountain and between it and Little Mountain. Its first settlers were chiefly Friends, but about the beginning of this century the spirit of migration seems to have strongly affected the people of Catawissa and Roaring Creek. Job Hughes, as has been already mentioned, moved to Canada. When in the neighborhood, we were told that he was a man much beloved and esteemed, and his example proved contagious. Other families followed, like a flock of sheep following their leader from one pasture to another; some going to Canada, others to Ohio, and other places.

The Monthly Meeting of Catawissa felt itself so much weakened by these removals, that in 1807 it adopted the following minute: "As a considerable number of our members have already removed to other parts of the country, and it appearing likely that several more families may leave this neighborhood in the course of the summer, which occasions some doubt of Friends remaining here being sufficient to hold a Monthly Meeting, &c., it may be advisable to offer our situation to the consideration of the Quarterly Meeting; a disposition prevailing among us generally to submit to the advice and judgment of Friends on the occasion."

The result was that in 1808, the Monthly Meeting was laid down and attached to Muncy, which had been constituted as a separate Monthly Meeting, in 1799.

In 1814, the members south of the northeast branch of the Susquehanna were again formed into a Monthly Meeting, with the name of Roaring Creek.

We held meetings in the old log houses at Catawissa and Roaring Creek, which were well attended. There was much openness; and especially at Roaring Creek, where the house is in a rural situation remote from any village. The people seemed to have a hunger and thirst after spiritual food. One household of ten persons (including two of the Indian boys from Carlisle who were spending vacation there) came a distance of several miles, bringing every member of it with them. In this family were a great-grandfather of 80 years, a little orphan girl of 2, and a youth of 19 crippled by scrofula and unable to walk, who was tenderly lifted from the open wagon by his father and carried to a seat in the house.

As I watched the people coming from different directions, some on foot, and some in open wagons, a desire was felt that the blessing of the Lord might rest upon them, and that they might receive some spiritual refreshment. The solemnity which covered the company when they settled down into silence, seemed an evidence that the opportunity was owned of the Lord. As the meeting drew towards its close the feeling of love increased, and we parted from one another in sweetness and with a mutual feeling of affectionate interest.

The Fishing Creek settlements are in the country drained by the branches of that stream, which, flowing from the north, enters the northeast branch of the Susquehanna a short distance above the mouth of the Catawissa, which is on the south side of the river. The head waters of Fishing Creek are in the range of hills forming the southern boundary of Muncy Valley; and along its banks in olden times lay the Indian pathway from the northwest towards Wyoming Valley.

We attended the meeting of Friends here, which is held at Greenwood; and public meetings at Millville and Bloomsburg.

While in this neighborhood we received on a First-day morning, the solemn and startling intelligence of the sudden death of our valued friend Sarah A. Deacon. On the Fifth-day previous she had attended her own Monthly Meeting of Frankford, in which she had spoken in the ministry. Before the meeting for worship closed, her head was observed to fall. She was removed from the meeting, but never spoke again; and passed from this state of existence the following morning. She was a friend in whom we were all interested; being attracted to her by her simplicity of character, the religious fervency of her spirit, and her open and affectionate disposition. Shortly before our leaving Philadelphia, she had spent a day in company with two of our number. That visit now seemed like a sweet parting opportunity between those who should see each other's faces no more.

In visiting among the families of Friends and others in Fishing Creek neighborhood, we found many proofs of the truth of what our Saviour declared, "In the world ye shall have trouble." In one, a young man, just entering on what bid fair to be an honorable and useful career, had been recently removed by consumption. In another, about two weeks before our visit, a promising boy of 10 years had been called away, leaving a mother's heart tender and broken. Another still mourned for a son suddenly killed some months before by the shifting of a load of railroad ties. Another was in affliction over the loss of a beloved cousin, taken without warning from works to rewards. It was a time in which there was a renewed call to all of us, to seek for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker the Lord is—to become established in the Truth through the experience by Divine Grace of repentance for sin, and forgiveness through Christ our Redeemer—and thus to be brought into that quiet habitation, where the true Christian can retain his confidence, having his heart fixed and trusting in the Lord, no matter what perplexities or storms may prevail in the outward world.

J. W.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

A Vindication of the Truth.

At the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Sydenham, 10th month 19th, 1881, it was asserted by a minister belonging to Norwich Quarterly Meeting, "That there was no such thing as a spiritual seed in man that would if attended to, lead him to salvation." Also, that "the Spirit never washed or cleansed any one; that it was the blood."

When this was objected to as unsound doctrine, and not according to the principles of the Christian religion as professed by Friends, and shown by the writings of George Fox and Robert Barclay, a Friend belonging to this Monthly Meeting then stated, "That the writings of Friends made no difference, that we did not go by Friends' principles, but by the Bible," and that a Divine seed in man before conversion could not be proved by the Bible. With regard to the above assertions, I believe them to be unsound and not in harmony with the Scriptures, nor yet with the testimonies borne by ancient Friends.

As to the first assertion, "That there was no such thing as a spiritual seed in man that would if attended to, lead him to salvation," I would call the attention of the reader to the following texts of Scripture, which I think should leave no doubt in the mind of any one as to the truth. I will notice first, the parable recorded in the 8th chapter of Luke from the 4th to the 8th verse. In the 11th verse the Saviour saith to his disciples, "The Seed is the Word of God." And the apostle Peter also ascribeth the new birth to this Seed and Word of God, saying, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever," (1 Peter i., 23). Robert Barclay says, "Though then this Seed be small in its appearance, so that Christ compares it to a grain of mustard seed, which is the least of all seeds (Matt. xiii., 31, 32), and that it be hid in the earthly part of man's heart, yet therein is life and salvation towards the sons of men wrapped up, which comes to be revealed as they give way to it. And in this Seed in the hearts of all men is the kingdom of God. Hence Christ saith to the Pharisees, when they demanded of Him when the kingdom of God should come. He answered them and said, "The kingdom of God is within you," (Luke xvii., 21). I would ask, were these Pharisees born again? if they were they would have known where the kingdom was, and where Christ and the Father were; for Christ saith (John xiv., 23), "If a man love me he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." Surely men would know if they had the Living Presence with them, except they themselves were in darkness, as John testifies, "The Light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehendeth it not," (John i., 5).

As it hath been proved that the Seed is the Word of God, we now find the forerunner of Christ declaring it to be a Light, that is, the life of Christ was and is the Light of men, (John i., 4). Thus John the Baptist calls the Seed which was sown in all kinds of ground, and which the apostle Peter says, is that Seed which is incorruptible, and by which men are born again a Light, and declares it to shine in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not, (John i., 5).

How beautifully our Saviour makes this clear! "When the people were gathered thick together," when he called them "an evil generation" seeking a sign, (Luke xli., 29), with these words, "The light of the body is the eye; therefore, when thy eye is single thy whole body also is full of light; but when thine eye is evil thy body also is full of darkness. Take heed that the light that is in thee be not darkness. If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light; as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light," (Luke xli., 34-36). Herein we find that the Light or Seed or Word of God can be so covered up that it cannot grow or shine because the ground or heart of man is full of cares, or riches, or pleasures of this life. Or, as illustrated by our Saviour, we have an "evil eye," and if so, the Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world shineth in darkness.

To the assertion "That the Spirit never washes or cleanseth any, that it is the Blood," by this I would infer that the speaker would have all men believe men are cleansed from all unrighteousness exclusively by the blood of Christ.

My objection to the above is that as "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one," (1 John v., 7); one in power (Matt. xxviii., 18), and one in glory (John xvii., 5), and that whose offereth praise to the Son glorifieth the Father, and no honor is acceptable to the Father but by the Son, through the Holy Ghost; in like manner there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and these agree in one (1 John v., 8), and work the one and self-same effect in the hearts of all men, for it is evident that the apostle referred to man when he spoke of "bearing witness in earth" by the verse following. "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater" (9th verse). Therefore I would conclude that the Spirit, the water, and the blood work the same and are equally necessary for the salvation of the souls of men; and in proof would bring to mind the language of Scripture, where the apostle, after bringing to the remembrance of the Corinthians some that did all manner of wickedness, useth these memorable words: "And such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." The apostle makes no mention of the water or the blood in the washing or cleansing of these, from which we might infer that it was in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit alone that they were cleansed, (1 Cor. vi., 11). The same apostle, in his most excellent address to Titus, uses this very impressive language: "For we ourselves were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasure living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another; but after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared, not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." (Titus ii., 3-5).

In no place in this epistle, which was written to one who was left in Crete to "set in order the things which are wanting," do we find mention of the blood, but they were cleansed by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Thus we find that the Spirit and the water are equal with the blood in the cleansing of the souls of men, for the above texts are used to convey the same meaning as that well known text: "But we walk in the Light as He is in the Light; we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." (1 John i., 7.)

Let us consider the language of our Saviour quoted in the above texts, also the apostle's writings to one whom he styles "mine own son after the common faith," and take heed that we preach none other doctrine than this is preached, lest we come under condemnation.

J. L.

Ontario, Canada.

For "The Friend."

Peaceable Conduct the Best Defence.

One of the most successful expeditions in the many that have essayed to penetrate the African Continent, was that sent out by the English Royal Geographical Society in 1871 to explore the country between the east coast opposite Zanzibar, and Lake Nyassa, and to determine various geographical problems.

Setting out with a caravan of about 12 porters, traversing regions which were out of the usual travelling routes, meeting with various tribes whose fears and suspicions incited them to warlike attacks, losing the head of the expedition by fever soon after their departure, and being absent the greater part of two years, it is greatly to the credit of Joseph Thomson, on whom the command devolved, that he succeeded in accomplishing the object of his mission, and brought back his men without one exception, after a journey of about 11 months, and without taking the life of a single native. It is the more remarkable, he was then a young man but little past 20 years of age; and is a strong confirmation of the experience of his countryman David Livingstone, and of many others, that a peaceable conduct, accompanied with proper respect for the rights and feelings of others, a better protection than force of arms, even among barbarous tribes.

The description given by Thomson in his book, "To the Central African Lakes and back," of the adventures of his party, contains some interesting illustrations of the coolness and courage with which he encountered danger.

On their march to Lake Nyassa, they were told that one part of their route was impassable, owing to war parties of a ferocious slave-raiding tribe called Mahenge, who were greatly dreaded. His first meeting with the dreaded warriors is thus related.

"Marching quietly along in single file through a dense piece of forest, with no sound to break the stillness, and every one be alert, we were suddenly startled by a loud sound proceeding from the forest. An immediate halt took place, and I could observe a sort of nervous shock pass along the line of porters, till at last an articulate whisper of 'Mahenge! Mahenge!' reached my ears. The foremost men were already hurrying back, and bads dropped from paralyzed shoulders, and panic ensued. Fortunately I was in the rear. So, seizing my gun, I raised it and threatened to shoot the first man who attempted to pass me. This new danger fairly emboldened them. Some, in spite of torn clothes and bodies, attempted to escape sideways, but nature favored us too well. At last, the invaluable aid of Chuma and some of the more courageous of the men, the caravan were somewhat quieted, the loads gathered together, and the men around them.

With a considerable feeling of relief we said that we had not been observed. This was a fortunate thing for us, as the Mahenge could certainly have swooped down and counted our flight if they had noticed our attempt to retreat. In such a case few of the porters would have stopped till the coast was reached, with the story of a mighty battle, in which I would of course be killed. However, I had now time to breathe, and think what I should do next. A council of war was accordingly held, and we came to the conclusion at this state of things must not last, or ruin would come upon the expedition. It was far we must come to some understanding with the Mahenge, and learn whether they were to be friends or enemies. I determined to try the effect of my white skin, and to show complete confidence in the savages. Selecting Chuma, and a porter who could speak the language, we went forward unarmed, leaving instructions for the men to be ready for any emergency; and to tell the truth, they seemed wonderfully courageous after their first panic. In a few minutes we got clear of the forest, and a strange and unusual scene met my eye. Through the long grass tramped in single file one line of warriors, dressed in the most wonderful feather head-dresses, with a few old-cat skins on their shoulders, but otherwise entirely nude. Their faces were painted the most hideous manner, and certainly they did look like typical savage warriors. Their arms consisted of a stabbing-spear, two three assegais, a club, and an oval or elliptical-shaped shield of bullock's hide, which they were carrying over their heads to protect them from the wet grass. It was really a sight worth seeing.

On emerging from the forest we raised a shout to attract attention. In a moment they retired in alarm. Down came their shields; spears were seized, and everything got ready for a fight. Some dropped behind bushes. It was a critical moment, but we could not now retreat. I stepped into view, and my appearance took effect on them like a shock of electricity. A buzz of surprise arose. I lifted my hands to show I had no weapon, while my interpreter shouted out 'Mzungu! Mzungu!' and declared that we were friends. At once suspicion was disarmed. They gathered round with shouts, and surveyed me as a curious animal about which they had heard strange stories.

After we had obtained silence, we proceeded to explain who we were, where we were going, and that our intention was to make friends with them. They at once assured me we were quite safe. They were not fighting the white man. They had been away fighting the Walungulu, but as their chief's son had become ill, they were escorting him home. They further declared that we should be made most welcome in Mahenge, when we arrived there. This was very satisfactory, and relieved my mind very much.

"We sealed our friendship by 'making brothers' with the chief's son. This ceremony is done by tasting each other's blood, and vowing eternal friendship. Of course I did not take a personal part in this savage ceremony. Chuma acted as my proxy."

On another occasion while going by water in the southern part of Lake Tanganyika, with a few of his men, they stopped at an island to wait for favorable weather. He says:—

"While dozing away the day under the shadow of the rocks, with the pleasant ripple of the water at our feet, enjoying the beautiful view, the clear sky, the transparent tropical atmosphere and the cool lake breeze, we were once more surprised by an interesting incident. Anticipating no evil while located on an island where we had found only an old man and a woman, we were all lying on shore, with the exception of Mr. Hore, and without weapons. Most of the men were asleep, and all slumbering in the sense of peaceful security when we were suddenly awakened by a cry from Hore. Looking up, we were astonished by the sight of a large band of natives descending the rocks, fully armed with bows and spears, and proceeding with a deliberate step, which indicated some decided object in view. Before we could fairly realize the position we found ourselves surrounded and cut off from the boat; and on every commanding rock stood warriors, ready at a moment's notice to launch their arrows or spears.

"It required but a glance to take in the situation. There was no mistaking the meaning of the position they had taken up, or the fact that we were quite in their power. An attempt to gain the boat would have meant our instant destruction. Their dress and arms showed that they were Waipa; and we knew that there was no more peaceable race in Central Africa. We concluded therefore that they must have had some very potent reason for assuming their present threatening attitude; and as our consciences were clear, we saw that there was some mistake which only required to be cleared up. We showed not the slightest alarm or astonishment, but addressed them with words of welcome, and smiling faces, as if they had come on a friendly visit. Hore sat up in the boat and began lighting his pipe, while I went forward among the warriors, and examined their arms with curiosity.

"The Waipa looked intensely astonished at this reception, having expected something far different. At last they informed us of what business they had come. A slave had been stolen from one of their villages, and they had been told that the white men had done it, and they had come to fight us and get him back. They had also been informed that we intended taking all their slaves from them. At this we laughed, and said that if they found their slave with us they would be quite at liberty to fight. Hore then invited the leader to enter the boat and look for himself. This he was rather afraid to do, but at last satisfied himself that no slave was there.

Hore improved the occasion by enlightening them as to who the white men were and what was their mission in Africa, thereafter giving them a small present of cloth, with which they departed quite delighted. This is another instance of the really peaceable intentions of most native tribes; a little reasoning goes a very long way, and a show of confidence always wins a reciprocal feeling."

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

Practical Religion unto Salvation.

There are few, perhaps, among the professors of the Christian name but will acknowledge, that religion is the most important of all subjects that can claim the attention of responsible and immortal beings. It is a subject which has respect not only to the things of this life, but to the eternal age beyond; as writes the apostle:—"Godliness is profitable unto all things: having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." What is needed is, that we carry out this scriptural view of things into consistent godly practice in our every-day life and conversation; thus letting our doctrine and our walk coincidentally prove that we are honest alike to our convictions and to the sacred cause of Truth.

The religion of Christ Jesus has for its great aim the salvation of the souls which He came to redeem and to save. This salvation, through obedience to that which is made known of God within us, is the great business of this probationary life—the narrow way, the high way, the only way to that kingdom which consisteth not in meats or in drinks, but in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. There can be no religion or Christianity without Christ. And a Christian is one who casts himself upon Him for grace and knowledge, for preservation and salvation. These the Saviour leads by his quickening, in-teaching, Holy Spirit. For that which delivereth from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God, is the Spirit of Truth or Light of Christ; which also teacheth all things necessary to salvation and guideth into all truth.

That this inward work, this walk and warfare as with the sword of the Spirit, requires "hardness," diligence, and watchfulness unto prayer, it is not worth while to try to conceal or to deny. "Every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire." "We preach the cross," said one of the early Friends, "and them that cannot own us there we lay no hands upon." "I was made a Christian," writes another, "through a day of vengeance, and burning as an oven."

"He that will come into the new covenant," declares a third, "must come into the obedience to it." Well, this coming into the new covenant involves a falling upon Christ its Mediator and ever adorable Author and corner-stone—the stone laid in Zion for a foundation—in order to our being broken to pieces. It calls for a thorough cleansing of the heart through the one saving baptism of fire and of the Holy Ghost. It requires a putting off of the old man with his deeds, before there can be a putting on of "the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." It demands a being cut out of the wild olive tree, in which we are by nature, that we may be grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree. It points to a being "buried with Christ by baptism into death," and a being "planted together in the likeness of his death" that we may "be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Now, who will say that these are easy processes to flesh and blood, or slight and superficial requisitions? While at the same time who can deny but that they are a part of the clearly defined precepts and injunctions of holy Scripture? Moreover, how the biblical record of the journeyings of the children of Israel represent discouragements and hardships; trials of faith, and patience, and allegiance; temptations, and even betrayal into sin; with, also, their continual need of dependence upon that Arm of everlasting strength, which so compassionately and marvellously bore with them! Those things were written for our learning, and should point us to a lively sense of our extreme helplessness and weakness; to the need of filial love and filial obedience; to humility, obedience, and watchfulness; that so like Caleb and Joshua, who "wholly followed the Lord," He may lead in us, and bring us into the good land.

Oh, the value of these souls for which Christ died. "What," saith that Saviour, "shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Can any know that they have a never-dying soul and be indifferent to or careless of its eternal happiness? Will any one be neglectful of the all-important end and aim of life, when such grave realities are at stake? Will such not deem it worthy their most strenuous effort to avoid eternal punishment, to lay hold on never-ending felicity, to secure that crown of joy for which a Mediator came and suffered and died and rose again, that He might obtain for us by bringing us to God? What does the loss of a soul involve? To lose this is to lose the purpose of our lives. It is to lose that by which the Redeemer died. It is the loss of heaven. Then to work out the salvation of the soul is the great end and purpose for which we were created; and is of more value than the preservation of a whole nation from temporal ruin.

Next to the loss of the soul there is, perhaps, nothing more to be apprehended, as leading to it, than the loss of religious impressions. The great things of God have usually small beginnings. Thus the coming of the Son and Sent of the Father was likened to "a root out of a dry ground;" and He compares his kingdom to a little leaven; to a grain of mustard seed, which is the least of all seeds when it is sown. So these heavenly impressions or visitations may seem faint and weak at first; but as they are allowed their due place, being regarded and nurtured by us, they grow to be the plant of renown within us, bearing in some thirty, in some sixty, and in some an hundred fold, to the praise of the great Husbandman. But we must receive the Saviour in the way of his coming. We must not overlook the littleness and the simplicity of his appearance, as the Babe of Bethlehem, in our hearts, lest we overlook that power from on high, through obedience to which our salvation must, if ever, be wrought out. For, "By grace are ye saved, through faith." If we have not faith in the smallest discoveries of this Divine grace and light to the soul, we shall not be likely to recognize and receive it as a transforming power, or as the ingrained Word which is able to save and to build up unto everlasting life. We must be meek and lowly of heart, in order to see or enter that kingdom which cometh not with observation outward show, but is to be received as a little child by all who enter therein.

How indispensable to our happiness and welfare it is that we should be faithful to the first little reproofs and manifestations of a Saviour's love to our souls! These visitations, or the still, small, pleading voice of a loving Father may be made earlier or later, at the third or sixth hour, as well as in more advanced years; but whenever, in exceeding mercy, they do come to us, how careful should we be, as was Elijah at the Mount of God, to listen, to hear, and to obey. They are the quickenings of the Holy Spirit of Christ, who thereby is designing to lead into the narrow way of self-denial and the cross; and, as obedience keeps pace with knowledge, into the green pastures beside the still waters of soul-enriching and never-ending peace. May those young in years especially, whose hearts the Lord has touched, seek early to walk in his ways through filial submission to his will in the day of small things. While in these ways, as admitted, crosses, trials, and sacrifices are to be met with, they, at the same time, are the only ones to peace—peace here and peace forever—a peace which the world can neither give nor take away. The Lord loves an early sacrifice.

"And virtue with peculiar charms appears, Crowned with the garland of life's blooming years."

Selected.

TWO PICTURES.

An old farm-house, with meadows wide,
And sweet with clover on each side;
A bright-eyed boy, who looks from out
The door, and his homelike features about,
And wishes his one thought all day:
"O! if I could but fly away
From this dull spot the world to see,
How happy, happy, happy,
How happy I should be!"

Amid the city's constant din,
A man who round the world has been,
Who 'mid the tumult and the throng,
Is thinking, thinking all day long:
"O! could I only tread once more
The field path to the farm-house door,
The old green meadows could I see,
How happy, happy, happy,
How happy I should be!"

Selected.

THE OLD CLOCK.

BY EVELINE SHERMAN SMITH.

In my father's ancient mansion,
By the pleasant river-side,
Stands a clock of olden fashion—
Curious fashion—seen no more;
It was made for his forefather,
A bold mariner of yore.

On its face is represented,
With a quaint and pleasing skill,
The resemblance of an ocean,
Whose blue waters, never still,
Seem to bear a good ship onward,
Whether winds blow fair or ill.

With its sails all set so gaily,
And its pennon floating wide,
Moves this mimic vessel, ever—
Ever on its mimic tide.
While the hours, and days, and seasons
On their endless pathway glide.

Since this olden clock was fashioned
Many years have passed away,
And the skilful hands that framed it
Long have moulded to decay;
But the soul of the designer
Seems e'en yet his work to sway.

All the springs obey his bidding,
All the wheels their task fulfil;
Every part, minute and curious,
Doth its wondrous duty still.
Working out the silent mandate
Of the vanished maker's will.

Thus the grain in autumn planted
Is through all the winter's storm;
Thus great thoughts and noble actions
Long their ministry perform—
Blessing hearts, when those that wrought them
Are no more with being warm.

Faithful still, this friendly watcher
Counts each pulse of Time's great heart;
Faithful still, its voice at morning
Bids us forth to duty start;
And, at eve, gives gentle warning
That our fleeting days depart.

Still, on all the varying seasons
That must work Life's shifting scene—
Births and bridal, fairs and feasting,
Golden summers, winters keen,
Tears and smiles, and clouds and sunshine,
It has looked with face serene.

Never faster, never slower,
Would that mimic vessel go;
Though young hearts, with a eager longing,
Fain would speed it to and fro;
And sad souls in weary moments
Filled its sails with sighs of woe.

In the dreaming days of childhood
What a mystery to me,
Was this ship, forever sailing—
Sailing on a shoreless sea—
Sailing, as I idly fancied,
Out toward the bright To Be!

What fond thoughts and tender yearnings,
Wishes, dreams, and hopes sublime,
Did I send, as precious ventures,
Out in this old bark of Time—
Then to me a fairy frigate
Voyaging to some wondrous clime!

Often, in the shadowy twilight,
As its deck would seem to stand,
Forms of gentle beings,
Each with smile and waving hand,
Beckoning me to wander with them
To the joys of fairland.

Now, like this old clock I've numbered
Many a day and many a year,
And I view the world around me
With an eye more calm and clear;
Yet this marvel of my childhood
Is and ever will be dear—

Dear for all the sacred memories
It awakes of youth's sweet prime;
Dear for sake of tender voices
That have mingled with its chime;
Dear for those who count no longer
On these shores the sands of Time.

Tearfully I gaze upon thee,
Relic of a day gone by,
Thou dost, like the dreamer's ladder,
Which united earth and sky,
Seem to link my spring and autumn
By some sweet mysterious tie.

Yes, as in the prophet's vision,
Angels seemed to come and go,
So, upon thy winged movements,
Float bright spirits to and fro—
Spirits of the past, that whisper
Pleasant tales of "Long ago."

These fair shapes, alas! remind me
That my youth is far from me;
Yet however chit or cloud,
Life's remaining years may be,
I will strive, old friend, to profit
By the lesson learned of thee.

If I keep the course before me,
Whether winds blow fair or ill,
Pacing all the rounds of duty
With unflinching footsteps still,
I may, too, work out the mandate
Of my mighty Maker's will.

Testimonies to the Truth.

(Concluded from page 126.)

I do not design to enlarge, you have had testimonies upon testimonies, you have been put in mind of these things; there is a necessity and a constraint upon me to remind you, at make a profession of the truth, of former things, of things that you have been told of, and been stirred up by the servants of the Lord to remember: I see a necessity of reminding you of them. There are many that are in a profession of the truth, that do not tell in the life of it; they are sunk down to the form of godliness, but they do not and the power of it, they do part of the work, they do not go through with it, they are for giving some sins, that they will not mortify them; they are like Saul, they make profession doing the will of God. Saul said to Samuel, blessed be thou of the Lord, I have performed the commandment of the Lord; and Samuel said, What meanest thou then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear; and Saul said, They have caught them from the Amalekites, for the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God, and the rest we have destroyed." 1 Sam. xv. 14, 15. Now, my friends, there are many people which are willing to give themselves up to outward profession of religion, they would not be found in profaneness, in that which an abomination in the sight of God; they would not be found in abominable pride in the view of God's people, they will not be seen that which is abominable and shameful wickedness; they will keep up a profession of the truth, that they may be without reproof. Though they are not so vain as to be the fashions of the world, yet they are of the same nature and spirit with the men of the world, and they conform themselves too much to the vanity, and custom, and fashion of the world, though they will not be seen in the height of it.

There are many other things which might be mentioned; in short, I would only mention this, whether you have not kept a secret reserve of some sins, and make a fair pretence to the use of them: this will be a sting to you. He that loveth any thing more than me," saith Christ, "is not worthy of me; he that loveth not himself, and forsaketh not all that he hath for my sake, cannot be my disciple." When a trial comes all must be given up, and thing vain and evil must be reserved, that contrary to the nature of Truth; the mind must be subject to the will of God, and subdued to the power of God; there must be a thorough change and reformation, we must have a mortification of sin, and not do the work only in part, but we must go through with it. Now that we may do this effectually, we had help upon one that is mighty, there are many weaknesses and infirmities, that do attend us poor creatures, that many times we are ready to faint. Have an eye to Christ, let us look unto Jesus; God hath laid his upon one who is mighty, and who is able to save to the uttermost, not only from that which is vile and contemptible, but He is a complete Saviour, that will save to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him. There is no coming to God, or being reconciled to God, but by Him, and all that come to God by Him, shall have complete redemption for their mortal souls. He is the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him; He is the Author and Finisher of our faith. He that believeth in Christ will submit to Him, and say in sincerity, thy will be done. It is an ordinary thing for people to say, Thy kingdom come, and thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven; this is a good prayer that Christ taught his disciples; there are many people that are often saying over these words, but they do not give up and resign their own wills to the will of God; if any trial, affliction, or exercise befall them, they are very apt to fret and repine. If God shall take away a near and dear friend, or a wife, or a child, we must quietly submit to the will of God, who knows best how to dispose of them, whether it be by life or death. When God is pleased to take children from parents, or parents from children, parents must not be discontented at the will of God, but submit to his afflictive hand, God doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men; He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. God calls upon sinners, Isaiah i. 16, 17, 18: "Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes, cease to do evil, learn to do well, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord, though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool; let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and turn to the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon." See that you accept of his mercy when it is tendered to you, and answer when He calls, for He calls upon the children of men, Return ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings and love you freely; God doth not delight in the death of a sinner, but rather that he might turn and live, and find favor with Him.

Man hath a day afforded to him by the Lord, and time and strength to do the work of the day; therefore work while it is day, for the night cometh when no man can work. There is a day and hour wherein man is appointed to do his work; some are called at one hour and some at another; some are called early, some are called at the sixth hour, and some at the eleventh hour. Now those that came in at the eleventh hour had their penny, had their reward as well as those that bore the heat and burden of the day. God will be a rewarder of all them that faithfully give up themselves to Him, and answer his call in the day of his visitation; he that came in at the eleventh hour had his penny, as well as he that came in at the first.

Delay not, my friends, for time is precious, those that were first bidden and made excuses, were not counted worthy to partake of the supper. Make not excuses, while God worketh with thee by his power, join to it, and answer when God calls; lest it happen to thee when thou art in distress, and callest upon God, that He answer thee not, and hear not thy prayers, because, when He called thou wouldst not hear Him. Prov. i. 24, &c.: "Because I have called and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand and no man regarded, but ye have set at naught all my counsels, and would none of my reproof, I also will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind, when distress and anguish come upon you; then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer, they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me." The foolish virgins had a day and a time, they made a profession, they took their lamps, and took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps; while the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him; then all those virgins arose and trimmed their lamps, and the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out; but the wise answered, saying, Not so, lest there be not enough for us and you, but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came, and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us; but He answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh.

Friends, you see the foolish virgins came when it was too late, therefore prize your day, and keep your watch. I cannot but admire the mercy of God, that hath extended a day of grace and favor to us; God hath not only striven for a little time, but hath continued striving; take heed that you harden not your hearts in this day of your visitation, lest it be said to thee, "The harvest is past, and the summer is ended, and thou not saved." Work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you, to will and to do of his own good pleasure. While it is the good pleasure of God to work upon thy heart, give up thyself in holy obedience to Him, even while the good Spirit of God moveth upon the face of the waters. The day of your visitation is not yet over, yield up yourselves to the striving of God's Spirit, that you may be found a willing people in the day of his power; there is balm in Gilead, there is a Physician of value there. Prize the love, and mercy, and forbearance, and long suffering of God, and bless God that hath not cut thee off in thy sin, and in the midst of thy iniquities, and that thou hast not thy portion with hypocrites, where there is weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.—John Bowater, 3rd mo. 18th, 1693.

For "The Friend."

Pioneer Life.

BY J. B. WALKER.

In this book the author relates his experience of a life, the early part of which was spent in what was then the new settlements of the West. His father died when James was very young, and his mother having returned with her child to her father's house, they removed from Philadelphia to a farm about twenty miles from Fort Pitt—now the City of Pittsburgh. His first recollections were "of a log cabin, the 'clearing' in the woods, and the struggle of a family from the city to live in a new settlement."

In those early times, tales of peril with the Indians, or of adventures in hunting game, were familiar subjects of conversation.

"Among my first recollections is a story told of one of the earliest settlers, whose cabin was occupied before the incursions of hostile Indians had ceased. The husband had gone a day's journey to Fort Pitt, to obtain food necessary to the subsistence of his wife and child, which he left alone in the cabin to watch and wait, in fear, until his return. Before he left, the cabin was made to look forsaken—as though the family had suddenly removed from it. Cooking utensils and such other implements as they possessed were hid in the woods. No fire was kindled. The slabs, split out of logs with the axe—called puncheons—which had been laid down as a floor, were taken up and thrown confusedly around—principally piled in one corner of the building. Under these an excavation was made in the ground, and some bed clothes thrown down, where the woman and her child might be concealed if she saw signs that Indians were in the vicinity. Here this brave pioneer woman had slept, or rather watched one weary night. Early the next morning as she looked out stealthily through the chinks of the cabin, she perceived Indians lurking upon the edge of the clearing. She hastened with her infant child to her place of concealment under the floor. The Indians, when they supposed they had satisfied themselves that the cabin was forsaken, came in and examined the premises to see if any thing was left worth appropriating. While they remained, the woman lay nursing her child to keep it from movement and noise. Once or twice the movement of the little one, it seemed to her, would surely betray her; but the talk and tramping of the Indians prevented their quick ears from catching the sound from beneath. In a short time they hastened away, fearing, perhaps, an ambush or attack by the settlers. The husband returned, heard the story of his wife's peril, and removed his family to the nearest "block house," or frontier fort, and hastened to give warning to the pioneers that Indians were prowling upon their border."

The clothing worn by the first settlers was almost exclusively of their own manufacture.

"When wool became plentiful and flannels were manufactured, there were no fulling-mills such as existed in later years. Necessity was the mother of invention more frequently in early days than now; and one of the methods of fulling flannels was sufficiently primitive; while at the same time, it was excessively exhilarating to those engaged in it, and those who witnessed it. The woollen web was saturated with soap and water and thrown down in an emulsified mass upon a clean space in the centre of the cabin floor. The men of the neighborhood,—especially the young men—rolled their pantaloons up to their knees, and with bare feet sat in a circle on the floor around the woollen web in the centre. At a given signal each one commenced kicking vigorously upon the web, and his kicks were met by equal ones from the opposite operator. It became a matter of muscular endeavor by each one not to be kicked back on the floor by his antagonist; hence quick, prolonged, and spasmodic kicking was paid out upon the web in the centre, which was occasionally plied by the laughing housewomen with additional soap and warm water. The result was that the flannel was thoroughly fullied, the operators thoroughly saturated with sweat, soap and water; and a general, and somewhat vociferous laughter was induced, which shook the sides of all present, and promoted appetite for the homely but wholesome meal which followed. Gatherings for the purpose of fulling by this primitive process were called by the pioneers, 'kicking frolies.' Since then I have seen fulling mills pushing and pounding the woollen web with their wooden instruments, but I think I never observed the process without smiling when the old recollection of the 'kicking frolic' was suggested to my mind. And I think it doubtful whether any fulling mill ever did the work more thoroughly than it was done in the cabins of the first settlers in the 'Indian Country.'"

Our author learned the trade of a printer, and was successively teacher, editor, and preacher; removing from place to place as circumstances led him, but spending much of his time in different parts of Ohio.

While still a youth, his mind became darkened and confused by listening to the conversation of some persons older than himself. Two of these were sons of a Presbyterian minister in Pittsburgh. "They were both sceptical; because, perhaps, of the inconsistencies which they perceived between the private life and public profession of their parents." "I was present," he says, "one evening when one of them expressed his doubts of the truth of the Christian religion. He made several statements giving reasons for his opinions. Others assented to the reasonableness of his views, and cited other difficulties which had occurred to them in regard to the Christian faith. I was startled and alarmed. The expressed doubts seemed to take possession of my mind; and while I feared to entertain them, I felt exceedingly perplexed and unhappy the remaining portion of the evening. I had been taught to reverence the Bible. That I should have a doubt in my own mind was therefore a cause of self-upbraiding and unrest. But, as in the parable, the devil had cast seed in the night, and went his way; so in this case, the evil seed sown that night lived, even contrary to my own will."

On one occasion I remember urging sceptical objections to an elderly man, who was an active Methodist, until I seemed to stagger his faith, and I left him embarrassed and perplexed. But I had no complacency or sense of triumph in the achievement. I felt deeply troubled with the thought that perhaps I had shaken his faith; and that night I prayed earnestly and long, that if the Bible were true, God would in some way show it to me, and if I had injured the good man I prayed sincerely that the evil might be corrected. I had some reason afterwards (although we never spoke again on the subject) to think that the arguments I had suggested had done evil. I know nothing of his later history, but I fear he made shipwreck of the faith."

While still in this sceptical condition, he had returned to Philadelphia, where he worked for a time at his trade, and then went to New York, where he failed to obtain permanent employment. He says:—

"My means being about exhausted, I crossed the ferry at Hoboken one morning, with the purpose of walking to Albany, and of embracing any chance that might offer by the way, to engage in any employment that would supply present necessities, and give an opportunity to commence life in some new direction. Before I left the city I had sold a camel cloak, much worn in those days, in order to pay my washing bill and supply some articles that I needed. The day was chilly—snowflakes were falling, and without my cloak I felt uncomfortably cold. I have always been hopeful in all circumstances. Not more than twice in my life do I remember a moment of despondency; but on that day—alone, on foot—going, I scarcely knew whither—with little money, and too thinly clad—I felt, for once near the end of my resources, and that I was shut up to a higher power.

"There were at that time large Lombard poplars standing by the roadside, near Hoboken, on the way to Hackensack. I stopped and stood for a few minutes under one of those old trees, and offered up heart-felt prayer. I had been asked that day whether I believed in the Bible, I should have replied that I was in doubt, and could not believe. Yet under that tree, I prayed as sincerely as I have ever prayed. I did not ask my soul whether there was a God, or whether there was reason for prayer. I did not inquire whether I believed or not. I prayed to God for aid and guidance, and whether the opinion is orthodox or not to this day I believe God heard and answered my prayer.

"In a few minutes I walked on, and but not proceeded far before I was overtaken by a farmer travelling in the same direction. We talked by the way familiarly, and I stated my desire for some employment; proposing to teach a school, or to do any other service to recruit my spent resources. He informed me that a schoolmaster was wanted in his district, about three miles further upon the road at the little village of New Durham. The principal man in the management of school affairs lived there, and he proposed to introduce me when we should arrive at his house. It happened that the family were absent at [meeting.] The snow was still falling, and was rather pleasant than otherwise that the family were away. It was so comfortable to sit by the cheery fire, and to look out upon the falling snow; and to smell the savory dinner boiling in the pot, (no cooking stoves in those days), that I really feared they would return soon, and reject my application at once, so that I should have again to take the cheerless road. I remember no hour in my life when I felt a deeper sense of comfort than I did that day, sitting within, before the open fire, and looking out through the window upon the falling snow."

(To be concluded.)

From the Delaware Co. Republican

John Muir, the Naturalist.

Editor Republican:—In your paper of October 7th, you published some account of John Muir, the Naturalist. Although a very agreeable and instructive writer he contributed many articles, during the last ten years, to the Overland Monthly and Harper's and Scribner's Magazines, which have attracted much notice and favorable comment, I have never seen any published account of his history. I passed two or three days in his company in the Yosemite valley in the summer of 1875, and from him I learned the following facts regarding his history.

He formerly was the superintendent of a factory in Wisconsin. An accident to his eyes incapacitated him for a long time from the performance of his duties, and he finally abandoned his profession or trade. He was originally a millwright. Being an enthusiastic botanist, he started from his home to collect plants, and walked to Florida. When his stock of plants became burdensome, he sent them home by rail, whenever an opportunity was afforded.

When crossing the mountains of Western North Carolina, he passed over some grounds familiar to me, and became acquainted with one of my friends there. While in Florida he suffered long and severely with fever. He finally "gravitated" to San Francisco by way of Cuba and Panama.

In California a new world of plants was revealed to him. Ascending to the top of the Sierras, he was so much fascinated with the grandeur of the mountains that he determined to spend many years there, solitary and alone, to study the habits of the trees and plants and their distribution. He is a close observer of the distribution of trees and plants, regulated by their altitude and corresponding conditions of climate; his barometer being his constant and frequently consulted companion. He told me that he had studied this subject thoroughly, that, when traveling among the mountains, he could, even at night, tell approximately his altitude above the sea, by noting the plants near him and ascertaining the prevailing species and genera. The geological structure of the mountains, and the altitudes accomplished by the ancient glaciers, upon a scale so grand as almost to defy comprehension, also excited his earnest attention, and inspired him to the conclusion to devote many years of his life to their study. He frequently returned to the Yosemite valley from his long and weary travels, to re-visit his strength, and to obtain stores for his expeditions. His stock consists only of bread, flour and tea, which he carries on his back, as he always travels on foot. He never carries fire-arms, either for protection to kill game. It is a source of great delight to him to watch the wild animals and observe their habits. He frequently passes many weeks without seeing a living person, even a hunter or an Indian. He has discovered more than fifty living glaciers among the Sierras, small remnants only of the vast sheets of ice that formerly swept over the tops of those granite mountains, cutting out deep gorges, in the case of the Yosemite, nearly a mile deep. These glacial remnants are now confined to the shady recesses of the mountains, their lowest limit being not less than ten thousand feet high. He has driven stakes in these glaciers and recorded their position, and he makes occasional visits to them, to observe their progress. Their movements are usually very slow, in many cases more than an inch per day, regulated in great measure by the steepness of the channel in which they slide. He sometimes passes the winter in the Yosemite valley, and even here he is practically imprisoned during several months, on account of snow, which accumulates to such a depth as to make traveling impossible. He invited me to make an excursion with him for a couple of weeks to visit some of his glaciers, but I was accompanying a large party, and was reluctant to leave them. He appears to have no fear of wild animals, though he occasionally says a grizzly bear.

JOSEPH WILCOX.

Providential Occurrences.—From over-exposure I became affected with violent pain in my leg; and when, becoming so lame as scarcely to be able to get along, one of our acquaintances from Newton came up with a horse ready saddled, on which he invited me to ride. This circumstance might be regarded by some as a mere casualty; but I could not but consider it as one of the many cases in which relief was sent by the overruling of Him who cares for the sparrows, and much more for those who put their trust in Him, unworthy of his notice as they feel themselves to be; and who in his providence often causes circumstances, casual in appearance, so to meet as to bring about important ends.—James Backhouse.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Marriage Ceremonies.—The [Mennonite] Herald of Truth notices a marriage accomplished in the meeting-house, in presence of the whole congregation. This appears to be somewhat unusual among their people, but the Herald commends it as an example worthy to be followed, and likely to add to the solemnity and impressiveness of entering into the sacred contract of marriage.

The experience of the Society of Friends, we think, confirms the opinion of the Herald. The solemn covering which has often been felt in our meetings at the time when the marriage ceremony has been performed, has proved a comfort and strength to the contracting parties.

Mennonite Conference in Missouri.—At a meeting of this body, held on the 23d of 9th month, resolutions were adopted, "That circuses, fairs, pie-ues, &c., are places which Christians ought not to attend, because at these places there is always more or less evil practised, and by going there the evil is encouraged."

That the wearing of the moustache cannot be allowed except in case there is a reasonable excuse given, even then it should be kept closely trimmed.

That it is the sense of this conference that uniformity and plainness of dress is desirable among the brethren and sisters, and is a matter of sufficient importance that all should labor to convince the members of its influence for good."

Roman Catholic Worship of Angels.—The Catholic Review says: "It is sad to think how little devotion is paid in these days, even by Catholics, to the blessed angels. Undoubtedly the tendency of the times is to ignore the supernatural, and it would seem as if Catholics were almost as bad, in that respect, as Protestants. What a beautiful devotion is that of angels—especially the guardian angels."

How can the worship of angels, or of any other created being or thing, be reconciled with the reply of our Saviour to Satan, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve?"

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 3, 1881.

We have received the printed Minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting (the Smaller Body) held at Lawrence, and commencing 10th mo. 7th.

Epistles were received from the smaller bodies of New England, Western and Canada Yearly Meetings; and, as the account in the Western Friend states, from Iowa; and replies were prepared and directed to be forwarded to those bodies respectively.

An epistle was received from the company of Friends about Poplar Ridge, New York, who separated from New York Yearly Meeting many years ago. The reading of this introduced the meeting into much exercise; and the subject of correspondence with that body was referred to a committee to report next year.

Spring River Quarterly Meeting proposed that the Yearly Meeting assume the control of the Friends' School at Quakerville, Kansas, known as Spring River Academy, and conduct it hereafter as a Yearly Meeting School. This proposal was referred to a committee, who, at a subsequent sitting, reported favorably; and this arrangement was decided upon.

A Yearly Meeting's Committee was appointed to promote the guarded religious education of the children. There seems to have been a lively concern on this subject.

The reports from Quarterly Meetings showed that three persons had been recorded as ministers during the past year.

The following paragraph from a Minute of Counsel prepared by the Meeting of Ministers and Elders, manifests a wholesome care:

"Ministers were earnestly advised to be guarded in their communications, not uttering words which have a tendency to wound the feelings of others, especially in exposing the errors and unsound doctrines of those from whom we have withdrawn, manifesting no spirit of envy or revenge, but showing that we are actuated by love to God and love to man, so that we may exercise the greatest possible influence for good in the church and in the world."

It was concluded to hold the next Yearly Meeting at Quakerville, Cherokee county, Kansas, instead of at Lawrence as heretofore.

We have received from a Friend in Canada an article entitled, "A Vindication of the Truth," which appears in another column.

We regard as very unsafe the statement which it controverts, that "The Spirit never washed or cleansed any one; that it was the blood." If the preacher, by these expressions, meant nothing more than to bear testimony to the atoning efficacy of the sufferings of our blessed Redeemer (in which all true Friends believe), his language is not sufficiently clear. His hearers would probably have agreed with him, if he had said with Robert Barclay, "that the remission of sins, which any partake of, is only in and by virtue of that most satisfactory sacrifice [of Christ]." For the truth of this there is abundant Scripture proof.

But to assert that "The Spirit never washed or cleansed any one," is to contradict the tenor of the Bible, which teaches that it is the Divine Power and Spirit which purifies the heart of man, redeems him from the dominion of Satan and of his own lusts, and enables him to "walk in the Light," wherein forgiveness for past sins is known. Our Saviour said to his disciples, "Now you are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you." The Psalmist prayed to the Lord, "Cleanse thou me from secret faults;" and again, "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity and cleanse me from my sin," "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me." "Take not thy holy Spirit from me." The apostle Paul told the Ephesians, that Christ gave Himself for the Church, "that He might sanctify and cleanse it with

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 10, 1881.

NO. 18.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

ce, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
P. NO. 116 NORTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 130.)

CATAWISSA MONTHLY MEETING.

Through the kindness of my friend Jesse Ellis, of Muncy, I have been favored with opportunity of examining the old book of minutes of Catawissa Monthly Meeting, which records its proceedings from its commencement in 1796, to the end of its organization in 1878. There is something very interesting in the life-history thus opened to the reader, a meeting, with its periods of growth and decline, analogous to those of the human race.

The purchase of the Indians by the Penns., the treaty of Fort Stanwix in 1768, opened the settlement the lands of Northern Pennsylvania. There was soon a great rush of speculators, settlers and adventurers, eager to select the most fertile and best located lands on the waters of the Susquehanna and its tributaries. To avoid disputes, the right of choice was given at one time to the numerous claimants by lottery.

We have already seen that as early as 1775, Jos. Roberts was instrumental in settling a meeting for worship at Catawissa. The process of these settlements was much retarded by the dissensions growing out of the revolutionary war, and the hostile incursions of the Seneca Indians to which it exposed them. At the return of peace brought renewed prosperity. There were probably a considerable number of Friends at Catawissa, Roaring Creek and other neighborhoods, at the time the Monthly Meeting was granted them. There appear to have been kept up at that time four meetings for worship, and but one Preparative meeting. The Monthly Meeting was opened on 23d of 4th mo. 1796. The minutes state "a considerable number of men and women Friends assembled."

At this first meeting, one couple declared their intentions of marriage with each other; and persons were appointed to record certificates of removal, "to draw, read and record marriage certificates," to have the care of Friends' burying grounds and granting instruments therein, and recording births and deaths of members, and to distribute books and pamphlets brought by members of the Quarterly Meetings' committee then in attendance.

For a few years there was a rapid influx of Friends into that section of country. The minutes show the receipt of 206 members by removal from other meetings, in the 3 years and 8 months succeeding the opening of the Monthly Meeting. As many as 30 of these were received on one day. Those who were received into membership by request in the same period numbered 64. As there was but little loss of membership during that time by removals elsewhere, or by violations of the discipline, the Monthly Meeting must have embraced a large list of members. This is indicated by the facts, that during the interval of 3½ years of which we are speaking, 15 couples laid their intentions of marriage before the Monthly Meeting; and that when proposals were sent around for the publication of the Journal of Job Scott in 1797, 83 copies were subscribed for in the limits of the Monthly Meeting.

Friends of Catawissa appear to have exercised a good degree of care and religious concern in attending to the various items of business that came before them. Those who applied to be received into membership were visited by committees, and their cases carefully inspected—sometimes they were under care for several months before their request was granted, and the minute when adopted generally concludes with such a clause as this: "So far as their future conduct and conversation may correspond with Truth."

To remove without certificates, and to remain in this way for a considerable time from under the care and notice of any meeting was considered by Friends of those days quite a breach of good order. One of the early complaints introduced into the Monthly Meeting, was against three brothers who had left their father's house and wandered away, and Friends in Philadelphia were requested to labor with one of these who had taken up his residence in that city. The report, signed by George Williams and Othiel Alsop, stated that they had urged him to comply with the established order of our Society, by applying for a certificate, which he appeared willing to do; but he had also erred in paying a fine in lieu of military services, the inconsistency of which "with our testimony against the desolating spirit of war" they had not been able to make him perceive. So the offender was disowned.

The care of Friends in this respect, is shown by the following minute under date 21st of 4th mo. 1798: "James Watson informed this meeting that he hath a prospect of travelling to the western parts of this State, principally on his own temporal business. Therefore we recommend him to the notice of Friends as a member of our Society in good esteem, and the clerk is directed to give him a copy of this minute." Similar cases were not unfrequent.

It may be interesting to notice a few of the cases of labor, as illustrating the patient and affectionate spirit with which Friends sought the restoration of offenders.

On the 22d of 9th mo. 1798, a complaint was introduced against John Eves "on account of his striking a man in an angry manner, and also on account of his aspersing John Keaster's character." In the 10th month the committee in the case of John Eves and John Keaster state, that they "find them in a state of open variance, and at present little or no prospect of reconciliation taking place between them." William Ellis, of Muncy, was added to the committee, and then further efforts to heal the breach were so successful, that in the 11th month they reported, "That upon deliberately treating with and advising them, they manifested a disposition to discontinue the difference that had arisen and for sometime past subsisted between them, and to endeavor for the future to live more in unity with each other. And an expression of sorrow on the part of John Eves being conveyed to this meeting, with regard to his striking a man in an angry manner, and from the report of the committee he appears to be brought to a sense of the inconsistency of such conduct with the peaceable testimony of Friends, the meeting accepting the same, with desires that the parties may hereafter prefer the unity of the brotherhood to any private animosity."

In the 10th mo. of 1798, the Monthly Meeting was informed that James Walton and John and Ebenezer Lundy had attended a marriage that was accomplished in violation of the rules of the discipline. The Friends appointed to visit them on this account seemed unable to convince them of the impropriety of their conduct, and in the 1st month following testimonies of disownment were produced to the meeting for its approval. But at this last stage of the proceedings, "William Ellis and John Loyd expressing a desire of having an opportunity of treating further with them, and a tenderness appearing in the minds of other friends towards them," the signing of the testimonies was postponed. At a subsequent meeting the three offenders made acknowledgments which were accepted as satisfactory.

In the 7th mo. 1799, "this meeting taking into serious consideration the complaints frequently made in the answers to the Queries, of the unbecoming practice of sleeping in meetings, continuing to be obviously prevalent in some of our members, and in order that some more extensive endeavors may be used for the removing of this disorder," appointed a committee "to treat with such as administer occasion for these complaints, and endeavor to stir them up to a more lively and careful attention to that important duty."

In the 4th mo. 1798, it is stated that Benjamin Palmer "had been frequent in the practice of taking strong drink." The committee to visit him reported that "he appeared in a tender state of mind, and desirous of time to endeavor for amendment." He was continued under care for about two years, and in the 4th mo. 1809, a testimony of disowment was issued by the Monthly Meeting. The next month, the committee reported that they had furnished him with a copy of the document. But Benjamin attended the meeting in person, and produced a written acknowledgment for his offences. The matter was again referred to a committee, who reported a month later, that "he appeared in a good disposition of mind," and "sincere in his offering;" and so the easily-tempted man was restored to his right in the Society, and kept under the guardian care of his fellow-members.

J. W.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Is this Life All?

Sometimes when mingling socially with religious families or individuals, and especially with larger gatherings of Christian professors, the writer has been impressed with the strong bias which the mind and hence the conversation seem to have toward the passing events of the day, or the interests of this world. On such occasions the query has almost spontaneously arisen, Is this life all we are to have respect to? Are not heaven and its compassionate Ruler, with his glorified Son our Lord and Saviour, lovely enough and engaging enough to claim their due share of our recognition and gratitude, in love and praise? Is there no infinite beyond of unspeakable importance to us where the dearest treasures should be laid up, and if so, as saith the Saviour, "there will the heart be also?" Is it well or wise that the thoughts of our hearts, and hence our conversation should be so much of the country we are merely passing through, and so little of that for which this brief span should be the preparation and introduction? Can the heart be leavened with grace, while at the same time the tongue has not on the bridle of Truth?

"Is it incredible, or can it seem

A dream to any, except those that dream,
That man should love his Maker, and that fire,
Warning his heart, should at his lips transpire?"

The writer, by no means, wishes to encourage religious conversation where no religion is not felt; neither to advocate the unhalloved introduction of it anywhere as a flippant subject for discourse. What is meant is, that sensitive, humble, and serious minds, should not complacently shrink from the advocacy of truths or themes which their souls most delight in, or, from fear of its not being agreeable to some present, withhold from joining in with subjects, occasionally introduced, which tend to direct the mind to its living and eternal interests. Our excellent discipline discourages the careful to the religious mind, "long and frequent conversation on temporal matters, especially by interesting ourselves unnecessarily in them; for there is a leaven in that propensity;" it continues, "which being suffered to prevail, indisposes and benumbs the soul, and prevents its frequent ascendings in living aspirations toward the fountain of eternal life." And, perhaps, more frequent pauses in our social intercourse would be of much advantage, as giving the mind opportunity to retire inward for the renewal of spiritual strength.

Are not these opportunities too oft, instead of oases or brooks by the way as they should be, more like life's wastes? And what is more to be avoided than a wasted life? A life, too, surrounded by such grave realities, such accountabilities, such blessings and mercies, and, withal, such manifold opportunities for diligence in business and fervency in spirit as good stewards of the manifold grace of God? Can we dare, as mere sojourners on an undefined but ever transient lease, to spend "the little wick of life's poor shallow lamp," in the pursuit of pastimes like to "chasing gilded flies?" to slumber as on the oar while the great tide of time is sweeping rapidly by, and the momentous business for which we have a being takes its own chance?

"Whence, and what are we? to what end ordained?"
"Is duty a mere sport, or an empty?"
"Life an entrusted talent, or a toy?"

It may be difficult, at times, in such companies, to exercise a wise discretion, so as to steer nicely between the extremes of too much lightness or mental and spiritual dissipation on the one hand—I allude to thoughtful minds present—and too much repression and seriousness on the other. But when we consider the unsatisfying nature of all earthly pleasures, and the injury it is to the mind to be dependent for its happiness on the ever-changing current of human events, how important it becomes that the hours of social pleasure and relaxation should be turned to good account; inasmuch as no portion of life should be insignificant to us when every portion has to be accounted for. He who has learned the value of time in connection with that eternity where we must reap what we sow, cannot but be solicitous for the help every way of his fellow-creatures. Then, on such occasions, the "watch," so strongly enforced by the Saviour, should never be allowed to get down; neither should there be any lack of fidelity and allegiance in the living acknowledgment of Him before men. While endeavoring to conform ourselves to those with whom we mingle, we should, in the language of a Christian author, "over-recollet that we may seek to please till we forget to serve them; that we may soften strong truths to render them more palatable till we come gradually less to recommend them, than ourselves. In the spirit of friendly accommodation we may insensibly lower the standard of religion, with a view to make ourselves more agreeable, and may deceive in order to conciliate."

If we may ever hopefully look forward to the improvement of general society in this respect, or "that the select social gatherings of Friends should become occasions of more profitable communication and reciprocal benefit, we must not be ashamed of the ever-endearing name of Jesus, who came to bring peace on earth and good will to men, nor content with praise and jarring truth though we may not and should not indiscreetly introduce serious subjects, yet it becomes the watchful soldier of Christ to be steadily on his tower. And while the theme so dear to his heart is not to be unduly opened or pressed, there should, at the same time, be no indifference or slight shown to the much more important topics—the blessing of religious intercourse (Malachi iii, 16, 17); and the praise of that Divine Omnipotence which created us, and the exaltation of the kingdom of that adorable Redeemer who has given himself for us as a sweet-smelling sacrifice. Whether surrounded by those we love, in friendly entertainment, or whether musing in retirement of spirit on the pillow, or by the way-side, may the solemn reality deeply impressed, that the period is hastening when the talents, opportunities and mercies, so richly granted, will have to be accounted for at that tribunal where none will avail short of acceptance with an Omniscient Judge, whose eye is on the heart, and whose favor is everlasting life.

Then to the query, Is this Life All? Ought not the answer to be a consistent, practically godly influence, even as living epistles, known and read of all men, wherever we are? Remembering the apostrophe of the poet:—

"Sacred interpreter of human thought,
How few respect or use thee as they ought!
But all shall give account of every tongue,
Who dare dishonor or defile the true."

For "The Friend."

Peaceable Conduct the Best Defence.

(Concluded from page 137.)

The nervous and excitable character, some of the people through whose count the party travelled, greatly increased the risk of the journey; and if it had not been met by an equal degree of self-possession and coolness on the part of James Thomson, much bloodshed and loss of life must have occurred. This was especially noticeable among the Marungu who live on the western side of Lake Tanganyika. This is well illustrated by the following incident:

The most notable characteristic of the Marungu is their extraordinary excitability. This was shown under various circumstances and it placed our lives in constant jeopardy from which we escaped only by the exercise of the utmost coolness and self-possession. It is especially noticeable among the mountaineers, who, broken up into small parties, live in continual danger of attack from their neighbors, or from the slave-hunting tribes around them. This fact, together with the harshness of their lot, and their entire isolation from communication with traders, probably explains the annoying trait. Even the existence of the white man was entirely unknown to them.

"My first acquaintance with their peculiarities was sufficiently alarming. It happened on the second day of our march from Kampapa. We had crossed the path which separates the deep gorge or valley of the Masena from the more open valleys of the Lovu, and had attained an altitude of about 7000 feet. I was marching along in front with only my gunbearer, through an open country, with grassy undulating hills surrounding me, my thirty men being some distance behind. Suddenly a clear startling clang through the air from a distant height. No one was to be seen, and I stopped in surprise. Then another and another cry uttered from different peaks, till the count echoed and re-echoed with the unwonted sounds. We had no difficulty in recognizing them as the Marungu war-cries.

"We were not kept long in doubt as to the meaning of all this. From every mountain top, and in every valley armed natives sprang into view as if by magic, running from place to place and congregating at different points. Down from the heights the warriors came dashing at headlong speed, brandishing the spears and axes, and still filling the starth with cries as if in great agony. It became too apparent that we were the objects of an intended attack. At first my impulse was to take to my heels and get back to my gun, but on second thoughts I refrained. They, however, seeing what was coming bore me to hurry up to my assistance. But before I could reach me, one party, headed by a prior apparently mad with excitement, dashed forward with axe uplifted, evidently intending to make short work with it. It was a critical moment, but I did not waver. Opening my arms to show that I had weapons, I shouted out the customary salutation, and declared ourselves "Wazungu" and friends. The leader of the band, now almost in arm's length of me, let drop his uplifted axe in amazement. He clearly had never observed my appearance before, or I had taken me for an Arab, whom they I heard much of, but had never seen. As I stood there, apparently unconscious of danger, and without weapons of any kind, they stood quite astounded, and doubtless confounded, as Pamilio, that I was something earthly and 'uncanny.'

Before they quite recovered themselves, a new party arrived, in great anxiety for my safety, and preparing to use their guns. I at once ordered them to put the boxes, &c., in a bag, and sit down; to keep cool and quiet, and to be ready for any emergency. The crowd now crowded round us in hundreds, still under the belief that we were Arabs, came to fight and make slaves of them; and with me walking between my men and myself they felt they were facing an ogre and a problem beyond their comprehension. This, however, did not allay their excitement, though it prevented them from commencing the fight. With demoniac faces they yelled and shook their spears and bows in arrows. Dancing round about us with the wildest gestures, they incited each other to the attack. It almost seemed as if they were on red-hot plates of iron, so much did they writhe and wriggle like men in torture. Now and then some of them would go rushing away for some distance, and dashing themselves down on the ground, would roll over and bite the earth in the agonies of self-rightful passion.

In such a pandemonium it was quite impossible to get a word in; and as it would evidently be some time before they were sufficiently calm to be spoken to, I told my cook to make some coffee, to console myself in the interim. At last our coolness had the desired effect, and we managed to make ourselves heard. I asked them if they had never seen a white man before. We came like mad friends with them, and not to fight and get slaves. Did people come with boxes and bales when they wanted to fight? If war was our intention, why were we now sitting peacefully among them? We were not Arabs and had no dealings with them. 'Are the Arabs of this color?' cried I, showing my bare arm. That proved to be the finishing coup. I felt quite flattered at the shout of admiration which greeted the sight of my white skin, here it had not been browned by African arts and damps.

Things being thus amicably arranged, we journeyed to the village after our three hours' detention, and were most hospitably treated. Two days later an incident of a similar nature occurred, which placed me in even a more perilous position. We had had a long march, and as the day was considerably gone, we were compelled to camp at a very small village, in which we found only two old men left in charge. Their fears we soon allayed, and apprehending no evil, we settled ourselves down for the night. As sufficient food could not be got in the village, the men went off on a foraging expedition, leaving only four to guard our goods. While they were away, the villagers, having got some notice of our appearance, returned, and under the impression that we were Arabs, again enacted the scenes of the Lovu valley. This time we were only four against twenty—not a very large number if we had been inclined for fighting. But that was utterly opposed to my policy, and once more, unarmed, I stepped in front. For a moment the clamor ceased. I looked steadily at the leader with my bat off, and said we were friends. He stood with a fierce and passionate face, in advance of his men, with his bow drawn to the utmost. A slip!—and a poisoned arrow would have been launched at me from within ten feet. Meanwhile the two old men whom we had at first found in the village did not cease interceding for us. The chief's face relaxed. He unstrung his bow, and I breathed freely once more, for the danger was past. We only required an opportunity to remove misconception as to who we were, to feel ourselves as safe as in any town in Britain.

In all our marches through Marungu, I found it was necessary for our safety that I should be at the head of my men. My appearance usually so amazed the natives that we got an opportunity of talking to them, while if I had been behind or out of sight, they would have attacked us without parley. I found also here, as indeed with all the tribes, that my strong point was to show complete confidence in the natives, and never to appear suspicious. It may seem paradoxical when I say that my immunity from personal attack arose from my habit of walking about alone, and without arms. This might be highly dangerous in a half-civilized country, but not so in a savage one. As savage tribes are ever at mortal feud with one another, and in constant fear of attack, they are compelled on all occasions to carry arms as an absolute necessity. Consequently, when they saw me walking about unarmed, sometimes actually miles from my men, they imagined I was something more than human, and had a great charm or 'medicine' about me, and therefore that I had better be left alone. To appear suspicious, is simply to engender suspicion in the natives, and when suspicion exists there can be no mutual understanding.

Surely all right-minded men can sympathize with the feelings of honest exultation with which James Thomson refers to the success of the system of dealing with the natives which he pursued. On arriving at the central plateau of Africa, after a march of 350 miles over the low-lying lands that border the Indian Ocean, during which they had not lost a single man by desertion or death, and not a yard of cloth had been stolen, he makes this record, "No caravan, whether Arab or European, had ever performed the same feat; in this our experience was unique. We made no brilliant march, but we did something better. We passed in peace through every tribe, leaving nothing behind but good-will and friendship. We taught the natives that our mission was peace, and that the word of the white man could be trusted."

Again, at the termination of his travels, on reaching the sea-coast, when, on calling for the last time the roll of the 150 porters, only one was not present to answer to his name; he expresses his satisfaction in the following language: "I consider it the greatest of my triumphs that in the pursuit of knowledge and in the attempt to open up benighted Africa, I have not stained my enterprise by sacrificing the lives of men. I feel it is something to be justly proud of, that on no occasion have I ever allowed myself to fire a gun either for offensive or defensive purposes."

J. W.

For "The Friend."

Westtown Boarding School.

It is both interesting and encouraging to those now engaged in endeavoring rightly to conduct this interesting seminary, to find that it has been felt to be a religious concern with those who have preceded them, which did not lessen in importance, even when the close of life was apparently drawing near. The attention of the writer was more particularly drawn to the subject by the following passage which appears on the last page of the instructive journal of our late valued friend William Evans:

"Two Friends, one of them a minister, having called to see him after the Yearly Meeting (1867), he manifested that he still cherished the concern he had long felt for the right education of the children of Friends, by addressing one of them, whom he was told had been appointed on the committee having the oversight of Westtown Boarding School, encouraging him to bear in mind, while employed in the business necessary in carrying on the school, that there was matter of more serious importance connected with it; and that if he was concerned to seek for Divine counsel in attending to that, he might himself experience a growth in the Truth; reminding him of the expression of Thos. Scattergood in the early days of the Institution: 'That if Friends were faithful to their principles in conducting it, it was a plantation the Lord would bless.' The minister having addressed him in an encouraging manner, after a little pause, he said in a broken voice, 'May the Lord, in his unmerited mercy, remove and forgive all those things which are contrary to his Divine will; that we may through mercy, unmerited mercy, know a preparation for an admittance into his kingdom of rest and peace.'"

These appear to be the last recorded expressions of William Evans in his published journal. He was appointed to serve on the Westtown Committee in 1814, and there may have been, but it does not appear from the records, that there was any interruption in his services there from that period until his decease in 5th mo. 1867—a period of 53 years.

The prophecy expressed by Thos. Scattergood so many years since, appears to have been remarkably fulfilled down to the present day. That the promised blessing may not be withheld, it is highly important for us of the present generation to bear constantly in mind the conditions accompanying it, viz: That if Friends were faithful to their principles in conducting it, it was a plantation that the Lord would bless.

The early records of the transactions of the Committee bear ample evidence of its having been from its first inception a carefully considered project—

"No air-built castle conjured in a night,
To vanish at the rising of the light,"

but commenced and carried on under a deeply-felt exercise for the right performance of a religious duty.

The Danger of a Worldly Spirit.

"Business in its proper sphere is useful and beneficial, as well as absolutely necessary; but the abuse of it, or excess in it, is pernicious in many points of view. I cannot approve, in very many respects, of the intense degree of application and attention which seems often to be required of those that are in business.

There is one danger to which the man of business is particularly exposed, and the more alarming because it is concealed—I mean the danger of gaining a worldly spirit, and of losing that tenderness of conscience, that love of religion which is the ground of all virtuous conduct. The person who is engaged in worldly affairs, whether the sphere of his engagements be large or small, should be most anxiously attentive to his eternal interests, so that they also may be kept in a flourishing, profitable condition; if this be not the case, the saying of Wm. Penn is true in regard to such a one: 'He that loses by getting, had better lose than gain.' He should also be very jealous of his scanty leisure, that he may not omit to employ some of it in his daily duties to his Maker, and in the constant cultivation of that holy frame of mind, which it is the slow though sure tendency of the spirit of the world silently to counteract. For I own I tremble at the very idea of any man's mainly pursuing his perishable interests, when, perhaps, in one short moment, he is gone. How inconceivably terrible and exquisite must be that man's anguish, whilst on the very brink of going, he knows not whither, to think that he has given up an eternity of bliss for the empty grasp of that which is lost."—John Barclay.

I saw two oaks standing side by side, the one was already clothed in tender green leaves, the other was still in its wintry barrenness, showing few signs of reviving life. Whence arose this? "The influence of sun and air and sky must have been the same on both trees; their nearness seemed to bespeak a like soil; no outward cause was apparent to account for the difference. It therefore must have been something within, something in their internal structure and organization. But wait awhile; in a month or two both trees will perhaps be equally rich in their summer foliage; nay, that which is slowest in unfolding its leaves, may then be most vigorous and luxuriant.

So it is often with children in the same family, brought up under the same influences; while one grows and advances daily under them, another may seem to stand still. But after a time there is a change, and he that was last may even become first, and the first, last.

So it is with God's spiritual children. Not according to outward calculations, but after the working of his grace, is their outward life manifested. Often the hidden growth is unseen till the season is far advanced, and then it bursts forth in double beauty and power.—Maria Hare.

THANKSGIVING.

PHIENE CARY.

O, men! grown sick with toil and care,
Leave for a while the crowded mart;
O, women! sinking with despair,
Weary of hubb and faint of heart,
Forget your cares to-day, and come
As children back to childhood's home!

Follow again the winding rills;

Go to the places where you went,
When, climbing up the summer hills,
In their green lap you sat, content;
And softly leaned your head to rest
On nature's calm and peaceful breast.

Walk through the sere and fading wood,
So lightly trodden by your feet,
When all your own life was good,
And all you dreamed of life was sweet:
And let fond memory lead you back,
O'er youthful love's enchanted track.

Taste the ripe fruit of orchard boughs,
Drink from the mellow wine once more;
Breathe fragrance from the crowded mows,
With fresh, sweet clover running o'er;
And count the treasures at your feet,
Of silver rye and golden wheat.

Go, sit beside the hearth again,
Whose circle once was glad and gay;
And if from out the precious chain
Some shining links have dropped away,
Then guard with tender heart and hand
The remnant of our household band.

Draw near the board with plenty spread,
And if in the accustomed place,
You see the father's revered head,
Or mother's patient, loving face:
Whatever your life may have of ill,
Thank God that there are left you still.

And though where home hath been, you stand
To-day in alien loneliness;
Though you may clasp no brother's hand,
And claim no sister's tender kiss;
Though with no friend or lover nigh,
The past is all your company—

Thank God for friends your life has known,
For every dear, departed day;
The blessed past is safe alone—
God gives, but does not take away;
He only safely keeps above
For us the treasures that we love.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE.

Sometimes I am tempted to murmur

That life is flitting away,
With only a round of trills
Filling each busy day;
Dusting the nooks and corners,
Making the house look fair,
And patiently taking on me
The burden of woman's care;

Comforting childish sorrows,
And charming the childish heart
With the simple song and story,
Told with a mother's art;
Setting the dear home table,
And clearing the meal away,
And going on little errands
In the twilight of the day.

One day is just like another!
Seaming and piecing well
Little jackets and trousers,
So neatly that none can tell
Where are the seams and the joinings—
Ah! the seamy side of life
Is kept out of sight by the magic
Of many a mother and wife!

And oh, when I'm ready to murmur
That time is flitting away
With the selfsame round of duties
Filling each busy day,
It comes to my spirit sweetly,
With the grace of a thought divine,
"You are living and toiling for love's sake,
And the lovin' should never repine."

Selected.

"You are guiding the little footsteps
In the way that they ought to walk,
You are dropping a word for Jesus
In the midst of your household talk;
Laving your life for love's sake,
Till the homely cares grow sweet—
And sacred the self-denial
That is laid at the Master's feet."

Selected.

WHAT OF THAT?

Tired? Well, what of that?
Didst fancy life was spent on beds of ease,
Fluttering the rose-leaves scattered by the breeze?
Come, rouse thee! work while it is called to-day!
Coward, arise! go forth upon thy way!

Lonely? And what of that?
Some meet me lonely! 't is not given to all
To feel a heart responsive here and fall,
To blend another life into its own.
Work may be done in loneliness. Work on.

Dark? Well, what of that?
Didst fondly dream the sun would never set?
Dost fear to lose thy way? Take courage yet.
Learn thou to walk by faith and not by sight,
Thy steps will guided be, and guided right.

Hard? Well, what of that?
Didst fancy life a summer holiday,
With lessons none to learn and naught but play?
Go, get thee to thy task! Conquer or die!
It must be learned. Learn it, then, patiently.

No help? Nay, 'tis not so!
Though human help be rare, thy God is nigh,
Who feeds the ravens, hears his children's cry.
He's near thee, wheresoe'er thy footsteps roam;
And He will guide thee, light thee, help thee home.

For "The Friend."

Pioneer Life.

BY J. B. WALKER.

(Concluded from page 134.)

"The farmer, Mitchell Saunder, soon returned. He had, if I remember rightly, learned from the neighbor who left me at his house that a candidate for schoolmaster was awaiting his return. I was invited to dinner, an complied earnestly with the scripture injunction to 'eat what was set before me without asking any questions.' Sannier was not a religious man, nor was there, I believe, a male member of any church in the neighborhood. The fire, and the dinner, and the hope of employment, aided me to present myself favorably to my patron; and by the time we were done eating, it was understood that I should exhibit my hand-writing at once, and as the weather was getting better we could employ the afternoon in visiting families in the neighborhood, to ascertain the number of scholars they would send." "Writing was the only scholarly accomplishment of which Sannier could judge. His eye aided him as to my competency in that acquirement; and when I came down and wrote some lines of good copy handed accompanied with divers flourishes, the matter was settled as to my qualifications, and we started at once to canvass for scholars. The effort was a success; and I began my school as teacher of the New Durham Academy."

After remaining in this position about a year and a half, J. B. Walker went to Ohio, where he became half owner of the "Western Courier," and subsequently entered a year as a student in Western Reserve College. Since his boyhood he had never before had a companion who professed to be a Christian; but at that college he was brought into a more religious atmosphere. The President was a pious man, and towards him Walker felt both confidence and respect. The gradual change which he here underwent is interestingly de-ibed. The principles and duties which the president desired the students to possess and fill, his reason assented to as proper; "but," says, "I felt unwilling to be and to do what assented to as right. I did not inquire with self why this was so; but the consciousness of the contradiction between knowledge I will was unpleasant to me. I had never felt before."

"Another inquiry kept constantly recurring to my mind, with an intensity that I had never before experienced. If Christianity were credited or destroyed, what would be the result? Such inquiries were often accompanied with doubts and objections to the Bible, that had never thought of before; and which, perhaps, others have never thought of."

"But the doubts and difficulties that still assailed me when I recurred to certain subjects, did not in the least abate the uncomfortable conviction that I was not willing, and not even desire to be willing, to do the duty which my reason and conscience approved. The doubts remained, but the inward conflict, although held in abeyance at times, was not overcome, but increased."

"For many months this state of inquiry and interest continued. It did not seem to me that my mental exercises were in any wise unnatural. They came in the ordinary way of suggestion; and as yet the internal earnest was not shown in any wise in the external life; and yet, actions which a year before I should have done with unconcern, I felt to be of doubtful propriety."

"About this time a ball was given in the gym, on the occasion of a holiday, in which the faculty of the college did not think it wise that students should participate. On the evening of the dance J. B. Walker and a few others were invited to a social visit at the house of the Professors. His mind had come into a state in which he felt a growing desire to be a Christian; yet, he saw no evil in such amusements. His narrative states:—

"In returning to my boarding house I had passed the house of mirth. I had concluded to be present that evening; but the illuminated hall—the music and the movements of the dancers, observed through the open windows, attracted my attention, and I stood several minutes, until the desire to mingle with the company gathered strength. I could see no reason to myself for my perplexity on the subject; and concluding that I was a fool feeling as I did, I started for the ball room."

"For reasons entirely inexplicable to me, when I entered, instead of enjoying the spirit of the scene and the congratulations of friends, male and female, I felt a solemnity that I did in no way dissipate. I was vexed with myself, and in order to disperse the gloom I awakened feelings in sympathy with the one about me, I retired to the refreshment room, and drank a glass of brandy, which could be had in a private way, by those inquiring for it."

"When I returned to the ball room I went through a set in a contra dance with a young man who, long ago, passed, as I hope, to the land of peace. After retiring and sitting a few moments, I noticed that she was looking at me with surprise. I recollected myself, and found I was talking to her on the subject of religion. I was chagrined; and as soon as I could courteously do so, I retired from the room, a mystery to myself and to my companion."

"That night and for sometime afterward I was unhappy and perplexed. There was an element of conscience and solemnity in my mind that did not usually belong to my thought. I do not remember whether the thought of God was a prevailing one or not. I did not feel that I had been a great sinner; but I felt I had been ungrateful to God. The death of my partner now affected me more than it did at the time of his decease. I felt that my heart was sinful, rather than that my life had been so. I tried to control my mind and avoid all wrong thought, but could not satisfy myself. 'When I would think good evil was present with me.' I felt this in the depth of my soul. I burned some books, not so bad in themselves, as some books are, but because I thought them unprofitable. I found a Bible belonging to the family where I boarded, and read it in preference to other things. Its teachings were now subjects of interest and inquiry, and fixed my attention. No one, however, who called at my room during this period ever saw me reading the Bible. Several passages seemed duplicates of my own experience: One I remember expressed my state of mind, and my heart rose in supplication in the words of one that had felt just as I did at that minute, 'Lord I believe, help thou my unbelief.'

"I struggled hard to regulate my thoughts and imaginations, some of which I now felt were offensive to God; but I could, by no act of will produce the good in myself that I desired. I shall always remember one day, when I had determined with stronger purpose than usual to keep my heart with diligence, I set out for recitation, and by the way I was shocked to find my mind full of imaginations that I had determined should be cast out. It may not be believed—it seems so incredible—yet it is true, that I was angry with myself; or rather with my heart; and stamping on the ground, I uttered an oath, which I do not remember that I ever did before, and that I have never done since."

"After months of conflict and seeking, light shone more fully into his soul, and a feeling of peace and happiness was experienced. 'Preachers seemed to talk in a new language. I remember the first sermon I heard on the subject of the Saviour after I had 'ears to hear.' I wept and laid my head on the front of the pew to let my emotion flow off in tears. One marked change in the state of my mind was that while before I saw no God in anything that occurred about me, I now saw God in all events. In every thing that occurred, from the least to the greatest, I saw the hand of God."

"During this period I was not afraid of death." "When I retired at night my mind was in a state of pleasant peace." "I did not ask myself whether I had become a Christian. The first incident that led me to realize the difference between present and former states of mind, was the pleasure begotten by hearing it stated that a young woman had become a Christian. This I knew would before have given me no pleasure; but now my interest and joy were great." "An aged minister had fallen into sin. For days, whenever I thought of it, I felt a deep sense of humiliation and regret for the dishonor which had been brought upon the cause of Christ. My faith at this time was not in creeds nor in passages of Scripture. I had a sense of reconciliation with God."

"Thus through exercises protracted and intense, and perhaps peculiar, I awoke to the consciousness of being a disciple of Christ; and with this consciousness came the sense of duty: 'Lord what wilt thou have me to do.'"

What Have They Seen?

From the golden city which sat as a queen upon the river Euphrates came royal ambassadors to the palace of good king Hezekiah. The Babylonian monarch had heard of the dangerous illness and speedy recovery of the Jewish king, and perhaps moved by kindly impulse, or by royal courtesy, sent letters of congratulation and a present to his brother king.

The Jewish ruler was elated at such attention paid by the head of the grandest empire on the globe, and could not conceal the pride and vanity which the visit aroused within his mind. "Hezekiah was glad of them, and showed them the house of his precious things, the silver and the gold and the spices, and the precious ointment, and the house of his armor, and all that was found in his treasures, there was nothing in his house nor in all his dominions that Hezekiah showed them not." The ambassadors went their way and speedily there came to the presence of the king the prophet of the Lord of hosts.

"What said these men, and from whence came they unto thee?" said he.

"They have come from a far country, even from Babylon."

"What have they seen in thine house?"

"All that is in mine house have they seen, there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shown them."

"Then said Isaiah to Hezekiah, Hear the word of the Lord of hosts, behold the days come that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried into Babylon, nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away, and they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon." (Isa. xxxix.)

The humbled monarch bowed before the prophet of God and said, "Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken."

There were many things which Hezekiah might wisely have exhibited to his heathen visitors. Perhaps he might have exhibited the blasphemous letter which was sent to him from the Assyrian general, and which he spread before the Lord in prayer, and he might have related the answer that came from God, when 185,000 Assyrians were smitten by an invisible foe, and left lifeless in the invading camp; he might have disclosed to his wondering visitors the might and power of Israel's God, as manifested in the history of his dealings with his chosen people, and thus have sent them back with a salutary impression, or wholesome fear of the God of heaven and earth. But no. As if he had nothing better to exhibit he showed them his gold and his silver, his treasures and his gems, his costly raiment and his magnificent armor, and they looking upon it all with eager, covetous eyes, went back to tell the story of his wealth, and awaken the avarice of the Babylonian monarch, which was not satisfied until all that wealth was carried to Babylon and placed in the imperial treasure house.

My readers, visitors have come to your house, they may have come from afar, with friendly words and curious glances, they may have waited to catch your words, and eagerly gazed upon everything which came within their view. "What have they seen in thine house?" What has been the impression which has been made upon them? Have they learned the lesson of pride, envy, vanity, and sin? or have they learned the solemn lesson of the fear of God, which is the beginning of wisdom? What have they seen? what have they heard there? Has the talk been of worldliness? Has the glorying been in things that perish? Have the vanities of time engrossed your attention? Have the world's delights been the best thing you could show to the friends around you?—Sel.

But if we do not strenuously labor for our own illumination, how shall we presume to enlighten others; it is a dangerous presumption to busy ourselves in improving others before we have diligently sought our own improvement. Yet it is a vanity not uncommon, that the first feelings, be they true or false, which resemble devotion, the first faint ray of knowledge which has imperfectly dawned, excites in certain raw minds an eager impatience to communicate to others what they themselves have not yet attained. Hence the novel swarms of uninstructed instructors, of teachers who have had no time to learn. The act previous to imparting knowledge should seem to be that of acquiring it.

Nothing would so effectually check an irregular, and improve a temperate zeal, as the personal discipline, the self-acquaintance which we have so repeatedly recommended.—Hannah More.

For "The Friend,"

Religious Items, &c.

Spurgeon on Disestablishment.—Spurgeon, at a recent meeting of students and ministers of the "Pastor's College," is reported to have said: "The Church [English Episcopal] cannot be reformed; she must be disestablished and disendowed; and we ought to tell the officers of this department of the Civil Service that every year our terms will be severer. This movement can be hindered only at their own expense. If they will go, and go speedily, we will be generous; but if they obstruct, delay, abuse, so much the worse for themselves. The nation will be in no humor to deal generously with men who support a system of evil simply for gain. The nation ought to know that this is a religious question as well as a political one. The State Church has altered the whole theory of the Christian Church: in fact, the Establishment is not a Church at all; and because it professes to be one, to the no small hurt of truth and right, it must be abolished, and we ought to aid the Liberation Society in this great work."

Union of Presbyterian Congregations.—At Rogersville, Tenn., as in many other southern towns, there have been two Presbyterian churches, one connected with the Northern Church, the other with the Southern Church. There has been no good reason for their separate existence, and no adequate support for both of them in that community, and they had the good sense to resolve to unite. Lots were drawn to decide which church should go to the meeting-house of the other for the ceremony. Then, after the congregation had assembled, a ballot was taken to determine the ecclesiastical connection of the united church, and resulted in 102 votes for the Southern and 46 for the Northern Church. The officers beginning with the two ministers, offered their resignations, which were accepted. The officers were re-elected. "Then followed prayer, and benediction, and handshaking, and a quiet dispersal."—Examiner and Chronicle.

For "The Friend,"

Natural History, Science, &c.

Electric Light Good for the Eyes.—According to a writer in the Scientific American, when electric light first began to be used in our shops, factories, and places of amusement, it was confidently asserted by its opponents that so dazzling a light must be injurious to the eyes. It appears, however, from the experiments recently made by Professor Cohn, of Breslau, whose name is so familiar in connection with the investigation of color blindness and other optical defects, that our eyes will be benefited rather than hurt by the new method of lighting.—Christian Advocate.

Railway Casualties.—Railway statistics show some curious results in Europe as to the casualties suffered by the passengers. The French railways kill one in every two million and wound one in every 500,000 of their passengers. The English roads kill one in every 3,250,000 and wound one in every third of a million. Belgian railways kill and wound one in every 9,000,000 and 2,000,000 respectively, while Prussia only kills one in every 21,500,000, and wounds one in every 4,000,000.

Adventure with a Crocodile.—"I went out to have a good splash in the cool water of the lake [Tanganyika]—a proceeding which resulted in an exciting sensation which I did not anticipate. Wading out a considerable distance, but not out of my depth, I observed what appeared to be a log of wood floating a short distance from me. Taking no notice of this, I went on laying the cool water over myself with great enjoyment. Looking up after a few minutes, I observed that the apparent log had floated nearer to me. Getting interested in its movements I examined it more closely. I made out the outlines of a crocodile's head, with its ugly snout, wrinkled skin and glittering eyes. Fascinated by the sight, I stood for a moment motionless; and still it floated nearer. At last with a violent effort I threw off the enchantment, and regaining my presence of mind I made the welkin ring with a shout of "Mambo! mambo!" (crocodile). A considerable number of my men were near at hand, and my shout made them instantly aware of my position, when they saw me plunging desperately to reach the shore. Seizing their guns, they rushed into the lake in a body, making the water boil most furiously. When they reached me, the crocodile was within a few feet, and would have seized me in another minute. But seeing the porters in such numbers, yelling and shouting, and firing off their guns, it evidently thought that an empty stomach was better than a feast of bullets, and wisely disappeared, leaving a trail of blood behind. If I had been out of my depth at the time, my chance of surviving the rencontre would have been a poor one."—Thomson's Central African Lakes.

What to do in Emergencies.—When an accident happens, there is too often much valuable time lost in rushing hither and thither or in hasty application of unsuitable remedies that do more harm than good. A little self-possession, and the exercise of a certain amount of common sense will enable one to be of the greatest use at such times, and perhaps even the means of saving life itself.

Every household should have a store of simple remedies, and also antidotes for some of the more common kinds of poisons. This should be kept where they are easily accessible,—not in a locked closet, of which the key is sure to be lost at the very moment when it is most needed,—and in a place well-known to each member of the family.

In very severe cases of burns or scalds, the nervous system is so prostrated by the shock that there is often less suffering than when the injury is slighter. The pulse will be small and quick; and a stimulant should be administered without waiting for the doctor.

The whole theory of dressing is to exclude the air. The more effectually this is done the greater will be the relief afforded. When only a small surface is injured, an artificial skin may be formed with flexible collodion or if that is not at hand, common mucilage or gum arabic dissolved in warm water will answer. As one layer dries, another should be painted over it.

An excellent remedy for burns and scalds is a mixture of lime-water and sweet or linseed oil in equal parts. Another excellent one is bi-carbonate of soda. The common kind used for cooking purposes may be employed. A thick layer should be spread over the part and covered with a slight wet bandage, keeping it moist and renewing it when necessary.

When the clothing takes fire, it is well the victim has presence of mind to stand perfectly still. Motion fans the flame and causes it to burn more quickly. He must throw himself on the floor and roll over and over, but never move from place to place seeking help. A woollen shawl, piece of carpet or rug may be wrapped tightly around the person, not covering the face, and if there is time to wet it so much the better, but there is not an instant to lose, particularly if the clothing is of cotton. The great object is to prevent the flames from getting down the throat, and the chest from being burned.

In a severe cut on the finger, when the flow of blood renders dressing it a matter of difficulty, it may be checked by tying a string tightly around the base of the finger, must then be washed in cold water, and the cut can be dressed at length with court plaster, and the string removed.

Bleeding from the nose may be stopped by lying flat on the back, with the head raised and the hands held above it. The nose may be covered with a cloth filled with pounded ice, or wrung out of ice water. The head should never be held over a basin, as the position encourages bleeding. The blood may be received in a wet sponge. [Bleeding from the nose may generally be checked by moistening small pieces of patent lint, or scrags with Monnell's Solution of Iron, which would be well for persons living in the country to keep in the house. These in a conic form, should be carefully inserted into the nostril.]

In hemorrhage from the lungs the head and shoulders must be raised. Some phyans recommend a table-spoonful of table salt to be given in a tumbler of water. It is ways safe to give cracked ice. Bleeding on the stomach may be checked by the application of a mustard plaster over the stomach. Cracked ice should be given and a doctor sent for. In cases of hemorrhage from the lungs, small quantities of dry salt of salt and water, should be used and allowed to dissolve in the back part of the root. Salt in water is liable to produce vomiting, which might be hurtful to the patient.

Silent Meetings.—"Oh, how I love this silent sitting," said Samuel Spavold, "and to feel my mind humbled before that great Power! I want to be more inward; the Lord's people are an inward people." 1795.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 10, 1881.

We commend the following letter to the serious consideration of those, who regard the present "progressive" movement in the city of Friends as merely a revival of ancient zeal and activity; and who are unwilling to admit, that it is intimately, and, in fear, inseparably connected with a desertion of those spiritual doctrines which our early Friends were concerned to proclaim, as imitative Christianity revived.

The testimony of Scripture is very clear, that the Light of Christ—the illuminating power of his Holy Spirit—does shine in the darkness—in the heart of man while in the state of alienation from God. This is the grace of God, which teacheth man what to do, and which bringeth salvation to all who submit to its guidance, and obey its directions; for any merit of their own, but for the sake of that Saviour who died that we might be saved.

It is grievous to observe, as we think is plainly shown in modern publications, that the rejection of one of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, confirms in their error of those who reject the doctrine of the Atonement, and who are quick to see the stake those make who confine the work of the Divine Spirit on the heart, to those who are already regenerated.

The letter bears date 11th mo. 29, is from a good friend in a distant Yearly Meeting, addressed to the Editor.

I have read with great satisfaction the article in the last number of 'The Friend,' headed 'Modern Quakerism—The Signs of the Times.' It seems to me a word from one who has discernment and understanding, to read the signs of the times truly, and to cover the time working of Spiritual forces, with the glamour of arrogant profession. The current reports of meetings in some of our periodicals are known in many instances to be so exaggerated and one-sided as to be mis-representations of the real state of the Society. Of course Editors cannot always know that the reports received are not true.

But when the columns of a paper as doing in any degree to be the organ of a Society are freely opened to the representations and claims of a party or class, and are filled with reflections and censures upon the few who venture timidly to speak of another side, the drift of such a course is dangerous. And when a party is pledged and confederate to instill its own theory in place of established doctrine, and unbridled individual freedom of activity, in place of a corporate church order; and then to prove the revolution a success; how serious is the responsibility and the importance of those trumpets which our editorial watchmen upon the walks are called upon to sound. If these trumpets give an uncertain sound, who of the people in the valleys and on the plains which they reach, will prepare themselves as they ought, for the battle of these times?

In a late paper (The Christian Worker, of 10th mo. 27,) a series of meetings at Stuart, Iowa, is described, and after the usual account of wonderful power and results, there occurs this sentence:

'The false idea of a portion of God's Spirit being in the heart of the unregenerate, which if heeded to, would bring salvation was ably handled, and disposed of according to scripture evidence.'

The same account in Friends' Review was changed in this sentence to read 'The work of the Holy Spirit upon the heart of the unregenerate, was ably handled according to scripture.'

To my mind, the records of the schism of 1827 may be searched in vain, to find a more unqualified denial of the manifestation and work of Christ, than such a sentence [as that in the Christian Worker] betrays. To deny Christ, or to limit or undervalue his appearance spiritually, can surely be a no less fearful heresy, than to deny or limit, or undervalue, the reality and significance of his outward coming. And yet such a denial as the above sentence indicates stalks abroad in the fore front of the teaching of not a few leaders of the people, whose boasted work is sent from week to week, to the households of our members, and to our youth over the land through Friends' Periodicals! while the low deep murmur of dissent of thousands, and the grief and tears of many in our Israel, scarce find a voice.

Yet we may hope in the Lord. His truth will have utterance, and in his own time, as the fullness of preparation comes. He will send his Seers and Prophets with his word, and David, for a time hidden in desert places and driven to the caves, will be brought to his rightful place, and enthroned."

When reading the Scriptures with serious thoughtfulness, the mind is often impressed with the clear, strong, and often repeated language used therein in enforcing the duty of assisting those who are in need of help. The natural selfishness of man leads him to care for himself exclusively for his own comforts and luxuries and those of his family. As the love of self is a great obstacle to the full reception of the love of God, it must be brought into subjection,—crucified by the power of Christ changing the heart.

How few of us really obey the command to love our neighbors as ourselves! When we see or are told of the sufferings of others, we may be willing to contribute of our abundance for their relief; we take from our possessions that which is not needed for our own enjoyment; and we may be repaid by the sense of satisfaction which naturally attends on the exercise of benevolent feelings; but we often evade, or reason away those impressions of duty which would lead us to the extension of personal effort to examine into the cases of those who are in distress, to encourage and assist the fallen and degraded, "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction," to lodge the stranger, and to visit those who are sick or in prison.

In our large cities especially, the claims upon our sympathies are so constantly recurring, the evil effects of indiscriminate giving are so great, and the demands of business are so exacting, that the temptation is strong to choose some one of the benevolent societies as an almsman, contribute to its funds, and refer all applicants for help to it as the channel of relief. To a certain extent, this is a judicious course, as it lessens the probability of our assisting to maintain in idleness or debauchery those who ought honestly to labor for their own support. But if we confine ourselves to this, we lose the benefit of that development of our own characters, that subjection of selfishness, that cultivation of the love of our fellow-creatures, which flow from self-denying labors for the good of others.

The example and the precepts of our Saviour and his apostles teach us not only to contribute of our outward possessions for the relief of others, but to give them such a share of our time, our thoughts, our sympathy and our active efforts, as we may feel to be in accordance with the will of our Father in Heaven, who sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust.

We have been requested to publish a circular of "The Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia." As the promotion of temperance is an object of which we heartily approve, we insert the circular in our columns, and we insert the information of those who may think the formation of such an association a judicious method to pursue—a point on which there will probably be different opinions among our readers.

Milton Stanley, Plainfield, Ind., has been appointed an Agent for "The Friend."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Congress met on the 5th inst. In the Senate President pro tempore Davis occupied the chair, and Senator-elect Windom, of Minnesota, was sworn in. A number of bills were introduced, among them the following: To provide for the retirement of the trade dollar; to provide for the issue of 3 per cent. bonds; for a Tariff Commission; for a Tariff and Tax Commission; to restrict Chinese immigration; and to punish attempts to assassinate the President. A resolution was offered, which was laid over, providing for a special committee of seven, to consider amendments to the Presidential election laws.

In the House, 290 Representatives answered to roll call. J. W. Keifer, of Ohio, was elected Speaker by 165 yeas to 129 for Samuel J. Randall, and 8 for Nicholas Foster.

Comptroller Knox, in his annual report, repeats his recommendation for the repeal of the taxes upon bank capital and deposits and bank checks. The Comptroller reports that, during the year ending 11th mo. 1st, 86 National banks were organized, with an aggregate authorized capital of $9,651,000, to which $3,223,900 in circulating notes were issued. Twenty-six banks, with an aggregate capital of $2,020,000, and a circulation of $1,245,550, voluntarily discontinued business during the same period.

The public debt statement for 11th month shows a decrease of $2,249,126.

The steamer Zealandia, from Australia, has arrived at San Francisco, with $1,400,000 in gold bars and sovereigns, which will go into the San Francisco Mint. The last boat of the season in the Delaware and Hudson Canal, left Honesdale, Penna., on Seventh-day of last week. As fast as it passes the various locks the water will be drawn off and navigation closed. Last year navigation was closed by ice on 11th mo. 15th, but there has been no difficulty from this fall.

The Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company's mine No. 1 at Lamford, near Mauch Chunk, which caught fire three months ago, is now being opened, the steam injected into the shafts having extinguished the flames. It is believed the colliery will be in full operation by the beginning of 4th month next.

A land slip on the Rensselaer division of the Pennsylvania Railroad, near Regelsville, on the afternoon of the 1st inst., was discovered by the track walker just as the Elmira express train was rounding the curve. He walked across the moving mass of earth, and, waving his flag, stopped the train within a few feet of the obstruction. The passengers had to be thrown out across the slide. About forty tons of rock and earth fell upon the track, and travel was delayed about five hours.

The wheat fly is reported to have made great havoc in Southwestern Michigan. Fields that looked well a few weeks ago "are fully one-half destroyed."

The assertion is made that, at a theological university in the last city of the smoking student has graduated at the head of his class.

The Boston Advertiser says that the outer satellite of Mars was seen on Third-day evening last at Harvard College Observatory, and approximate measures of its position were obtained. It had been predicted two weeks before. As has been learned these were the first observations of either satellite of Mars which have been made this season. The observer was O. C. Wendell, who made the latest observation of the satellite obtained during the opposition of 1879.

The mortality in the tenement house region of New York city during the last eight quarters of the year was 6349, against 4930 during the corresponding period last year. The mortality throughout the whole of the city was also much larger, being 35,229 out of every estimated 1000, based on the last census, as against 27.92 per 1000 for 1880; the actual number for the last eight months of the year being 10,961, as against 8223 for the corresponding period of 1880, and 7656 for 1879, when the ratio was only 26.24 per 1000. The most startling feature is the terrible mortality among children under fifteen, in 1880, 4400, in 1879, 6102, the total mortality in 1880, 6423; in 1879, 10,961. The Board of Health asserts that three-fifths of these deaths among children are on the East side, but that contagious and zymotic diseases are now spreading in first-class regions, such as Fifth, Lexington, and Madison avenues, near and below Central Park.

The measles in the city for the past week were 355, as compared with 327 for the previous week, and 404 for the corresponding week of last year. Of the whole number, 170 were males and 185 females; 54 died of consumption, 16 of diphtheria, 18 of old age, 17 of croup, 14 of typhoid fever, and 14 of small pox.

Wheat, etc.—21 1/2 cts. per bushel; 100 lb. (5th mo.) 102 1/2; 4 1/2; 4 1/2, registered, 117 1/2; coupon, 118 1/2; small, 118 1/2; currency 6 1/2, 130.

Cotton was firmly held at full prices; sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 and 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Leum.—Standard white, 7 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is dull, but firm. Sales of 1800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7 a $7.25 for clear, and at $7.25 a $7.37 1/2 for straight; Penna. extra family at $6.37 1/2 a $6.50; western do. at $7 a $7.50, and patents at $7.75 a $8.00. Rye flour is quiet at $5.37 a $5.50 for Pennsylvania.

Grain.—Wheat is less active and a fraction lower. Sales of Delaware red and amber at $1.38 a $1.43. Rye is steady at 98 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is in good request, and local lots firmer. Sales of 10,000 bushels, including yellow at 69 1/2 a 70 cts.; mixed at 68 a 69 cts.; steamer at 63 1/2 cts. No. 3 at 68 cts. and rejected at 67 cts. Oats are quiet and strong. Sales of 1200 bushels, including white, at 49 1/2 a 51 1/2 cts. and rejected and mixed at 48 1/2 a 49 cts.

Hay and straw at Market.—For week ending 12th mo. 30, 1881.—Lard, 33 1/2 a 33 3/4 cts. loads of 2000 lbs. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; Straw, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds.

Reef cattle were dull and rather lower; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 6 1/2 cts. per pound, as to country.

Sheep were dull, and 1c. per lb. lower; 15,000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 2 1/2 a 5 1/2 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were rather lower; 6000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 7 a 9 1/2 cts. per lb., the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—The greatest demonstration ever held in Scotland in connection with the land agitation took place last week at Aberdeen. Two thousand delegates representing 40,000 farmers, were present. Several Scotch members of Parliament attended. Resolutions were passed demanding a general reduction of rents, compensation for improvements, the abolition of the laws of hypothec and entail, and other legislation in the interest of tenant farmers. It was agreed that the legislative changes required must apply to existing leases. A farmers' alliance for Scotland was formed.

Several persons have been named or beaten to death in Ireland during the last week, for paying rent. The Times, in a leading article discussing the gravity of the situation, says: "If tenants will not rent on the Land Court, the law must take its course, and its authority must be upheld by the whole force of the Executive."

Gambetta, replying to various speeches, said the treaty with Tunis still exists, and that no protest can be made. That the Government has not caused any action in what manner it will follow up the idea of a French protectorate, but the military operations undertaken would be vigorously prosecuted. He said a bill will be ultimately introduced giving effect to the treaty. He was not hostile to the creation of mixed tribunals, but he was not in favor of the creation of a mixed tribunal. The abandonment of Tunis would compromise our prestige. The question is, whether we desire, without rushing into adventures, to have a foreign policy. We cannot abandon Tunis. The Regency will prove a vigilant and necessary doorkeeper for our African colonies. There is no intention of pushing military operations to the frontier of Tripoli, because it is not desirable to have the Porte for an immediate neighbor."

The Liberator replying to Prince Bismarck's recent statement that Italy within the last twenty years had advanced so far towards a republic that there was no longer any thing to be feared, said, "The Government of the Left would not tolerate a Cabinet even slightly tainted with republicanism."

Vienna, 12th mo. 1st.—A shock of earthquake occurred at Agram on Fourth-day. It was the severest that has been experienced there since the great catastrophe of 11th mo. 1880.

The Servian Government will undertake to introduce in the Skupstchina in March a Jewish emancipation bill in conformity with the Treaty of Berlin. The Servian Jews will be, by the new bill, placed on an equality with Jews who are Austrian subjects.

The cholera at Mecca and Jeddah has practically been eradicated.

Further correspondence in regard to Afghanistan is published. The principal document is the solemn promise of the Ameer, written in 1st month, never to undertake anything without the consent of the British Government.

Private advisers from Japan say that the dead-lock in the silk trade there has been removed by the practical submission of the foreign merchants to the Japanese demands. Five millions of dollars' worth of silk held by the Japanese for six weeks is now on the way to America.

The cost of establishing a United States coaling station at Tutuila, one of the Samoan group, last year, was about $40,000. This included the price of 2200 tons of coal and its transportation to the island.

Our Consul at Panama recommends that all vessels from the United States coast should be shot dead, if possible, ship colored crews. Yellow fever is now epidemic in the colony, and many white seamen are falling victims to it, but colored ones do not seem to be affected in the least.

CIRCULAR.

The Temperance Association of Friends of Philadelphia has been organized in the belief that it is the duty of those who are alive to the ruinous effects of strong drink to exert some positive influence against this evil; and that a union of those Friends in our city, who are desirous of this object, may be more systematic and effective action in many cases than could be accomplished by individual effort, while at the same time tending to awaken more general interest in the question, and to deepen the sense of personal responsibility.

By reason of the extent of the liquor interest, and the great influence of its upholders, we feel it to be no light undertaking upon which we have entered; and while discouraging none from taking some active part in a service so varied in its requirements, we hold that in all our efforts the meekness of a wisdom big than our own may be sought, since we believe it to be truly said of this, as of every other good work, "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain, and he that keeps it shall not be built."

In looking over the field of labor, various ways of working appear,—

1. By the distribution of literature adapted to chaotic sentiment by presenting the spiritual, moral, physiological and economic effects of the use of intoxicants in their true light.
2. By the publication of such fresh material as is not approved.
3. The holding of meetings so far as practicable.
4. Efforts toward better legislation.
5. By personal labor, either with those who drink, or with individuals or associations more or less directly engaged in the traffic.
6. By encouraging the establishment of coffee stores.
7. The organization of auxiliaries in country missions.

It is thought that through a large Executive Committee (the members of which are appointed by the convention at its first meeting) divided into several small committees, these several methods may be tried, should sufficient number of Friends be found rightly qualified and able to devote the necessary time and thought to the work.

A member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may join the Association by sending one dollar, with name and address, to George Emlen, Treasurer, Chestnut street.

Larger contributions toward the fund which will be required, will be gratefully received.

An assortment of Temperance Literature will be kept at 116 North Fourth street, where Friends desiring procure a supply for distribution may call.

JAMES BROMLEY, Chairman,
WM. C. ALLEN, Secretary.

Phila., 1881.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward.) Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, 10th mo. 7th, 1881, HANNAH G. DAVIS, a about 83 years and 6 months, an esteemed member Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. From youth to age she was remarkable for her correctness of life, legerity and great care to avoid everything which might wound her conscience; but she was also careful to make but little claim for any religious attainments. In a memorandum found among her papers dated when about 81 years old, she wrote: "How potent that young people should devote their youth to the Lord, if they expect to be happy. It has been great source of grief to me that mine was not more given up, believing had I been faithful I should have been usefully employed in his service." In her sickness she was apparently favored to be free from dispensation of doubts and fears; and her pass through the dark valley seemed unclouded. At her death she left to a relative, "I am going home, to long home."

—, at her residence at West Hill, near Burlington N. J., on the 8th of 10th mo. 1881, ELIZA P. GURS, a minister and member of Burlington Monthly Meeting in the 81st year of her age.

—, suddenly, on the 4th of 11th month, 1881, her residence in Solebury township, Bucks county, MARY P. BALDERSTON, wife of Oliver Balderston the 70th year of her age, a member of Buckingham Monthly Meeting. Her friends have the comfort assurance that her close was peaceful.

—, suddenly, on the 11th mo. 1881, ANNA BRINTON, daughter of Deborah G., and the late Em Brinton, aged 24 years. The patience and resignation with which she bore a protracted illness, and the serenity and composure with which she looked forward to the close of life, give to her friends the comfort assurance that what to them is loss, is to her eternal gain.

—, in Laporte, Ind., on the 27th of 11th mo. 1, after a short and painful illness caused by a fall, M. WILLIAMS, aged 92 years, widow of Thomas Will both natives of Tuckerton, N. J. She was an exemplary member of the Society of Friends.

WILLIAM H. PALE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 17, 1881.

NO. 19.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend,"

Notes of Travel.

CATAWISSA MONTHLY MEETING.

(Continued from page 138.)

Among the evidences of the care maintained guard its members from hurtful things, I did that in the 8th month of 1800 one Friend offered an acknowledgment to this meeting having been present with a company of people engaged in playing cards, whereby encouraging rather than bearing a testimony against that evil practice." This offering was stonped for consideration for two months, and finally accepted by the meeting.

In the 6th month of the same year, a business difficulty between John Lloyd and Robert arose was brought before the Monthly Meeting, and entrusted to the charge of a committee, who reported three months later, at their money matters had been settled by reference to third parties, but that "both of them had been too unguarded in some of their expressions to each other." In order to remove the unfriendly feeling which appeared to exist, some friends were deputed to "endeavor to convince them of the impropriety their unfriendly treatment of each other," and the labors of this committee appear to have been successful, and each of the contending parties subsequently acknowledged the impropriety of their conduct.

The patience and tenderness of Catawissa Friends is well shown in the case of Edward Hughes, of whom it was reported in the 12th mo. 1805, that he "has been so unguarded as to take too much strong drink at the late election at Catawissa, and thereby exposed himself much to the reproach of his profession." After three months' care of the case, the committee say, "There appears in him too much a wrangling disposition to be encouraged, and offer an acknowledgment of his misconduct." The meeting was not discouraged by this unfavorable report, but made an addition to the committee and continued them to use their efforts for Edward's reformation. Two months later they said, that "he appeared somewhat more condescending than heretofore," and on this encouragement it was concluded to labor on. After an interval of six months, the Friends who were endeavoring to help him over his weakness were compelled to report that he had "latterly been so unguarded as to be guilty of taking too much strong drink again." In the following month a testimony of disownment was issued against him. Two months afterwards, the committee appointed to deliver it to him, reported that at his request they had withheld it, and Edward came to the Monthly Meeting and offered a written condemnation of his course, which, after being under care for five months longer was finally accepted.

Catawissa Monthly Meeting had probably more members about the year 1799, than at any other period of its existence. In that year, the Friends at Fishing Creek, Muncy and Loyal Sock, were cut off from it to constitute the new Monthly Meeting of Muncy. The tide of immigration ceased to flow, and in a few years later, many of its members moved off to newer countries, where more fertile lands could be found than in the red shale districts of Catawissa and Roaring Creek.

In the six years which elapsed from the beginning of the year 1803, to the laying down of the Monthly Meeting in the 12th mo. 1808, it lost by removals 189 members, and received from the same source but 25. The disownments also during this period were more numerous than the receipts by conviction. A considerable number of the emigrants removed to Eastern Ohio, within the limits of Concord and Short Creek Monthly Meetings; but far the larger part went to Canada; and most of these settled west of the Niagara river, where the British Government offered tempting inducements to settlers.

At one Monthly Meeting (5th mo. 1805), certificates of removal were granted for 38 persons! It is no wonder, then, that a minute should be adopted, requesting the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia (to which it belonged) to consider its stripped condition; nor that the result of this consideration should be the laying down of its organization, and the joining of its members to Muncy Monthly Meeting, as already mentioned.

Fearing that the old-time history of this settlement may not be as interesting to my readers as it has been to myself, I will now leave it.

The railroad crosses the Susquehanna at Catawissa, and after passing through the natural opening in the mountainous range which borders the northern side of this branch of the great river, runs across a gently rolling country in a north westerly direction till it reaches the west branch of the Susquehanna, near the town of Milton. Delighted as we had been by the mountain scenery through which we had travelled from Reading to the river, the change was pleasant, and we enjoyed the open cultivated country.

The valley of Muncy Creek is a broad tract of fertile land, with a bed of limestone protruding in parts of it. Many of the Friends residing here are the descendants of the first settlers. We found them careful to observe the injunction of the apostle: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers." We were very kindly received and our wants and wishes provided for. We were at two meetings in their meeting-house at Pennsville, pleasantly located in a grove of trees and built of limestone. I was much interested in some beautiful blocks of fossil rock, found overlying the limestone, which had been built into the walls of the house. They seemed to be filled with sea-shells of a former geologic era, the outlines of which were singularly sharp and clearly defined.

Both of the meetings we attended here were seasons of Divine favor, in which desires were felt for the spiritual refreshment and the growth in grace of those assembled. With the assistance of these kind friends, several meetings for the public were held at places in the neighborhood. Of these, that at Hughesville, about seven miles up the valley from the river, was one of the largest and most satisfactory.

It was to me an interesting thing to be sheltered in the house, which was at one time the home of those worthy Friends, William and Mercy Ellis, who were among the early settlers of this country, having moved here about the year 1795. Much of the land they purchased there is now owned and occupied by their descendants. Mercy was for many years an approved minister in our Society, and her name was familiar to me in my young years, as an honorable and valued member of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. She died in 1848, at the advanced age of 87, and her friends bore testimony to her worth in a Memorial which I propose inserting in the following number of these sketches.

(To be continued.)

J. W.

For "The Friend."

Suggestive Hints from California.

The following are portions of a letter lately received from a worthy correspondent in California; wherein he gives the liberty to this extract for "The Friend," if "thought profitable for publication."

"I received an epistle lately from Capt. H., dated at sea, the 22nd of last month. He had been to the Sandwich Islands; and represents how ready the people thereaway were to hear the gospel. Then, after mentioning our own sea coast of California, where too there seems to be so much need of the gospel ministers, he adds: 'I wish you would write to Friends, and have them send out a spiritual missionary; one that has the Spirit of the Master; one that can preach Jesus from personal experience; one that feels for the good of souls—being led by the Holy Spirit, and not by man; &c. I am often led to query, whether or no the Lord has ceased to send ministers of the Society of Friends hither and thither as in former days? or is it because the many Jonahs among them? Of late years I have met many who were born in the Society, and after coming to this coast, have entirely cast off all religious restraint; and no minister of their church to care for them; whilst all other Societies seem to have overdone that kind of work by the large number of their ministers that are among us. Only week before last we hired a man to white-wash our house, with whom we had some conversation. He is now over sixty years of age. He was born a member with Friends, and was on the point of sailing with Daniel Wheeler on his South Sea voyage, but from some cause or other was restrained from so doing. His father at that time was mayor of one of the large cities of England; and was well acquainted with D. W. But now this poor old man is poor indeed; having departed far from the path marked out for him by his good mother—of whom he speaks well. He lives all alone in his little workshop. Other somewhat similar cases we have met with. Had they fallen in with other Societies, as I find several have done, they might not have fallen so low. But even this slender hold they did not take.

May the great Head of the Church yet raise up a band of devoted baptized men and women as of yore, and send them forth to find and to gather in these wandering ones, is truly my soul's desire."

San Leandro, 11th mo. 13th, 1881.

It is very desirable to get often to the watch-tower to see what the Lord will say unto us, or, in other words, to be quick of understanding in his fear; and then to be ready at his bidding to go, in the endeavor to stir up the pure mind in others, whenever and wherever He may point out, lead unto, and qualify for; and not prove such a "Jonah" as our correspondent makes allusion to, who fled from the presence of the Lord in the work appointed, and paid the fare to Tarshish when commanded by Him to go "unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee!" At the same time it is well to remember, that without the way being opened, or the command given by Him, the Minister of ministers, without whom we can do nothing, all our preaching, though it be with "the enticing words of man's wisdom," will amount to but little more than sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

The Lord can work with or without instruments. All power is in his hands. He searcheth all hearts; and can turn them as a man turneth the water-courses in his field. The preaching of the prophet Jonah, without the bidding and the blessing of his Master, would have done nothing for Nineveh. Nay, per-adventure, he would have been treated by its citizens as the seven sons of Sceva were by "the man in whom the evil spirit was," which they attempted to cast out by calling over the name of the Lord Jesus, whom Paul preached. As is written, he "leapt on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house, naked and wounded."

It is a precious fundamental Christian doctrine, that "the gospel of the grace of God"—"the power of God unto salvation"—"the light of the glorious gospel of Christ"—is "preached in every creature which is under heaven." Moreover, saith the apostle John, "The anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things," &c. Then the great aim and end of ministry is to direct people to that in themselves which is able to build up and save, even "the Light of the Lamb," which, as obedience keeps pace with knowledge thereof, will guide into all truth; agreeably to the impressive testimony of that great reformer, George Fox: "When the Lord God and his Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world to preach his everlasting gospel and kingdom, I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit and Grace, by which all might know their salvation and their way to God; even that Divine Spirit which would lead them into all Truth, and which I infallibly knew would never deceive any."

11th mo. 29th, 1881.

For "The Friend."

Pure and Undeified Religion.

Our first parents, before the fall, were pure and undeified by sin. Their Maker was their law-giver. Their religion had no mixture of evil in it. It was the same in its nature as that of heaven. They had but the one God to worship. But good and evil were set before them; with the power of choice left free. They, in disobedience to the command of God, chose the evil. Sin and death followed—death to the heavenly life, defilement to that which remained. Thus the way was opened for the god of this world to introduce and set up his kingdom and his worship; and pure and undeified religion was lost; and can never be regained in the heart nor in the church only as the evil is overcome and taken out of the way by and through the redeeming power of Him who came to finish transgression and make an end of sin; and to restore that which was lost in the fall. And as this is done, the heart of man will again become the temple of the living God. And the pure and living church will be made up of purified members, such as are washed from the corruptions of the fallen nature, and "kept unspotted from the world."

"Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled. They profess that they know God; but in works they deny Him," &c. But "blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God." They have come under the pure influence of the new covenant dispensation, wherein God "will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will be remembered no more." These no longer read Moses with a veil upon their hearts, or over their eyes, but with open face, as in a glass; they, beholding the glory of the Lord, "are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." All the old impurities are passed away; and all things become new, and all things of God. Their religion is pure and undeified. And their worship is in the purified temple of the heart—"in Spirit and in truth;" though they outwardly meet in the assemblies of the Lord's people.

The outward temple at Jerusalem was the place of worship for the outward Jew. But he is now no longer "a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men but of God." So the inner temple of the heart, is now, and the spiritual dispensation, the place of worship for the spiritual Israel of God; and it has been kept pure and holy, as He is holy, as dwelteth not in temples made with hands, but in the hearts of the humble and contrite one, whether outwardly assembled or not. Neith is He worshipped by men's hands, as though He needed any thing. And now, when v assemble for Divine worship, we should, with earnestness of soul, endeavor to draw nigh unto Him, that we may witness Him to dwell nigh unto us; and to be in his holy tem "to revive the spirit of the humble, and revive the heart of the contrite ones." That all that is earthly within us might brought to a reverential silence before Him.

The whole Jewish system, with its religion and mixture, seems wonderfully designed shadow forth and point forward to a religion and worship far more pure, inward, unmix and spiritual. The old, abounding in outward offerings and figurative and ceremonial law made nothing perfect. The new, pure at inward; and being in the fulness and brightness of our gospel day, hath forever perfected, through the one offering, all that are sanctified. The old, in shadow types—the new being the substance to which the shadows pointed, wherein we worship God in Spirit and in truth. The Jews were not chosen so much for their own benefit, for the general benefit of mankind; that church, in our gospel day, might show for the praise of Him who has called us out darkness into his marvellous light. Let us then, learn the lessons which they, with the outward observances and carnal ordinance were designed to teach us. And not to back again, in our religion and worship, the weak and beggarly elements which our forefathers, amidst the scoffs and persecution of a frowning world, were led out of.

Oh for a more pure and undeified religion and ministry! How it would elevate and beautify and sanctify Christendom! and eat others who are not of the fold, by seeing good works, and consistent walks and dealings, to flock in as doves to the windows, and glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Now the only way that I know of for pure and undeified religion to prevail and shine a church, is for each individual member have a pure and undeified heart. An order for this we must take up, in faith, daily cross, and deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts; and follow the lead of our purified and glorified Saviour through the washings of regeneration until we are deemed from all iniquity; and purified up himself as a peculiar people, zealous of good works. So let us strive, with more individual earnestness and faith, to cleanse ourselves, the first place, "from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."

I believe that our branch of the church and perhaps the churches of the whole pressing Christian world, are now, by Divine permission, undergoing a shaking, where every thing that is impure, and that can be shaken, will be removed, and that nothing but that which cannot be shaken will remain. So that she, the purified church, may go forth as out of the wilderness, to meet her Bridegroom at his coming, as a bride adorned for her husband.

If we know these things, happy shall we we do them. Yes, "blessed are they that obey his commandments, that they may have access to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 11th mo. 21st, 1881.

For "The Friend."

Ventilation, or Pure Food for the Lungs.

The extract from Dr. Osgood's "Winter and its dangers," published in No. 15 of "The Friend," is well worthy the attention of all who are not fully alive to the importance of the matters therein treated of. The use of the woman of fastidious taste in regard to meals, who fed her lungs with dirty food, is not an unusual one.

Many, otherwise intelligent, men and women year after year paying little attention to the condition of the air of the rooms in which they sit and sleep, spending their vitality at an unnecessary rate and inducing diseases and sufferings which might be avoided. It is easy to underestimate the importance of a subject which is not understood, and the apathy respecting pure air and ventilation, is very great. Even among Friends, a class in good repute for intelligence and readiness to adopt all that promotes health and comfort, there is room for education on this matter. Many make but little effort for supplying their houses with pure air and removing that which has been used, and in any of their meeting-houses no provision whatever is made.

The Arch Street rooms in Philadelphia are large and airy, and are very satisfactory for cold weather; but at seasons when the windows and doors must be closed, the vitality of the air is soon exhausted by the congregation. Many a head-ache has been carried home from the Quarterly Meeting in the second month by men Friends who little suspected the cause was to be found in the impure air they had been breathing. The women are better, having a fresh room for their second meeting. At Yearly Meeting, when sessions are three hours long, men and women sit in their respective rooms breathing for about two hours of the time air which is partially "swept out the lungs" of some else. The accuracy of this statement may be readily tested by one accustomed to detecting the difference between foul air and pure, by going on a clear bright day from the fresh air into the meeting rooms immediately after the meetings have dispersed.

It is not proposed here to discuss the ventilation of meeting-houses—or to go into details for dwelling houses. There is much yet to be learned—and those, who have thought most upon the subject of supplying pure air to rooms, are free to acknowledge that perfection in convenience and readily keeping the air of rooms pure, has not been reached. But much may be done by a few simple contrivances; and when there is a more general interest taken in the matter, it is to be hoped that some of the strength now spent in criticizing present plans will be used in endeavors to improve them.

A sleeping room is readily ventilated if there is a flue which can be fitted with a register at the floor; the mechanics generally insist to place the register above the washward, but it is important to put it at the right place, on the floor—this flue will as a rule satisfactorily remove the impure air from the chamber.

To admit pure air into the chamber, if there are inside shutters, close the lower half and raise the sash of a window an inch or more. If there are no inside shutters, place a twelve inch board or stretch a piece of muslin across the bottom of the window; the object of this is to deliver the fresh air into the body of the room instead of falling direct to the floor. If no flue can be had as described, the best way to ventilate, is to raise the lower sash an inch or so and lower the upper one the same amount—this does not remove the impure air as satisfactorily as a flue, but effects a considerable change of air. The same plans will answer for sitting rooms, but the window that supplies the fresh air is not available for working or sitting near it. It also may often work very satisfactorily to place a two inch strip of wood under the lower sash, and depend for a supply of air upon the opening thereby made between the upper and lower sash. A partial supply of air comes through the warm air registers, but not always a sufficient one, particularly when the registers are shut. A very small amount of ventilation by an opening into a flue near the top of a room is useful, but so few persons understand how little is needed there and how much disturbance of currents opening them too much will make—that for most cases it is better to have no registers at the top of the rooms.

Many persons suppose a cold air is pure—this is often far from the case where the air in a room has been confined or used. There is often also a feeling that a hot room is not pure, which may also be a mistake, as it may be warm and yet constantly changing.

Temperature of the air we sleep and sit in is also intimately connected with health. The ability to sleep in rooms when the water "freezes in the pitcher" may indicate a good constitution, but such a good constitution is worth taking care of, and if it be possible to moderate such a temperature, the constitution will be likely to keep good longer. Something near sixty degrees is accepted by many as a healthful sleeping room temperature when attainable. Where windows or better arrangements for ventilation cannot be used, recourse may be had to having all the doors of the house open; but in this case the halls must be heated, and efforts be made that the two simple rules of ventilation are as nearly applied to the whole house as possible—one rule is, provide for the exit of foul air—the other, provide for the supply of pure air. Where persons feel at a loss how to dispose of the foul air let them be sure that abundance of fresh air gets in and that it is perfectly warmed—and so partially solve the problem, for if a surplus of fresh air gets in, part of the foul air gets out somewhere. Much may be said on the proper apparatus for heating houses; and stoves, hot-air furnaces, open fires, and steam apparatus, all have many advantages and many defects; but without discussing these, it may be stated it is well to observe two rules, no matter what apparatus is used. First, endeavor to have so ample a radiating surface as never to require a high heat in it to obtain the desired warmth in the building. Secondly, always supply by evaporation of water, the increased capacity of the air for moisture, which is invariably caused by a rise in its temperature. To these it may be added, do not cause cold currents or currents of mixed hot and cold air to circulate in a room; and if they cannot be avoided, do not sit in them; they may induce sickness as well as impure air, and do it more quickly.

E. T.

For "The Friend."

The Presumptuous Wicked.

The recent remark of a noted assassin and murderer—noted because of the worthy and high position the loved and stricken one filled—that "he was not afraid to die," is calculated to show how hardened the heart may become, or how given up to Satan's power and rule. Sin first deceives, and then hardens; according to the heed enjoined by the Apostle to the Hebrews—"lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin." Again, the working of Satan is represented to be "with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie."

To be so blinded by the god of this world, and so given up to delusion as to believe a lie, is a dreadful state to be in. Yet, may it not be the condition of those who, rejecting the power of the Spirit of the Lord Jesus within them, and quenching its holy influence there, provoke Him to cease to strive with them? whereby they are left to grope in spiritual blindness and hardness of heart, and a prey to temptation and those diabolical deeds of darkness—of robbery, blood-shedding and death—which have grown so common in our day and country.

These dreadful instances of the devil's sway over the hearts of his deluded victims, when the sometimes presumptuous allegation of the miserable sinner, that "he is not afraid to die," instead of proving that the second and eternal death—"the damnation of hell"—will not, without repentance and amendment of life, forever swallow up, it only proves that sin has so darkened the understanding, blinded the eyes, and hardened the heart, that "being past feeling, such have given themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness."

If the utterance, "I am not afraid to die," from the lips of such, means at all that they consider themselves prepared for death's solemn summons, then the query suggests itself, of what must the glorified host in heaven be made up, if such dark and sin-beguiled spirits can find acceptance there? Of solemn admonition and application are the truths: As death leaves us, judgment finds us. "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest." "The grave cannot praise Thee; death cannot celebrate Thee; they that go down into the pit cannot hope for Thy truth."

"The soul is an awful thing," said a good man on the bed of death. "Mind ye it is an awful thing to die; the invisible world how awful!" "Christ has taught us the value of our souls," says another pious writer, "by dying to save them." There is a possibility of our deceitful and desperately wicked hearts vainly and presumptuously persuading, that we are fitted for a kingdom of purity and holiness without having experienced the indispensable preparation of a change of heart; of repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ: not that peace and reconciliation with Him which comes through passive obedience to his will; and through a being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." Without these, without "the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which is shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour," and without brokenness of heart, contrition of spirit, and childlike dependence—sacrifices dear to our Father in heaven—how can we reasonably hope for, or anticipate an entrance into that kingdom, "where there shall in no wise enter any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." Of similar solemn import is the thrilling query of the apostle Peter: "What shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?"

11th mo. 25th, 1851.

On Lake Tanganyika.

The following narrative is condensed from an address by E. C. Hore, one of the missionaries located on Lake Tanganyika, in Central Africa. The hostility of the Arabs, referred to in it, arises from the check which the presence of Europeans puts on the slave trade, which they have been carrying on for many years:

Nearly four years ago we started from Zanzibar, with 800 miles of swamp and jungle between us and Lake Tanganyika, enthusiastic and determined, in actual contact with the work and its difficulties and encouragements. That road was the century-old slave-path that lay between Livingstone and the coast during his dreary waiting at Ujiji. We started with 120 bullocks and eight carts and wagons. For five months we fought, axe in hand, through forest and jungle, working sometimes a whole day to cut through half a mile of road; but an enemy appeared in our midst and our 120 bullocks (one by one) dropped down under the fatal little tsetse fly. We had to wait a bit, and reorganizing our caravan, we turned our faces once more westward, with 240 native African porters carrying our stores. Some of the difficulties of the way were very great—wading up to our necks in swamps or creeping through low tunnels of thorny jungle. We often arrived at the end of a day's march to drop down utterly exhausted; but the one great object of our work kept us going through all. No small part of our work was the management of these 240 wild children. Many of these faithful men are much attached to us, and it is no small success that we are now able, with confidence, to entrust the caravan of supply which is about starting for Ujiji to the sole convoy of African natives. The great chief Mirambo received us in a friendly spirit, asked for one of us to live with him, and has afforded every facility for the settlement of those brethren who were in due time sent there. You have heard of the troubles caused by or attributed to Mirambo. Natives, Arabs, and Europeans have alike been too ready to cry "Mirambo!" in case of robberies or failures of expeditions. Mirambo (in personal conversation with me) has protested bitterly against white men entering his dominions without communicating boldly with him, as his subjects are loyal and their motto is: "Those who are not for Mirambo are against him." Hence, difficulties arise. Mirambo rules over a territory of from 10,000 to 15,000 square miles of savage Africa, and like other rulers and annexors in that continent, has found himself involved in wars with African natives; but I am no politician, and, therefore, could never understand why there was so much criticism of Mirambo for failing to maintain peace in such borders. Mirambo is a total abstainer from intoxicants, standing alone amongst African chiefs in that respect. He is earnestly desirous of improving himself and his people, and, above all, is anxious for knowledge of the way of salvation. There is no doubt Mirambo is striving to control the warlike spirit of his people. Petty chiefs flock to him to arbitrate their difficulties, and in more than one instance peace with honor attained in congress has taken the place of bloodshed.

The way that our mere presence has worked upon the guilty fears of the Arab colonists of Ujiji is, indeed, wonderful. The day we arrived there the Ujiji slave-market was closed. They have hindered and opposed us in every conceivable way, but have been baffled on every hand. First they tried to frighten us. It was no use. Thomson said to them, in full council: "Kill us, you may. For every one you kill, two more will step in to fill up the gap. If I die, remember, it will only give fresh impulse to our mission." They well remember it to this day, and believe that his words are coming true. On one occasion they armed all their principal slaves, and with a body of about 200 armed men approached our house. According to custom, I received the Arabs in a friendly way and asked them to sit down inside. I had then about twenty of these Arabs, nearly filling my principal room. This was a critical moment. There were Hutley and myself quite alone and apparently helpless in the hands of this lawless crowd. They completely filled and surrounded our house. There were three large windows in this principal room, just a yard or two from where we stood, and through the bars of the windows the slaves and followers of the Arabs pointed their guns, with their fingers on the triggers. They shouted to their masters to give the word of command; but they could not. Some wonderful power restrained them, and they could only talk excitedly among themselves. At length one of the Arabs, securing the attention of the others, said these words: "The house is full of goods. Let us empty it now and destroy these men by one stroke." The excited mob were now yelling and dancing in our verandah and hall, flourishing spears and guns, and begging their masters to give the word for the onslaught to commence.

The Arabs only saw two calm faces and only heard a quiet request to state their business and talk it over quietly; but one, all-powerful to save, heard two earnest prayers for help, and the next moment those Arabs were literally crushing one another in the doorway, in their anxiety to get out. What an ignominious retreat for the stately Arab! It was a total defeat, from which they have never since recovered. One of their leaders had risen from his seat and said "Let us get out!" when that rush was made and we were left alone. Then they tried to work upon the fears of the natives, to whom they accused us of sorcery and all kinds of evil. This was a good help for us. An Ujiji chief came and told me of it. I said: "Sit down, friend, and let us reason together. These Arabs say we are very bad men, who work magic and mean to take your country from you. Now it is no use me just telling you that I am very good; but I see you Ujiji men have got eyes and ears and are very smart men altogether. What I ask you is this: Just look at us with your own eye. If we cheat or harm any man, let it be known openly; but, if we do good, then believe your own eyes." He replied: "Your words are good." A year after that, the same chief came again, and volunteered this statement: "Master, we have looked at you with our own eyes for a whole year. We see that you pay every man his due and speak truth all ways. Since you have lived here we can go to market without fear of being robbed of our goods, and all the people say that you are good. Now, therefore, what would you have that we should give you?" I said: "Friend, just give us a place to dwell among you in peace, that we may be your brethren; then we may learn your language and teach your children." He said: "Show us where you would dwell." Soon after that a council was assembled at that chief's village. Twenty or thirty lieutenants of counties (gray-bearded old men most of them) formed that council. They consulted together apart for some time and then called me in and formally repeated the chief's words. Then they rose up, and followed by a great crowd, we came to the site I had chosen, on the banks of a beautiful bay, where our steamer could lie snug alongside. One of the chiefs mounted a little hillock and addressed the crowd in words something like this: "Listen, all you people! This land, as far as that tree on that side as far as this mark on this side, is given to the white man this day for an inheritance, to him and for his brethren, not to sell, but to live upon, because we will not sell or give away our country; but the white man shall always dwell here and no one shall take away from him. And if his men molest you, you shall not have a row, but shall go and talk the matter over with him; and if the Ujiji molest his men, he shall not have a row, but he shall go and talk over the matter with the chief of the district." Now these were the very words that I had spoken to the council, which they had taken up as which will now be as lasting as a parchment deed. The whole party then paraded the boundary, except on the side of the hill, for "there," said the chief, "you may enter your borders at will."

Love Now.—A writer tells us that Scottish mothers used, when their children disagreed and were unhappy, to say to them: "Ye agree better when ye ha' to gang in at different kirk doors;" that is, when this heart stone is cold and the lamp of a man's love is quenched, when you are scattered far and wide, you'll forget little differences, and look back lovingly to those days when you might have been so happy, and wish them back again. No love then will be like the love ters and brothers, which you now esteem lightly. Let those of us who are sheltered happy homes cherish our blessings, for the yms must come when we shall be scattered, d "go in at different kirk doors," never ain to be a united band.

Selected.

PAINTER OF THE FRUITS AND FLOWERS!

O Painter of the fruits and flowers!
We own thy wise design,
Whereby these humble hands of ours
May share the work of thine.

Apart from thee, we want in vain
The root and sow the seed;
Thy early and thy latter rain,
Thy sun and dew we need.

Our toil is sweet with thankfulness,
Our burden is our boon;
The curse of earth's gray morning is
The blessing of its noon.

Why search the wide world everywhere
For Eden's unknown fount?
This garden of the primal pair
May nevermore be found.

But blessed by thee, our patient toil
May right the ancient wrong;
And give to every clime and soil
The beauty lost so long.

Our homestead flowers and fruited trees
May Eden's orchard shame;
We taste the tempting sweets of these
Like Eve, without her blame.

And, North and South and East and West,
The pride of every zone,
The fairest, rarest and the best
May all be made our own.

Its earliest shrines, the young world sought
In hill-groves and in bowers;
The fittest offerings hither brought
Were thy own fruits and flowers.

And still with reverent hands we cull
Thy gifts each year renewed;
The good is always beautiful,
The beautiful is good.

—John G. Whittier.

Selected.

WEAK THINGS OF GOD.

'Twas but a little wayside flower,
That pleased the hurrying traveller's eye,
It bloomed to cheer one lonely hour,
And in his weary hand it died.

'Twas but a little wayside rill,
Among the stones and sands that sprang;
A bird dropped down and took its fill,
Then with fresh wing upsoared and sang.

'Twas but a little gift of bread,
Forgotten as a transient care;
A hungry child it comforted,
And answered a believer's prayer.

'Twas but a little passing word,
A stranger's lips were moved to speak;
A burdened spirit overheard,
And straight was stirred the truth to seek.

'Twas but a little simple song,
A hard unknown had love to sing;
Not over sweet, and none too strong,
But still it touched a tender string.

On wings of hope and faith it flew,
And the quick echoes caught the ear
Of others listening in the den,
And captives at their bars afar.

Weak things; but who shall name the small?
And who declare what great must be?
Since in God's uses each and all
Reach out to his infinity.

When hast thanked thy God for every blessing sent,
That time will there remain for murmurs or lament?

SPARROWS.

Selected.

Little birds sit on the telegraph wires.
And chatter, and flitter, and fold their wings.
May be they think that for them, and their sires,
Stretched always, on purpose, those wonderful strings.
And perhaps the thought that the world inspires
Did plan for the birds among other things.

Little birds sit on the slender lines,
And the news of the world runs under their feet;
How vain rises and now declines,
How kings with their armies in battle meet;
And all the while, 'mid the soundless signs,
They chirp their small gossipings, foolish-sweet.

Little things light on the lines of our lives—
Hopes and joys and acts of to-day;
And we think that for them the Lord contrives,
Nor catch what the hidden lightnings say;
Yet from end to end his meaning arrives,
And his word runs underneath all the way.

Is life only words and lightning then,
Apart from that which about it clings?
Are the thoughts and the works and the prayers of men

Only sparrows that light on God's telegraph strings—
Holding a moment and gone again?
Nay; He planned for the birds, with the larger things.

GUILT.

Let no man trust the first false step
Of guilt; it hangs upon a precipice,
Whose steep descent in last perdition ends.

—Young.

Canon of Scripture.

BY MASON GALLAGHER.

One of the most painful scenes of which we read in Ecclesiastical history, is that presented at the fourth session of the Council of Trent, where it was decided that the Apocryphal Books were included in the volume of Holy Scripture, to be held in equal reverence by all Christians, under penalty of anathema: that is, eternal condemnation to those who should "industriously contemn them."

The number of those present who passed this decree, according to Jahn, a Roman Catholic writer, was 48 bishops and 5 cardinals. Dr. Whittaker, the profoundly learned antagonist of Bellarmine, writes, "Disputation of Scripture," p. 40: "The legates, cardinals, archbishops and bishops, who were then present, and who published this decree concerning the number of Canonical Books, made in all about fifty; and those, almost to a man, Italians and Spaniards."

Professor Knapp, in his "Lectures on Christian Theology," p. 47, Eng. Ed., says of this Council: "But after all, the Romish Church, through ignorance of the subject, placed the Apocryphal Books on a level with the Canonical, and even appealed to them as authority on the doctrines of the Bible. They were induced to this, more from the consideration that some of the peculiar doctrines of their Church were favored by some passages in these books; intercession for the dead, for example, by the passage 2 Mace. xii. 43-45. Accordingly, the Council of Trent, in the sixteenth century, set aside the distinction between the Canonical and Apocryphal Books," &c.

Jerome, the most learned of the fathers, and the author of the Vulgate version, rejected the whole Apocrypha from the Canon of Scripture, pronouncing it to be the work of uninspired men.

Among early Christian writers who have given us the Canon of Scripture of the Old Testament, Melito, Bishop of Sardis, who wrote at the end of the second century, is perhaps the most important. Eusebius, the earliest writer of Church History, gives a list of sixteen of the works of this industrious bishop, and says, Book IV., ch. 26, p. 164: "The same writer in the beginning of his preface, gives a catalogue of the Books of the Old Testament acknowledged as Canonical * * * Melito sends greeting to his brother Onesimus * * * You were, moreover, desirous of having an exact statement of the Old Testament, how many in number, and in what order the Books were written. I have endeavored to perform this. When, therefore, I went to the East, and came as far as the place where these things were proclaimed and done, I accurately ascertained the Books of the Old Testament, and send them to thee here below." He then proceeds to give the list as Jerome presents it, and as it accords with the Protestant Standard Bible.

Eusebius, moreover, in Book VI., ch. 25, writes of Origen, whose learning rivalled Jerome's: "In his exposition of the first Psalm he (Origen) has given a catalogue of the Books in the Sacred Scriptures of the Old Testament, as follows." Then we have the same enumeration as made by Melito and Jerome.

Again, Eusebius presents us with the statement of Josephus, the author of the "History of the Jews," written by him in Greek and Hebrew: "In all which he is worthy of credit, as in other matters," the same author remarks. Referring afterwards to his work on the "Antiquity of the Jews," Eusebius continues, Book III., ch. 9: "In the first of these works he gives us the number of the Canonical Books of the Scripture called the Old Testament, such as are of undoubted authority among the Hebrews, setting them forth as handed down by tradition, in the following words:

"We have not, therefore, among us innumerable books that disagree and contradict each other, but only two and twenty, embracing the record of all history, and which are justly considered Divine compositions. * * * In the lapse of so many ages, no one has dared either to add to them, or to take from them, or to change them, but it has been implanted in all Jews, from the very origin of the nation, to consider them as the doctrines of God, and to abide by them, and cheerfully to die for them if necessary."

If all the books of the Old Testament are counted singly their number is 39.

Jahn, the Roman Catholic author quoted previously, says, with respect to this enumeration, Introduction, ch. ii, § 28: "Josephus, who divides them into three classes, numbers only 22, namely, the 5 books of Moses, 13 Prophets, and 4 other books. To account for this, it must be observed that the Jews accommodated the number of their sacred books, as the Greeks did that of the parts of the Iliad and the Odyssey, to the number of their letters, and hence, as Origen and Jerome testify, frequently counted two or more books as one, as for instance the books of Judges and Ruth, the two books of Samuel, the two books of Kings, the two books of Chronicles, Jeremiah and Lamentations, Ezra and Nehemiah, and the 12 minor prophets. We may safely conclude," argues Jahn, "that the Jews in the time of Christ and his apostles had no other Canon than the present, and consequently that this was approved by Jesus and his apostles."—The Episcopal Recorder.

Address to the Members of Brighouse Monthly Meeting.

[We have received by mail an address to the members of Brighouse Monthly Meeting, England, by William Land. We know nothing more of the writer than can be gathered from the pamphlet itself. This appears to be an honest effort to call those addressed back to the original principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends, from which William Land thinks they are straying.]

Believing that the cautions and counsels contained in it are applicable to other localities, as well as that originally designed, and sympathizing with the efforts of those who are endeavoring to uphold the banner given to our forefathers to display, because of the truth, we republish it, with slight omission, in our columns.—Ed.]

To the Members of Brighouse Monthly Meeting and others concerned.

I feel it my duty to clear myself of a burden which has long rested on my mind regarding the practices and unsound views of many amongst us, and to remind us of what our first Friends were in doctrine, practice, and discipline. Therefore let none count me an enemy, for I long to see the Truth prosper, and a returning to first principles. I believe the voice of warning and of wooing is going forth amongst us, saying, "Turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways, for why will ye die, O house of Israel!" "Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people; and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well unto you." Again He saith, "I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walketh in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts."

It is now 228 years since the first Yearly Meeting appears to have been held at Skipton—a meeting at present within the compass of this Monthly Meeting, and now containing only three members. George Fox says,—

"The substantial men and elders came to it in the truth from various parts . . . Where, in the wisdom of God, they did see that all walked according to the glorious gospel of God."—(Letters of Early Friends, p. 312.)

Now when Truth first arose among us as a people, after a dark night of apostasy, many were raised up to proclaim the word of the Lord, numbers of whom were from among the poor of this world, and some were but young and tender buds, but these did bear fruit and were sent forth as lambs amongst wolves. John Crook says,—

"Now the word of the Lord was precious in those days; for there was no open vision. . . . So mighty was the word of God that it grew and prospered, cutting down whatever stood in its way, the strong oak as well as the tall cedars; levelling also many high mountains with the low valleys; and it was so powerful that it discerned between the thoughts and intents of the heart, and divided between the flesh and the spirit; . . . making all flesh to tremble in its progress; whence in scorn came the name Quaker to be given to those that came under its power. How it abased self, and made it of no reputation; and how it made the cross to be endured, and taken up daily, unto all excess and superfluities, whether in meats or drinks, apparel or honors, and brought below, in whatsoever they fashioned themselves to this world and its glory that was not of the Father; and to follow only those things that made for peace; and whatsoever was of good report; reforming them throughout, in body, soul, and spirit, as well as outward in gestures, and postures and language, and behavior, diverse from all people, which made them become a gazing-stock to men and angels, and to be hated of their own mother's son and near relations; and through their taking up the cross daily to other things, they despised the shame that came upon them from the wicked world therefor. . . . How it made many to cast away things of great value, as it was in the apostles' days, and their pictures, laces, and other needless attires and superfluities, with which many (that the Word of eternal life met withal in its growth and progress) were then adorned after the fashion of this world; and how, by its authority, it spoiled the image and pomp of this present world, inasmuch that the very visage of many was marred that they became a wonder to their former intimate acquaintances. . . . How solid were our looks! How grave were our countenances! How exemplary our behavior and conversation amongst all in its growth and withal, lest we should have occasion for any to speak evil of the Blessed Truth of the living God. . . . How tender were the hearts of those made in that day, which received the Word of Life! And what was too dear for them to part withal, for the advancement of Truth and its testimony? True love and unity did abound in these days. The sheep of God's pasture took great delight in being then together, their hearts cleaving to each other, like the souls of Jonathan and David, many hours seeming but a short time, and often meeting together, although through great hardships and difficulties, appeared as nothing in comparison of the great joy and comfort they found in coming together to meet with the Lord, and to feel the glory and holy presence amongst them. . . . O! what fear and holy dread was upon our spirits, lest we should think our own thoughts, or give way in the least to the fleshly motions of our own minds. . . . How careful were we, that we might not lose one tittle of our testimony, by the keeping to the plain language, that we might not lift up the proud spirit in any, by mingling in that particular. . . . And how inwardly rejoiced we did walk, fearing to draw out the minds of any into any worldly discourses, having a principal regard unto the inward exercise of our minds, lest we should lose our own conditions, which made us prize retired meetings, in which we were sensible of the teachings of the true prophet from the false, in ourselves and others! Then we were sensible of the living word to take deep root downward that from thence we might bring forth fruit upward, to the praise of our Father, who may walk in these steps."—(Crook's Works, Ed. 1701; pages 263-4, 315, 265-6, 308-9.)

That worthy man Stephen Crisp says,—

"The three special fruits that did spring from this blessed Root and were and are to continue and increase in us, and among us to the end, are these, viz.: (1) Purity, manifest in a godly conversation; (2) Unity, manifest in dear and loving fellowship towards another; (3) Faithfulness, manifest in bearing a constant and faithful testimony to the things we had received and believed, though it were unto great loss and sufferings."—(p. 9.)

And I can truly say with him,—

"It is in my heart to put you (and myself also) in remembrance of that by which we were called and convinced, which as our foundation principle was laid among us, and it being unchangeable and matterable in itself, doth therefore admit of no alteration or change in those who are rightly kept to it."—(Epistle to Friends, by Stephen Crisp, p. 7.)

But alas! it cannot now be said that we are the same people in Purity, Unity and Faithfulness that they were. For now a false liberty hath entered many of this people, and some of these say, "There is no need to walk as straitly as at the first; for now a day of more liberty has come;" and this liberty hath prevailed against the pure fear that once was, and against the very obedience of truth. The words and speech of many are corrupted, and many of our members are in the old channels of the world; while the pure language and ancient simplicity are almost lost and forgotten. To use the language the same Friend just quoted,—

"And so the work of God which He wrought in a manner laid waste."—(Ibid, p. 10.)

This subtle spirit, having entered into minds of many Friends, these contend for false liberty against the judgment of Truth telling the creature, "These things are small things, or little things, and we must not strain at a gnat." Some say, "I do feel it laid upon me to be so strict;" others say, "There is not the same need now as there was in George Fox's days;" with us other such like excuses, which the world spirit can always invent. It is also some times said that the times have changed, or if George Fox were living now he would live with the times; an assertion more easily made than proved.

The early Friends themselves had similar excuses to contend with, of which S. Crisp says,—

"O my friends! beware of these evil suggestions of the wicked one! How easy they are to be snared by, and how ready they are to be used, and little things, seeing they were great things in the beginning?"—(Epistle to Friends, by Crisp, p. 11.)

(To be continued.)

Wait.—"Oh, the drudgery of this everyday routine!" cries many a business man, many a house-keeping woman. "To go through the day, and have the same round traverse to-morrow!" Yes, but how do you know what use the gracious Superintendent of your life is making of this humdrum, you call it? A poor, blind mill-horse treads his beat, hour after hour, and it all seems come to nothing. But the shaft he is turned is geared into others, and they into wheels that in other rooms, above him, far away beyond his hearing, are working out results that he could never comprehend. Wait until you are no longer through a glass darkly, and the unknown bearings and connections your life-work with other generations, a may be, with other worlds.—Advance.

If you would have power to influence or impress others, you must be willing to suffer—as both an incident and a means of sub-power. There is no such thing as either having or giving great pleasure in life, without the possibility and the reality of having and giving pain. He who never suffers keenly never has the keenest delight, or is enabled to give that delight to others. It is an unpleasant truth, but an undeniable one.

"That the mark of rank in nature is capacity for pain. And the anguish of the singer makes the sweetness of the strain."

Why then should you wonder that you are not always seeing the bright side of life, that sunshine is not always shed by you, on your pathway?

"My Smoke-House."—A man who lives Albany, and whose business is that of a clock said that he had lately built a house that cost him three thousand dollars. His friends expressed their wonder that he could afford build so fine a dwelling.

"Why," said he, "that is my smoke-house."

"Your smoke-house! What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean that twenty years ago I had off smoking, and I have put the money saved from smoke, with the interest, into my house. Hence I call it my smoke-house."

Religious Items, &c.

For "The Friend,"

Liturgical Services.—There has been a little discussion in the Christian Advocate (Methodist) as to the propriety of introducing the use of a liturgy among the Methodists of this country. A. Atwood, in a late number of the paper, contends earnestly against such a use; saying, that "ritualism and liturgical vice has destroyed the spiritual power of every church that has used it in worship till this hour."

Musssulman Census.—Wilfrid S. Blunt the well-known writer on Oriental affairs, gives the Fortnightly Review an approximate census of the Musssulmans of the world. He estimates the pilgrims to Mecca as representatives of all classes of the faith. Counting these for 30, he found that they numbered 93,250, and calculated that they represented not less than 1,000,000 people. The division of creeds he makes out as follows: Sunnites or Orthodox hammedans, 145,000,000; Shiites, 15,000,000; Abadites, 7,000,000; Wahabees, 8,000,000. Blunt says that the progress of Islamism in Africa during the last hundred years has been immense.

ees in Palestine.—The Jews are making efforts for establishing a colony in the district Hebron and Moab, and have secured a grant from the Sultan of 1,500,000 acres of land for the purpose, for which they are to pay a large amount of money. The colony is to be sent to the Porte.

For "The Friend,"

Natural History, Science, &c.

Treatment of Burns.—In the St. Petersburg Herald Weekly Dr. J. Troizki adds his testimony to the value of solution of bicarbonate of soda as a dressing for burns. He says that during the previous year he noticed twenty-two cases of burns, mostly of a severe nature. Ten of them were received in a fire in a large, during a strong wind, when the infants, in order to save their property, were obliged to work in the flames. In all these twenty-five cases bicarbonate of soda was exclusively applied. The result of this treatment was so favorable, that the author considers himself justified in pronouncing this remedy the best and most efficient in burns of all kinds and degrees. Even in extensive cases of the severest character, the pain was alleviated by the application of compresses soaked in a solution of bicarbonate of soda, and the wounds soon healed, leaving few scars and no impairment of the functions of the affected parts.

Salt Deposit.—The Salt Well Company of Casper, Wyoming county N. Y., on 10th mo., struck a layer of salt, 1,533 feet down, of at least thirty feet in thickness. The brine that this salt belt extends through the western New York. The Company will prepare for manufacturing at once through the boiling and evaporating process.

Meteor Showers.—The November stream crosses the earth's path, and hence at times smashes the earth. The meteoric matter striking our atmosphere with a velocity of more than twenty miles per second is rendered incandescent by the collision, and is generally disintegrated long before reaching the earth's surface. A remarkable difference between the rains of August and November has been noticed by all who have studied the phenomena. The matter of the former is spread entirely around the orbit, so that meteors are seen in considerable numbers every year about the 9th and 10th of the month. That of the latter is chiefly collected in a single cluster, whose period of revolution is about thirty-three years. The great showers occur, therefore, but three times in a century. Many persons still living will remember the wonderful rain of fire on Nov. 13, 1833. The writer, who was then teaching a country school in York county, Pa., met persons on the following day who expressed great curiosity to see how the heavens would appear the next night, as all the stars were believed to have fallen. The showers of 1866 in Europe, and that of 1867 in America, were quite remarkable, but far inferior to that of 1833, when the earth probably passed through the most dense part of the cluster. Another very brilliant shower need not be expected till 1899 or 1900. The fact, however, of the existence of two minor groups moving in the same orbit has been clearly indicated. One of these crossed the earth's path in 1852 or 1853, and hence a slight display may again be looked for about 1886. The third group furnished a considerable number of meteors in 1879 and 1880. The point from which the meteors seem to radiate is in Leo, and the time for observation is from midnight to daylight on the morning of Nov. 14th. —Prof. Kirkwood.

Courage of a Humming Bird.—The Humming Birds in Jamaica are lovely little creatures, and most wonderfully tame and fearless of the approach of man. One of these charming feathered jewels had built its delicate nest close to one of the walks of the garden belonging to the house where we were staying. The branch, indeed, of the beautiful little shrub in which this fairy nest was suspended, almost intruded into the walk. In process of time two lovely little pearl-like eggs had appeared, and while we were there we had the great pleasure of seeing the minute living gems themselves appear, looking like two very small bees. The mother-bird allowed us to look closely at her in the nest, and to inspect her little nurslings, when she was flying about near, without appearing in the least disconcerted or alarmed. I never saw so tame or so bold a little pet. But she did not allow the same liberties to be taken by every body unheeded.

One day as Sir C— was walking in the pretty path beside which the fragile nest was delicately suspended amid sheltered leaves, he paused in order to look at its Lilliputian inhabitants. While thus engaged he felt suddenly a sharp light rapping on the crown of his hat, which considerably surprised him. He looked round to ascertain whence this singular and unexpected attack proceeded, but nothing was to be seen. Almost thinking he must have been mistaken, he continued his survey, when a much sharper and louder rat-tat-tat seemed to demand his immediate attention, and a little to jeopardize the perfect integrity and preservation of the fabric in question. Again he looked round, far from pleased at such extraordinary impertinence, when what should he see but the beautiful delicate Humming Bird, with ruffled feathers and fiery eyes, who seemed by no means inclined to let him off without a further indication of sharp taps and admonitory raps from her beak.

Much amused at the excessive boldness of the dauntless little owner of the exquisite nest he had been contemplating, Sir C— moved off, anxious not to disturb or irritate further this valiant minute mother, who had displayed such intrepidity. As to V, and me, the darling little pet did not mind us in the least; she allowed us to watch her to our heart's content, during the uninterrupted progress of all her little household and domestic arrangements." —Lady Stuart Wortley.

Very often children lead their parents into worldly conformity. When the children were young, the mother dressed plainly. She bore a positive testimony against worldly conformity. But as the children grew up and desired fine things like other children, she began to indulge them little by little. They loved fine dress and the mother liked to see them look becoming.

One victory of pride opens the way to another. Children dressed up themselves, think "Mother is too plain." They get her to put on a little here and a little there. She says she "cannot see any harm in it," that "she laid them off more to please the brethren and sisters than because she felt that God required it." Gradually she becomes "conformed to the world," loses her love for real Christians, and takes to her fellowship the polite, proud, pleasure-loving professor of the day. They strengthen each other's hands; she settles down into indifference and calls it charity, and finally may waken up to find herself eternally lost.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 17, 1881.

In a small group of friends gathered around a breakfast table, the conversation turned on the subject of the ministry, and the different effects which were produced by its exercise.

One of the company mentioned the remark made to him by a friend, whose mind of latter time had been increasingly drawn to seek communion with his Heavenly Father. When favored in religious meetings to feel the solemnity of the Divine presence, and to be quieted and gathered under this feeling, he had sometimes been much disturbed and unsettled by communications which were not in harmony with the state of his mind, and from which he could not derive either the instruction or the comfort which may be expected to attend, where the minister speaks by Divine commission, and with a measure of the holy anointing. This experience had probably made him feel more strongly the evil effects of an unauthorized ministry in the church, which, however doctrinally sound, draws away the people from dependence on the teachings of Christ in their own hearts, and tends to fix their eyes on man as their leader and helper.

Another spoke of the spiritual refreshment he had received from a sermon, which, though open to criticism for faults in delivery and want of clear connection between its parts, yet had been accompanied by a measure of the life-giving power of the Head of the church, and had comforted and encouraged its hearers.

The effects of prejudice and previous impressions on both minister and hearer were adverted to; by which the one is prevented from simply obeying the command of the Lord to Jonah, "preach the preaching that I bid thee," and is led to mix with the message some of his own thoughts and feelings, and thus to weaken its force and mar its usefulness. The other is prevented from receiving with proper humility and openness of heart, that instruction and help which are offered to him.

An ungodly ministry, or one unauthorized by the Lord, tends to close the way for the coming forth of those who are truly called to that service. When Friends have been burdened by unsavory discourses, they naturally look with more suspicion or caution on any new and untried appearances, fearing lest they may prove of a similar character. In the state of things which has existed for years past in our Society, a critical spirit has been developed, which may have been necessary as a means of preservation, but there is this danger attending it,—that it may not only check the introduction of evil, but choke the budding of life, and its weak and tender appearances in the visited children.

We have for some time been impressed with the belief, that in many parts of our Society, and among those who remain most firmly attached to our original principles, there is need of increased care and watchfulness to rightly cherish the appearances of good. A minister of long experience recently expressed the belief, that in some meetings there was no opening for the spring of the ministry, if it appeared, as it often does at first in a feeble way. Those who should act as nursing fathers and mothers, had so long been trained to guard the walls from enemies without, that they seemed to have lost sight, in measure, of the need of cultivating the field within. May such duly consider the advice given by George Fox in an epistle to Friends, in the year 1657:

"And friends, 'Quench not the Spirit, nor despise prophesying,' where it moves; neither hinder babes and sucklings from crying Hosannah; for out of their mouths will God ordain strength. There were some in Christ's day that were against such, whom He reproved; and there were some in Moses' day, who would have stopped the prophets in the camp, whom Moses reproved, and said by way of encouragement to them, 'Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets!' So I say now to you. Therefore ye that stop it in yourselves do not quench it in others, neither in babe nor suckling; for the Lord hears the cries of the needy, and the sighs and groans of the poor." "Let not the sons and daughters, nor the handmaids be stopped in their prophesying, nor the young men in their visions, nor the old men in their dreams; but let the Lord be glorified in and through all, who is over all, God blessed for ever! So every one may improve their talents, and every one exercise their gifts, and every one speak as the Spirit gives them utterance."

To the epistle from which these extracts are taken, Geo. Fox subjoined the following postscript: "Friends, be careful how you set your feet among the tender plants that are springing up out of God's earth, lest ye tread upon them, hurt them, bruise them, or crush them in God's vineyard."

We have received a copy of a petition to Congress, prepared by the "Indian Treaty-keeping and Protective Association" of Philadelphia, asking our government to observe its treaties with the Indians, to provide common schools and teachers for their children, to grant portions of land in fee simple to every Indian who may desire it, and to extend to them the protection of the laws of the United States. The petition will be left for signature at the office of "The Friend," No. 116 North Fourth St.

This Association is composed of women belonging to eight religious denominations. The object, as stated in its constitution, is "to awaken a Christian public sentiment which shall move our Government to just dealing with the Indian tribes amongst us." Our columns contain many evidences of the concern felt by those who conduct "The Friend" to do their part in the effort to awaken an enlightened and Christian feeling on Indian questions; and we hope our readers will use their influence in the same direction.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 7th inst. the message of President Arthur was read in both Houses. The treatment of American Jews in Russia has been remonstrated against by our Government. The convention of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty with England has been opened with the view of a joint protectorate over the proposed Panama canal, being abrogated. Reference is made to our relations with Chili and Peru, but no definite action on our part is stated. Our other foreign relations are satisfactory. The total ordinary revenue for the year was $360,782,000, in round numbers, and the total ordinary expenditure was $260,712,000—leaving a surplus of more than a hundred millions, which was applied to the redemption of the National debt. But this is not the whole reduction of the debt for that year, the aggregate of bonds redeemed or that have ceased to bear interest being $3,969,650, and the total reduction of interest, $16,823,292.25.

The President recommends the abolition of Internal revenue taxes, except on tobacco, spirituous and malt liquors and the special taxes on dealers in these articles. Revision of the tariff is advocated; also civil service reform.

Respecting Indian affairs the President takes the correct view, now becoming strong in the Government, that these people must no longer be treated with as independent nations, but should be put on the footing of a conquered people; should have their State and Federal laws; should have their lands allotted to them in individual ownership, and should have liberal grants for schools, like those at Carlisle, Hampton, and Forest Grove, in addition to the reservation schools.

General Kilpatrick, our Minister to Chile, died at Santiago on First-day the 4th inst. aged 45 years.

The President has signed a convention for an interchange of money orders between the United States and New Zealand and New South Wales.

Yoshida Kiyonari, the Japanese Minister at Washington, has been recalled to Tokio, to take office in the home administration, and it is believed he will be assigned a high position in the Department of Finance.

Large deposits of excellent coal have been discovered along Green River, in Washington Territory.

Governor St. John, of Kansas, has issued a proclamation declaring that there exists in the cities of Atchison, Lawrence, Topeka, Wyandotte and Dodge City, a combination violating the law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and offering rewards for the arrest and conviction of members of said combination. He also offers a reward for the arrest and conviction of any policeman, city marshal or constable, who shall be guilty of wilfully refusing to perform the duties imposed upon him by said law.

The deaths in this city for the week ending 12th mo. 10th, was 356, as compared with 314 for the corresponding week of last year. Of these 194 were males, and 162 females; 60 were from consumption, 21 from pneumonia, 20 from small pox, 13 from typhoid fever, and 21 from diphtheria.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3 1/2's, 104 1/2; 4's, 114 1/2; 4's, registered, 117 1/2; coupon, 118 1/2; currency 6's, 130.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand; sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 a 12 3/4 cts. per lb. for upland and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is quiet but steady; sales of 1800 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $7 a $7.25 for clear, and at $7.25 a $7.55 for straight; Penna. extra family $6.50 a $6.75; western do at $7 a $7.50, and put at $7.75 a $8.00; Rye—Red do $5.50 a $5.75; Grain.—Wheat is inactive, but a shaver firm. S. of Delaware red and amber at $1.41 a $1.43; 15 bushels sold at $1.43. Rye is steady at 95 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is in good request and firm. S. of 8500 bushels, including new yellow, at $1 a 7 1/4 cts.; new white at 70 cts.; old yellow at 72 a 72 1/2 cts.; mixed at 72 cts.; do, steamer at 71 cts.; do. No. 70, cts. and do. rejected at 69 1/2 cts. Oats are active and firm. Sales of 1300 bushels, including white at 52 a 54 cts., and rejected and mixed at 50 a 51 cts. Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 12th mo. 10th, at 183 1/2 cts.; old yellow at 140 cts. and straw. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 100 pounds; Straw, 90 cts. to $1 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in demand and prices were a fraction higher; 3000 head arrived and sold at the market yards at 3 a 7 cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

Sheep were active and higher; 1000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5 1/2 cts., and at 4 a 4 7/8 cts. per lb., as to condition.

Hogs were in demand at former prices: 6500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 7 a 9 1/2 cts. per lb., as to quality.

FOREIGN.—Edward Bouverie, Liberal, a former chairman of committees of the House of Commons writes to the Times, denouncing the Government not having summoned Parliament to meet earlier. Says he considers that the danger of a general strike in Ireland and is allowed to prevail the more can will be the remedy required. Not to attempt it is to abandon the very first duty of the Government and will be their doom.

Judge Barry, in opening the Leinster Assizes, said that the country was in a state of lawlessness and anarchy. The total number of outrages in Leinster year was 528, against 249 last year.

The British Board of Trade returns for 11th mo. show a decrease in the value of imports of £4,159, and an increase in the value of exports of £1,848, 4d. The total value of regular line of steam vessels from the Chinese flag arriving in the Thames on 6th inst. with 3000 tons of tea.

At a sale last week of the Duke of Marlborough's Sunderland library, a Latin Bible, being the first B printed with the date of 1462, sold for the enormous sum of 100 guineas. Various polygot and other Bibles were sold at very moderate prices. The total sum realized by the day's sale was £2720.

Madrid, 12th mo. 8th.—El Liberal claims that Sp. as the suzerain of the Sultan of the Sooloo Archipelago, has the right to veto any cession of territory he makes on the island of Mindanao.

The Governor of Eastern Siberia solicits a grant of 400,000 roubles, in aid of Russian emigrants to the Amoor river region, to counterbalance the loss of the Chinese.

An explosion has occurred in the Cockerell cell in Belgium, causing the death of sixty-six persons.

A terrible fire broke out about 7 o'clock on the evening of the 8th inst. in a theatre in Vienna. Some persons perished of the gas leaving the audience in total darkness. Many lost their way and were burned or trampled death or suffocated. Others leaped from the window and were saved by soldiers without. It is reported that there were 2000 in the building, nearly one half whom lost their lives or are missing.

The coast of Tonquin China, was recently devastated by a typhoon, which caused great loss of life as well property. Over 200 bodies have been recovered.

Another Indian canal is proposed. The length of Kavi is to be covered, giving a waterway across Malayan Peninsula, and shortening by six hundred miles the route from India to China. The canal be about thirty miles long, through a fertile country, great wealth in tin, gold and other minerals.

The Government of Ontario, last week, sold tin limits in the Muskoka and Parry Sound districts of the Province. The aggregate of territory was 127 square miles, and the amount received was $717,176.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE
Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward.) Philadelphia.
Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M.D.

Applications for the Admission of Patients made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 24, 1881.

NO. 20.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

T. NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 245.)

TESTIMONY OF NUNCY MONTHLY MEETING CONCERNING MERCY ELLIS.

Believing that the memory of the just is blessed, and that the example of those, who, through submission to the teachings of the Holy Spirit, have been enabled to fight the good fight, to keep the faith, and finish their race with joy, tends to animate survivors to love them as they followed Christ, we are grieved to preserve some account of this our loved friend.

She was the daughter of William and Mary x, of Deer Creek, Maryland, both of whom were valuable and exemplary members of our religious Society, the former an acceptable filling station of the office, and the latter being approved minister. It was their concern and endeavor to train up their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and our friend has frequently been heard to commemorate their pious care in this respect, as among the many favors which a merciful Father had conferred upon her, and for which account must be rendered.

In her very early life she was sensible of the adoring visitations of the love of God to her self, inclining her to choose the good and reject the evil; and as she yielded thereto, she was strengthened to surrender her own will to the will of her heavenly Father, and to take some steps in that narrow path which leads to true peace.

As she endeavored in simplicity to follow the pointing of the Divine Teacher, she became impressed with the conviction that some articles of her dress were deemed more for show than for use, and that was her duty to lay them aside, believing that an attempt to decorate the frail body, could not be agreeable in the Divine sight.

She was frequently observed in after life, that little acts of simple obedience to appointed duty, even in matters which are esteemed of small moment, she felt the sweet reward of heavenly peace. At this early period of life, the necessity of endeavoring to follow the dictates of the Spirit of Truth, how small its requirements might appear to the world view, so deeply engraven on her heart, that it became her primary engagement, and the governing principle of her entire course. Thus being faithful in the day of small things, she experienced a growth in

Grace, and was enabled to show forth in her example the fruits of the Spirit, in love, in gentleness, and in meekness of spirit.

In the twenty-fourth year of her age, she was united in marriage with our friend William Ellis, and soon after removed with him to this neighborhood, where she continued to reside during the remainder of her life.

At the time of their settlement here, the country for a considerable distance around, was in a wilderness state, and they had to encounter many of the difficulties and privations incident to new settlements, but though of a delicate frame and accustomed to many indulgences, she was cheerful and contented in her allotment. A few families of Friends soon settled around them, whose society was congenial, but there was no meeting for Divine worship near enough for them to attend, which was a source of deep concern to her exercised mind, and she felt it to be the greatest privation attendant on their situation.

The Monthly Meeting to which they then belonged was distant about one hundred miles, notwithstanding which she several times attended it, performing the journey on horseback, through a country but little cultivated, and over a range of lofty and rugged mountains. It was not long before an indulgent meeting was granted them, in the attendance of which she was diligent and earnest, and has often been heard, even late in life, to remark upon the solid comfort and instruction she was permitted to experience in these small but solemn gatherings, and that she had great cause to commemorate the goodness and mercy of Israel's Shepherd, who thus watched over and cared for her, and preserved her from being entangled by the allurements of this fading world.

Under the precious and tendering impressions thus sealed upon her spirit by the fresh unfoldings of the Day-Spring from on high, she was strengthened to renew her covenant with the Most High, that if He, whom her soul loved, and who had watched over her from her early youth, should graciously continue to be with her, and give her food to eat and raiment to put on, He should be her God, and she would endeavor faithfully to serve Him in the way of his requirements, during the residue of her days.

Believing that her Divine Master had called her to the work of the ministry of the gospel, and been pleased to confer on her a gift therein, after passing through the necessary baptisms and exercises preparatory thereto, she first appeared in that capacity about the thirty-ninth year of her age. Having been instructed in the school of Christ to distinguish the voice of the true Shepherd from that of the stranger, she was careful to wait for his renewed putting forth, and simply to follow his leadings; by which means her communications were made lively and impressive, ministering grace to the hearer and tending to the edification of the church.

Her first religious engagement, with a minute from her Monthly Meeting, was to [visit] the families of this and a neighboring Monthly Meeting, which she was enabled to perform to the peace of her own mind, and to the satisfaction of her friends. She was subsequently several times engaged in religious labor in the city of Philadelphia, the State of New York and in Canada; and although she had a family of children around her, many of whom were small, and was deprived by death of her beloved husband, yet she was made willing to surrender all at the call of her Lord, and to run in the way of his requirements; not doubting that He who put her forth, would open the way and watch over those whom she left behind.

Her labors of love within the compass of this meeting were abundant, being deeply concerned for the spiritual welfare of its members, warning and exhorting, and reproving with all long suffering and tenderness, desiring that all might be gathered into the fold of Christ, and become of the number of his sheep. She several times visited the families belonging to it, the last time being in the eighty-fifth year of her age. When laying this concern before her friends, she expressed the belief that it was an evening sacrifice required of her; and in the progress of it she several times remarked, that she believed it was her last visit of the kind among them. She earnestly encouraged the young and the middle-aged, while strength lasted, to double their diligence to make their calling and election sure.

It was her lot to pass through deep afflictions, but she was favored to experience the Divine Arm underneath for her support, and to hear his voice saluting her spiritual ear with the gracious promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." And she often remarked, that this consoling language had been a stay and support to her during the subsequent steps of her life.

In the attendance of our religious meetings, both for worship and discipline, she was an example of diligence, careful to bring her children with her, and to encourage others to faithfulness in this Christian duty.

Until her bodily strength was impaired by advanced age, she generally attended the Yearly Meeting, and frequently our Quarterly Meeting, though distant from her residence several days' journey. Such was her concern to be found faithful unto the end, and to fill up the measure of service allotted her in the militant church, that she made great exertions to perform apprehended duty, even when the infirmities of age might seem to some a sufficient ground of excuse.

For the suppression of intemperance and the iniquitous practice of converting the gifts of a bountiful Providence into a liquid poison, as she often termed it, she labored much, both in public and private, several times visiting those not in profession with Friends, who were engaged in distilling, and laboring in love to dissuade them from an employment so unrighteous, and so destructive of the comfort and happiness of their fellow men.

She took a deep interest in the religious and literary education of children, and a school under the care of Friends, being opened near her residence, she extended the hospitality of her house to many who were remote from suitable schools, or who, from other causes, claimed her sympathy and aid, and we have reason to believe that her watchful, maternal care over these, was blessed to some of them.

To the poor and those under affliction, whether of body or mind, she was a tender and sympathizing friend, frequently engaged in searching out objects of charity, and prompt in her endeavors to afford them timely and suitable relief. Being of an affable and affectionate disposition, sweetened by the love of God shed abroad in her heart, she was courteous and kind to all, and was greatly esteemed and beloved by a large circle of friends and acquaintances.

She continued to attend our religious meetings until about two weeks previous to her decease, and though her bodily strength had much failed, her mind remained clear and vigorous, and she was frequently engaged in the exercise of her gift in a lively and acceptable manner. Her last public engagement was in fervent, solemn supplication to the Most High, on behalf of "the little meetings in this part of his heritage."

Having thus endeavored to fulfil her social and religious duties in the fear of the Lord, and to occupy the gifts and talents entrusted to her to the honor of the great Giver, she was enabled to contemplate the close of life without alarm, often expressing a desire to be released, when it might be consistent with the Divine will. Her spirit seemed clothed with peaceful quiet, calmly awaiting the final summons, as one whose day's work was done. She was taken ill on the 5th of the Second month, 1848, and was mercifully spared from much bodily suffering. To a friend who sat by her, she said, "If it should be the blessed Master's will at this time to proclaim a release, I hope it will be in mercy." On being reminded of the gracious promise made to her in a time of great affliction, before alluded to, she replied, "Yes! and his promises are yea, and amen forever!"

She quietly and peacefully departed on the afternoon of the 9th of the same month, having nearly completed her eighty-seventh year, a minister about forty-eight years; and we believe, that to her may be applied the language of Holy Scripture, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, yea, saith the Spirit, they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

(To be continued.)

J. W.

A Vivid Picture of the Michigan Forest Fires.

Fires had been burning in Sanilac, Huron and Tuscola counties, but no one apprehended any danger. Farmers had set fire to slashings to clear the ground for fall wheat, but this happens every fall, and the fact that not a drop of water had fallen in from fifty to seventy days was not considered by those who saw the smoke clouds, and replied that there was no danger. There was danger. Behind that pall of smoke was a greater enemy than an earthquake, and it had a tornado at its back and two hundred miles of forest in the front. From noon until 2 o'clock a strange terror held the people in its grip; then all of a sudden the heavens took fire, or so it seemed to hundreds. In some localities it came with the sound of thunder. In others it was preceded by a terrible roaring as if a tidal wave were sweeping over the country. Almost at the same minute the flames appeared in every spot over a district of country thirty miles broad by one hundred in length.

At Richmondville, ten miles above Sanilac, one hundred and fifty people had comfortable homes, stacks of hay and grain, teams, cows, pigs, sheep, and no fear of the fire which they knew was burning a mile away. At 2 o'clock the flames rushed out of the woods, leaped the fences, ran across the bare fields and swallowed every house but two, and roasted alive a dozen people. It is hardly forty rods to the beach of the lake, and yet many people had no time to reach the water. Others reached it with clothing on fire and faces and hands blistered. The houses did not burn singly, but one billow of flame seized all at once and reduced them to nothing in ten minutes.

I saw many and many a spot where the billows of the fire jumped a clean half mile out of the forest to clutch house or barn. The Thornton family were wiped out with the exception of a boy. Thornton had hitched up his team to drive the family to a place of safety, but when he saw they were all surrounded by the flames he unhitched the horses in despair. Before they could be unharnessed they bolted in different directions, and the old man became so confused that he ran directly toward a big slashing, which was then a perfect mass of flame, and dropped and died with his head toward it.

Meantime the mother and children had taken refuge in the root house. This was a structure mostly sunk in the ground and the roof well covered with earth. Here they were all right for a time, but when the father failed to join them, one of the sons went out to see what caused the delay. He was hardly out of the place before the door through which he had passed was in flames. In this emergency he ran to a dry creek, and by laying on his face and keeping his mouth to the ground he lived through it.

I talked with a woman who lived neighbor to the Thorntons and who escaped by fleeing to a field of plowed ground. This was only a few rods from the root house, and she said it was fully an hour before the screams and shrieks and groans from the people inside grew quiet in death. One by one they were suffocated by heat and smoke, and their bodies presented a most horrible appearance.

To one riding through the district it seems miraculous that a single soul escaped. The fire swept through the green trees the same as the dry. It ran through fields of corn at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and fields of clover were swept as bare as a floor. Dark and gloomy swamps, filled with pools of stagnant water, and the house for years of wildcats, bears and snakes, were struck and shriveled and burned almost in a flash. Over the parched meadows the flames ran faster than a horse could gallop. Horses did gallop before it, but were overtaken and left roasting on the ground. It seemed as if every hope and avenue of escape were cut off, and yet hundreds of lives were spared. People spent ten to twenty hours in ditches and ponds, or in fields under wet blankets, having their hair singed, their limbs blistered, and their clothing burned off piece by piece.

In dozens of cases the first flames spar houses and barns, but after seeming to have passed on for miles, suddenly circled back to make a clean sweep of everything. Unlike one rides over the burnt district he cannot believe the eccentricities of a forest fire. In the great swamp, between Sanilac and Sodus, it burned everything to the roots a mile in breadth. Then it left patches from ten feet to ten rods wide. Then it struck and burned lanes hardly twenty feet wide leaving half a mile of fuel on either side. The timber it seemed to strike the green trunks harder than the dry ones. It was like a green serpent making its way across the country. It would run within three feet of a whole stack, and then glide away to lick up a house. It would burn a stack and spare a barn ten feet off.

People felt the heat while the fire was twenty miles away. It withered the leaves of trees standing two miles from the path of the fire serpent. The very earth took fire in hundreds of places, and blazed up as if the fire was feasting on cordwood. The stoniest building stood up only a few minutes. The fire seemed to catch them at every corner once, and after a whirl and a roar nothing would be left. Seven miles off the beach, Forester, sailors found the heat uncomfortable. Where some houses and barns were burned, we could not find even a blacken stick—every log, beam and board was reduced to fine ashes.

Seven miles back from the lake, at Forest, a farmer gathered up fifteen persons in his wagon and started for the beach. The fire was close behind them as they started—close that the dresses of some of the women and children were on fire from the spar. It was seven miles of up hill and down, wading, corduroy, ruts and roots, and the horses needed no whip to urge them into a mad run. The wagon started the tire of a hind wheel rolled off. They could not stop for it, yet it is an actual fact that the horses pushed over that seven miles of rough road at a waltz, and the wheel stood firm. A delay of five minutes at any point of the road would have given fifteen more victims to the flames which followed on behind. I saw the wag at the lake, and I saw the tire seven miles away on the roadside.

The people who sought the beach had to endure much of the heat and all of the smoke. Wading up to their shoulders they were safe from the flames, but sparks and cinders fell like a snow storm, and the smoke was suffocating. The birds not caught in the woods were carried out to sea and drowned and the waves have washed thousands of them ashore. Squirrels, rabbits and such small animals stood no show at all, but deer and bears sought the beach and the company of human beings. In one case a man leaped from a bluff into the lake and found himself close beside a large bear. They remained in company under the bank nearly all night, and the bear seemed as humble as a dog. In another instance two of the animals came out of the forest and stood close to a well from which a farmer was drawing water to dash over his house, and they were with him for two hours before they deemed it prudent to jog along. Deer came out and sought the companionship of cattle and horses, and paid no attention to persons rushing past them.—Detroit Free Press.

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

A friend has placed in my hands a few memoranda of the religious services of some dear and valued friends, who have long since finished their labors on earth and been gathered, as those who knew them while on earth believe, to the general assembly and church of those who now surround the Divine throne.

One of the papers contains a brief sketch of a sermon delivered by Alice Knight in 1843; and will probably revive her memory in the minds of some who knew and loved her. Though we cannot, in the reading of such notes, expect to feel in full the living energy and holy anointing that often accompanied the ministry which is of the Lord's preparing; yet there is a degree of instruction and of comfort in thus sharing in a small measure in the exercises of that day, and in remembering, that of the young people then affectionately addressed, there were raised up those who became established as testimony-bearers to the Truth. J.

1843, 5th mo. Attended Baeks Quarterly meeting held at Falls. We were favored with instructive counsel and testimony from our esteemed friend Alice Knight. She had remembered the promise, "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you; for every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened;" but we must ask in faith, nothing wavering, for he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed.

We read of two kinds of faith, a living faith, and a dead faith; a faith which overcomes the world, and a faith that is overcome by the world. It is only by living faith that we shall become established upon the right foundation, the rock Christ Jesus. When we come to know Him to be our leader and teacher, then we shall know Him to be the crown and diadem of our assemblies when met together for the solemn purpose of worship to Almighty God; and we shall be enabled to offer acceptable worship to the Father, in spirit and in truth, out of meetings as well as in meetings.

If we are ever engrafted into Christ and become living branches of the true Vine, we must have that faith that operates by love to be the purifying of the heart, and we must obey its speaking voice. Our holy Redeemer at the close of his memorable sermon on the mount, testified, that whosoever heareth these sayings of his and doeth them, He would liken unto a wise man that built his house upon a rock, and the rain descended and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man that built his house upon the sand, and the rain descended, and the floods came and the winds blew and beat upon that house and it fell, and great was the fall of it. While we have living faith in our holy Redeemer, and know our hope of salvation to be established upon that rock, grace will be administered sufficient to preserve and conduct us in safety through this state of probation; and though our way may be beset with trials and afflictions, it will be nothing new, for this is the way in which the Lord leads all his redeemed children. When we settle down to that divine principle, Christ within the secret of our hearts, and know the foundations of all our proceedings to be centered there, we shall not be driven about with every wind of doctrine; but be enabled to distinguish between the voice of the good Shepherd and the voice of the stranger; and know our establishment to be on the right foundation, and sure.

She was comforted in believing that the Lord still remembered this part of his heritage, that the day of his visitation was still extended to many, and to some in a peculiar manner. They that seek the Lord early shall find Him, for He loves an early sacrifice. She desired to encourage the young and arising generation to faithfulness, for many of the fathers and mothers had been gathered from works to rewards, and others will soon be gathered, and the support of our doctrines and testimonies must eventually devolve upon those who are now in the younger walks of life. She believed that the Lord's everlasting arm had been made bare for the deliverance of some of these, and that the wings of divine mercy were still hovering over them. G.

The Fitness of One's Own Place.

On the dry shingly sides of a little brackish lake by the seashore, the writer once found a flower with lustrous bell-like blossoms. It was unlike any flower he had ever seen before, and so some time later, when the seed vessels were completely ripened, the seeds were gathered and carefully kept for cultivation elsewhere. But although those seeds were planted at various times and in places three thousand miles apart, no green blade ever rewarded the watcher's care. It seemed as though, in all the wide world, there was but one place where these lustrous blossoms could grow.

Is there not something like this in human life everywhere? Have you never met with some winsome and saintly character, different from all others, with a strength and sweetness and beauty all its own? You have tried to analyze such a character, and have been foiled. You have tabbed off its virtues and attractions—gentleness, purity, sensitiveness, fidelity, unselfishness, and the rest; and yet, when you have finished your analysis, you have been forced to confess that there was something more there,—something that is not to be found in any catalogue of virtues and graces. So, in despair of finding a name for this nameless grace, you have called it at last, simply and reverently, the grace of God.

If you had gone back into the history of such a character, you would have found that it had a history as singular as the character itself. It was by no ordinary experience that its beauty and its strength were gained. The well-watered garden may do for the lily and the rose, but the lovely seaside bells needed for their nurture the poverty of the shingly soil and the buffeting of the strong sea-winds. To have brought them into the rich loam of the garden, or into the luxurious calmness of the hot-house, would have been the surest way to destroy them. And so some of the noblest and the best men and women whom God has given to the world have been nurtured, as it were, on a hardy or a desert soil of their own. They have grown up perhaps through poverty and sore affliction, certainly through temptation and conflict and endurance and victory, into the full stature of the perfect ones in Christ Jesus. God has prepared them for their peculiar work, and given them a peculiar attractiveness, by a peculiar training in a peculiar lot.

We are too apt to forget that God deals with each of us individually. In these days of statistics, of great corporations, of masses of men shut out and clearly defined from other great masses of men, we are prone to think of men in the mass, and to forget that they are all and only individuals. That is a mistake which God never makes. Every man has been placed in surroundings of his own and with relations of his own to the outside world. He cannot live the life of others; he has his own life to live. The guiding hand of God is ever with him as an individual, guiding him unfaithfully, if he will only follow unwaveringly, into what is unmistakably best for him. And when at last life is ended, he finds that he has to face death—and God—as an individual soul. There is no hiding, then, behind corporations, or societies, or mankind in general.

But one may say: "I know that God watches over me individually; but why should my experience be so different from that of every other individual?" Are you so sure that your life is different from that of others just where you suppose it to be exceptional? Have none before you passed through so many weary years as you have nursed? Is your pathway such an exceptionally rugged one? If indeed it be so, you have all the more reason to thank God for your lot. Do you not see that he has taken you in hand, and is preparing you for what he has prepared for you? That heavy affliction, that bitter disappointment, that prolonged trial, that blast of fierce temptation, has not been meaningless. The very intensity of your life's experience—its desert-wandering, its Gethsemane-conflict, its hungering, its thirsting, its yearning—is a sign that God is honoring you by peculiar training for a peculiar sphere, and all this shall be made apparent to you and to others in his own good time.

And if God gives you a special experience like this, should not your character gain a special grace and beauty and vigor of its own? Great results should come from great privileges. Surely it cannot be that for all these years the Lord has been trying to shape you into a kingly character, and you have been murmuring at his hand, or even persistently undoing all his work! If this has been so, is there not a special message for you now in God's words through his prophet: "What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? Wherefore when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?" God has given you a place in the world, which, hard and dreary though it may seem to you, is the fittest of all places for your spiritual nurture and growth. Your part is to justify God's choice for you by continual gain in submissiveness and strength, and by increased fitness unto and fruitfulness in all good words and works. That is the only way in which you will ever be able to enter fully into God's plan for your life, or into its blessed results.—S. S. Times.

From "The London Friend."
"Vain Faith."

Dear Friend,—There is, I hope, not one of the readers of The Friend who fails to believe that faith without works is dead; but I fear that in the popular religious teaching of the day there is sometimes a great want of clearness in setting this forth, to judge by the results. I am not thinking of infirmities, nor even of sins repented of again and again, but of daily conduct utterly at variance with Christianity, which is yet supposed to be compatible with being "religious." A few instances will illustrate my meaning. I was recently told by a lady actively engaged in promoting the welfare of young women employed in places of business in a large town, that they were, as a class, inveterate storytellers, and did not seem to have an idea of truthfulness. One of them, who was considered to some extent religious, gave it as her opinion that "business lies were no matter." I gathered that these young women were expected to tell them, and did so as a part of their ordinary work. One of these assistants, whose mind was not so darkened, told my friend the following experience as her own. She was showing some articles to a lady, when the latter asked if they were of Parisian make. The principal was at that instant passing, and he answered the question. "O yes; they have only just been unpacked." I think it was the day before yesterday; was it not, Miss —?" appealing to the assistant. She was silent; she knew that they had all been made on the premises, and felt a guilty sharer in the deception as the deluded lady made her "Parisian" purchase. The poor girl said, "I felt as if I were as bad as he." After the lady was gone, the remark again entered the room, and made a master to the effect, "You know we must say things like that in business." My friend made further inquiries about him, and was told that he was very particular in attending his place of worship, and anxious that the young men, of whom he employed a large number, should attend the same. "And what do they think of religion?" asked my friend. "They make a scoff and scorn of the whole thing," was the answer, "and hate to attend where he does." Now, how are young persons so placed to be dealt with by "Christian workers"? Are they to be allowed to retain the idea that "business lies" are compatible with "religion;" or are they to be told that the law of Christ admits of no such necessity, and so called upon to lose their means of obtaining a living—for that is the issue? How real would be a "revival" which would lead assistants to say to an employer, "We will work for you with a diligence hitherto unknown; we will be faithful and obedient servants in all lawful ways; but one thing we cannot do—we cannot cheat and lie on your behalf." Meanwhile, which is most needed—a mission to employers or employed?

May I give one more instance of this divorce between morality and (so-called) religion? A case was very recently brought under my notice of a man and his wife, who might have been in comfortable circumstances but for their own folly, and who took it as a matter of course to be set on their feet again by generous friends—people who would spend nearly a sovereign in a handsome, needless article of dress when they had been short of food. Once, when reduced to great distress, and some furniture was sent to them by a kind lady, either as a loan or to be absolutely theirs by paying a very small sum in weekly instalments, they fulfilled neither condition; and, when she thought it right to express her disapproval strongly, was soundly rated by them for her lack of Christian feeling in ever expecting to have the loan returned. Their debts were once discharged on similar conditions, but not one penny has ever been refunded. Yet these people were spoken of to me as Christians; that is, I presume, that they are members of a Christian church, and make a profession of religion. The man was a teacher in a First-day school, instructing the young in their duties!

But there is no need to multiply instances. My object in mentioning these painful facts is simply that "Friends" may do their part strenuously in the matter, and be especially careful to discountenance one-sided teaching.

A FRIEND.

Selected.

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER.*

Thouh flowers have perished at the touch
Of Frost, the early comer,
I hail the season loved so much,
The good St. Martin's summer.

O gracious morn, with rose-red dawn,
And thin moon curving o'er it!
Thou'd'st my darling, latest born,
More loved than all before it!

How flamed the sunrise through the pines!
How stretched the birchen shadows,
Bringing in long, wind-warred lines
The westward sloping meadows!

The sweet day, opening as a flower
Unfold its petals tender,
Renews for us at noonday's hour
The summer's tempered splendour.

The birds are hushed; alone the wind,
That through the woodland searches,
The red oak's lingering leaves can find,
And yellow plumes of larches.

But still the balsam-breathing pine
Invites no thought of sorrow,
No hint of loss from air like wine,
The earth's content can borrow.

The summer and the winter here
Midway a truce are holding;
A soft, consenting atmosphere
Their tents of peace enfolding.

The silent woods, the lonely hills,
Rise solemn in their gladness;
The quiet that the valley fills
Is scarcely joy or sadness.

How strange! The autumn yesterday
In winter's grasp seemed dying;
On whirling winds from skies of gray
The early snow was flying.

And now, while over Nature's mood
There steals a soft relenting,
I will not mar the present good,
Forecasting or lamenting.

My autumn time and nature's hold
A dreamy tryst together,
And both grown old, shout us fold
The golden-tissued weather.

I lean my heart against the day
To feel its bland caressing;
I will not let it pass away
Before it leaves its blessing.

* * * * *

* This name in some parts of Europe is given to the season we call Indian Summer.

O stream of life, whose swifter flow
Is of the eud forewarning,
Methinks thy sundown afterglow
Seems less of night than morning!

Old cares grow light; aside I lay
The doubts and fears that troubled;
The quiet of the happy day
Within my soul is doubled.

That clouds must veil this fair enshine,
Not less a joy I find it;
Nor less yon warm horizon line,
That winter lurks behind it.

The mystery of the untired days
I close my eyes from reading;
He will be done whose darkest ways
To light and life are leading.

Less dread the winter night shall be,
If memory cheer and halcyon
Its heavy hours with thoughts of thee,
Sweet summer of St. Martin!

—Whittier.

Selected.

HE MAKETH ME TO LIE DOWN.

He maketh; yes, He sees us on the mountain,
Toil-worn and weary, sadly needing rest,
And yet determined to be pressing onward
To gain the summit of some distant crest.

Too much intent to listen to his teaching,
Too eager to be gladdened by his smile—
Too worried often, to hold close communion,
And then He bids us rest a little while.

And we rebel; we do not wish to tarry;
It is so hard to feel we must lie down,
Just at the moment when our hopes were highest,
And glory waiting our success to crown.

Dear Christian Friend, perchance some trying illness
Has caused thy busy steps in life to cease,
And placed thee now beside the silent waters—
The waters of affliction, but of peace.

And though the pain is sometimes so distressing,
Thou canst not praise, and scarce hast power to praise
Still thou art patient, and the loving Shepherd,
Speaks words of tenderness in his own way.

And when the pain is passed, then He reminds thee,
Of many hours when thou wert strong and well,
In which thou scarcely hadst one moment's leisure
To tell Him everything thou hadst to tell.

And so He took thee from the hum of voices,
And will most tenderly thy soul restore,
Until thou art refreshed and duly strengthened
To walk more watchfully than heretofore.

Or else to tread, with faith renewed, made firmer,
The valley that grows bright when He is near;
And thence to enter, where no rest is needed,
Upon the duties of a nobler sphere.

Address to the Members of Brighthouse Monthly Meeting.

(Continued from page 150.)

The efficacy of the truth is still the same
And the cross of Christ is none the less powerful,
And still has the same effect upon all who come under it.

I feel it right to bear my testimony again the practice of many amongst us, (very few being faithful in the things before mentioned who have become enemies of the Truth in stead of "Friends of Truth," inasmuch as the do things which Truth does not sanction, if it hath come to pass that scarcely a new fashion comes up, or a fantastical dress is inven-ed, but many amongst us run into it, making some look more like play-actors than Friend
The pure language of Thee and Thou is but little used by many, and then only to other members;

"Which," says George Fox, "to say to Friend Thee and Thou, and to the world You, is hypocrisy."
—(Epistle of George Fox 1660, p. 143.)

And then the use of flattering titles, such as: Mr., Mrs., Miss, Sir, &c., is permitted, as well as to declare off the hat as a mark of respect: and not only permitted, but even taught to some under our own name.

Also the salutation of "Good morning," & "Good evening," things which George Fox and our early Friends condemned and wrote against. Then there is the calling of days and months by their heathen names, as "Sunday," "Monday," &c., for First-day and Second-day, &c.; "January," "February," &c., for First and Second month, &c. And this is recognized by this Monthly Meeting, for the times Sunday and Wednesday are printed on boards outside some of our meeting-houses, without any allusion to the plain, pure use of First-day, &c.: and the same thing is done on bills announcing the holding of meetings.

See book on "Good Morrow," by George Fox; a paper by him, "How God's people are not to use the names of heathen gods into their mouths."

We find George Fox writing an epistle 1699, p. 277, urging that in all Monthly meetings, enquiry be made,—"Whether any at profess the truth, are out of the pure language that the prophets used?" In another epistle he strongly condemns, "All such as go in the using of it." (1660, 2nd ed. p. 145-9). wherein he also says that, "Self, which is n-pleasing, and a daubing spirit must be set down."

In several epistles and writings he refers to use things, and evidently his mind was much exercised about them. How many in this Monthly Meeting would be called by him hypocrites and man-pleasers! I fear few would exempt. The same was the case with all our early Friends; and all truly convinced ones of truth since then have had to come to the same practice.

William Smith writes,—

We dare not speak any other language but Thou, single person, knowing it is the Spirit's language and hath been from the beginning; and the scripture declares it."—(W. Smith's Works, 1660, short testimony on behalf of the Truth, p. 64.)

It is indeed as John Barclay states,—

An unanswerable fact, that there has not been individual, who has risen to any eminence for pious dedication in our Society, (as a true and sincere Friend), but has had to tread the straight narrow path, and has had to attribute his progress in giving up in the ability received, to obey the admonition of the Spirit of Christ, even in little things.—(J. Barclay's Letters, p. 286.)

Of this many instances could be given, for of which see the Journal of Thomas Shilline. True it is that few amongst us now at- tend to this, but as John Barclay, in another place says,—

All that have ever rightly given up to make a new appearance, and to speak the plain language, have done it on the very same sound ground, not merely because George Fox and others did. The truly convinced have continued to feel on subject as he did; and though the instances are few, as the mercy is great and the work marvellous, no light and superficial one—such instances are a time to time occurring, and they are the result of cleansing the inside of the cup, that the out- may become clean also."—(J. Barclay's Letters, 35.)

He would notices the changes that have come over us as a people, especially the change of dress; and of this many instances could be given. I will give one. A preacher addressed his congregation, at the close of an address one of our recorded ministers, not long ago, said, "We had a testimony to bear against superfluity in dress especially the women;"—Brid. Friend, 12th mo. 1879, p. 300.) and this "recorded minister," says, "I could not but feel ashamed when he alluded to this matter, when I thought of the length many Friends go to at this present day; and if he could have seen over many of our assemblies, he would have thought that we had lost this testimony." A Presbyterian preacher said to this same recorded minister, "He regretted that we had laid aside our old distinguishing dress;" and this same "progressive Friend," having laid it aside himself, might well include himself amongst those of whom he felt ashamed. But although the world's ways and customs change, and notwithstanding all the arguments which the world's spirit can invent, Truth will still be the same as ever it was. O! Friends, be not deceived any longer, by the cruel enemy, who has worked such a forsaking of the testimonies of Truth, and caused our once fair heritage to become his prey; for verily the "Wild Boar of the Forest" hath entered in and devoured on every hand.

Singing and Music.—Another practice that I feel I must speak of, and which is contrary to truth, is Singing, which has become very prevalent amongst us, even on the part of ministers and elders and overseers; and I fear but few of the wealthy are without instruments of music in their houses. They are also used on school premises, and young Friends are being allowed to attend singing classes, one of which is held on the meeting-house premises at Leeds. Some even take part in concerts, and sing songs such as are sung at theatres.

At the meetings of the so-called Friends' Mutual Temperance Society which are held on the school premises at Leeds, songs of this kind are being sung regularly.

Attendance of Steeple Houses, &c.—Another practice contrary to the Truth, is the attendance of steeple houses, and other such places, and even ministers, elders and overseers frequently absent themselves from our meetings to attend such places: not as in former times under the constraining power of the Most High, to warn the priest of his errors, or to speak to the people of a more excellent way; but to join in their manner of worship, which Geo. Fox called "will worship and idolatry."

Marriage.—Again, the practice has been permitted of late, by this Monthly Meeting, of marrying by a priest, a thing which is contrary to Truth's principles, and which our early Friends strongly condemned. Years ago, many of the weighty Friends were grieved at these deviations, and the Yearly Meeting has issued epistles time after time referring to them.—(Yearly Meeting Epistles, 1753 and 1783, 1846.)

(To be concluded.)

Small Pox and Anti-Vaccinators.—A leading anti-vaccinator, in Rotherhithe, Escott by name, who had none of his children vaccinated, has lost his wife and two children by small pox, and four others have had the disease. Escott borrowed a suit of mourning from a friend, named Angus, to attend his wife's funeral, and returned the clothes without disinfection, with the result that the lender caught small pox and died. Since then, nearly every house in the neighborhood has been attacked, and sixteen patients have been removed to the hospital.—British Medical Jour.

The Light of Christ.

For "The Friend."

The light and life of Christ manifested in all men, has ever been a fundamental doctrine with the religious Society of Friends. With very many other Scripture testimonies illustrating and confirming this, they believe that "That which may be known of God is manifest in men," &c.; that Jesus was and is "the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world;" and that in the light of the Lamb must the nations of them that are saved walk. Moreover, it was this light of Christ in man that George Fox rejoiced that he was sent to turn people to. The same which William Penn calls "the glory of this day (the rise of Friends) and foundation of the hope that has not made us ashamed since we were a people;" and in reference to which Robert Barclay said, "that when well weighed, it would be found to be the foundation of Christianity, salvation and assurance." Notwithstanding all which sacred and sage testimony, this great doctrine has now come to be assailed and ignored by some of our own members, though yet in varying shades or degrees of unbelief compromise:—one professed minister, holding our name, even going so far as to assert that the missionaries, with the aid of the Bible, had done more towards the conversion of the heathen, than the light of Christ had done since the foundation of the world.

In view of these errors, and in view too of the apprehension of the leprosy spreading, and still more in view of the danger of rejecting or limiting some of the plainest testimonies of Holy Scripture, and especially any part of that holy mysterious union conveyed in the language, "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one," it is herewith proposed to make some selections from the writings of our early Friends, setting forth their clear, unequivocal, gospel views, respecting the great doctrine of the light of Christ in the heart of every man; designed, in infinite mercy and loving kindness, as the holy anointing received of Christ Jesus, which abideth in us, teacheth all things, and is man's infallible guide into all truth. Fox, Barclay, Penn and Penington, with their faithful fellow-helpers, being the expounders of Quakerism, and, moreover, those who suffered for its principles, must surely have known experimentally what it was; and thence have conveyed it in words that should not be gainsaid, nor need not be misunderstood.

George Fox writes: "The Lord God opened to me by his invisible power, how every man was enlightened by the divine light of Christ." I saw it shine through all, and that they that believed in it came out of condemnation to the light of life, and became the children of it; but they that hated it, and did not believe in it, were condemned by it, though they made a profession of Christ." Again, "I was sent to turn people from the darkness to the light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for to as many as should receive Him in his light, I saw He would give power to become the sons of God; which I had obtained by receiving Christ." "I saw Christ died for all men, was a propitiation for all, and enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light; and that none could be true believers, but those who believed therein." "When the Lord God and his Son Jesus Christ sent me forth into the world to preach his everlasting gospel and kingdom, I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward light, spirit and grace, by which all might know their salvation and their way to God; even that which would lead them into all truth, and which I infallibly knew could never deceive any." Again he says: "Every one of you hath a light from Christ; which lets you see you should not lie, nor do wrong to any, nor swear, nor curse, nor take God's name in vain, nor steal."

"The light is the light that shows you these evil deeds; which if you love, and come unto it, and follow it, it will lead you to Christ, who is the way to the Father," &c. G. F. "directed Oliver Cromwell to the light of Christ, who had enlightened every man that cometh into the world. He said, 'It was a natural light;' but I showed him the contrary; and manifested that it was divine and spiritual, proceeding from Christ; and that which was called the life in Christ the Word, was called the light in us." G. F. also declared, "If ever ye come to see Christ to your comfort, while ye oppose his light, then God hath not spoken by me." Again, "Christ died for all men, the ungodly as well as the godly, as the apostle bears witness, 2 Cor. v. 15, Rom. v. 6. And He enlightens every man;" &c.

"Therefore I exhorted all to believe in light, as Christ commands, and own the grace of His free teacher; and it would assuredly bring them salvation, for it is sufficient." About this time G. F. records, that "great assemblies of priests drew up a number of curses to be read in their several steeple-houses, that all the people should say, Amen to." The first of which was, "cursed be he that saith, every man hath a light within him sufficient to lead him to salvation; and let all the people say, Amen." To this G. F. answers, in short: "To believe in the light is to be grafted into Christ. And the light is sufficient to lead unto the day-star." A very wicked man challenged Friends to a dispute, affirming: "That some men never had the spirit of God, and that the true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, is natural." To this says G. F., "I affirmed and proved, that wicked men have the spirit of God, else how could they quench it, vex it, grieve it, and resist the Holy Ghost, like the stiff-necked Jews?" Another contending "That Christ had not enlightened every man that cometh into the world; and that the grace of God, that brought salvation, had not appeared unto all men; and that Christ had not appeared to all men." "I asked him," says G. F., "what sort of men those were which Christ had not enlightened? and whom his grace had not appeared to? and whom he had not died for?" He said, "Christ did not die for adulterers, and idolaters, and wicked men." "I asked him whether adulterers and wicked men were not sinners?" He said, "yes." "Did not Christ die for sinners?" said I. "Did He not come to call sinners to repentance?" "Yes," said he. "Then, said I, thou hast stopped thy own mouth." So I proved that the grace of God had appeared unto all men, though some turned from it into wantonness, and walked despitely against it; and that Christ had enlightened all men, though some hated the light."

Robert Barclay, as an exponent of the views of the Society, thus testifies:—"God, out of his infinite love, who delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but that all should live and be saved, hath so loved the world, that he hath given his only Son a light; who enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and maketh manifest all things that are reprobable; and this light enlighteneth the hearts of all in a day or a time, in order to salvation, if not resisted; nor is it less universal than the seed of sin, being the purchase of his death, who tasted death for every man; for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Again,

"From the scripture, 'That was the true light (Christ) which lighteth every man that cometh into the world,' it is plain there comes no man into the world, whom Christ hath not enlightened in some measure, and in whose dark heart this light doth not shine; though the darkness comprehend it not, yet it shineth there: and the nature thereof is to dispel the darkness, where men shut not their eyes upon it." This is confirmed and established by the experience of all men; seeing there never yet was a man found in any place of the earth, however barbarous and wild, but hath acknowledged that at some time or other, less or more, he hath found somewhat in his heart reproving him for some things evil which he hath done, threatening a certain horror if he continued in them; as also promising and communicating a certain peace and sweetness, as he has given over to it, and not resisted it." "Forasmuch as Christ is called that light that enlightens every man, the light of the world, therefore the light is taken for Christ who truly is the fountain of light, and hath his habitation in it forever. Thus the light of Christ is sometimes called Christ, i. e., that in which Christ is, and from which He is never separated." "It is because this light, seed, and grace that appears in the heart of man is so little regarded, and so much overlooked, that so few know Christ brought forth in them." "Glory to God forever! who hath chosen us as first fruits to himself in this day, wherein He is arisen to plead with the nations; and therefore hath He sent us forth to preach this everlasting gospel unto all, Christ nigh to all, the light in all, the seed sown in the hearts of all, that men may come and apply their minds to it."

William Penn is no less full and clear upon this great doctrine. He says: "Their (the Quakers) fundamental principle, which is at the corner stone of their fabric, and to speak minutely and properly, their characteristic, or main-distinguishing point or principle, is the light of Christ within, as God's gift for man's salvation. This, I say, is as the root of the goodly tree of doctrine, that grew and branched out from it." "For of light came sight; and of sight came sense and sorrow; and of sense and sorrow came amendment of life." "It is the light and life of Christ, which we profess and direct all people to, as the great instrument and agent of man's conversion to God. It was by this we were first touched, and effectually enlightened, as to our inward state," &c. "The light of Christ within, who is the light of the world, and so a light to you, that tells you the truth of your condition, leads all that take heed unto it out of darkness into God's marvellous light; for light grows upon the obedient. It is sown for the righteous, and their way is a shining light, that shines to more and more to the perfect day." "W, and what does this blessed light do for you? Why, 1. It sets all your sins in order before you; it detects the spirit of this world in its baits and allurements, and shows how it came to fall from God, and the fallen state is in. 2. It begets a sense and sorrow, such as believe in it, for that fearful lay. You will then see Him distinctly whom you have pierced, and all the blows and wounds you have given Him by your disobedience, and how you have made Him to serve you, your sins, and you will weep and mourn it, and your sorrow will be a godly sorrow."

Isaac Penington thus records his views concerning the light, wherewith Christ the enlighteneth every man: "The light which shineth in man, in his dark state, is of a lively nature; it is light which flows from life; light which hath life in it; it is the life of Lord Jesus Christ, of the Word eternal, who is the light of man." "It is one with Christ it is of his heavenly Spirit and nature makes way for Him, it leads to Him, it with Him, it brings into unity and fellows both with the Father and the Son, where peace which passeth understanding, and joy unspeakable and full of glory, about This is the gospel message, that God is light, and they that are gathered into and abide this light, they are gathered into, and abide in unity and fellowship, both with the Father and the Son." "He that knoweth the light of God's Spirit, knoweth Christ; and he that believeth in it, believeth in Him; and he that knoweth not, nor believeth therein, neither knoweth nor believeth in Christ." "Not less can lead unto eternal life than an eternal light in man's spirit, where the darkness which is to be discovered there, subdued that and to be led from."

Now, in conclusion, can any one believe that these wise Christian men and seers, who first reared the standard of Quakerism primitive Christianity revived—were all a mistaken with regard to the light of Christ, power of the Holy Ghost; which is recorded by the apostle among the "three that be record in heaven"—being one with the Father and the Word? Or have we not, through faithfulness, failed to attain like spiritual vision with them, according to our measure, in mysteries of the gospel and kingdom of Christ? Have we not too much overlooked turned from our ever-living and ever-present Teacher?—our high calling in Jesus, "the Mediator of the new covenant"—Christ "light of the world"—"Christ within the brightness of glory;" in other words, "the Spirit's truth," "the Comforter," "the anointed," "the day-spring from on high," "the grace of God," the true inward union and growth into all truth?

For "The Friend"

Religious Items, &c.

The Opium Trade.—S. L. Baldwin of Methodist Episcopal denomination says: "I was asked after twenty-three years experience in our Mission field in China, 'What the greatest obstacle to the progress of Christianity there?' I think I should be obliged to reply, 'The Opium Trade.' I do not count that idolatry itself is so much in the way our progress just now as this thing, for I go into any Chinese audience, and say the hardest things I choose against idolatry, and most always there will be men in the audience who will stand by my side, and who will say to their countrymen, 'Surely, it is a foolish thing for us to worship idols.' But when I am speaking of the morality of the Christian religion, it is very often the case that some will rise in the audience and say, 'Teacher, what you say is very true, and we believe in the doctrine that you are speaking, and Confucius taught us that doctrine many hundred years ago, but you are not the people who practise it. Where does all this opium come from? Have you never pushed open the doors of these opium dens all around your city and looked in and seen the haggard faces and the wasted forms of the victims of that traffic? Where does this opium come from? Was it not brought here by a Christian nation? Was not the traffic forced on us against our will? and did not our emperor in the treaty which legalized it, protesting before heaven that it was against his will, and that he did it only under compulsion? And when you come to us and preach to us that we ought not in any way to injure our fellow-men. Your doctrine is good, but your practice is not consistent with it.'

Disabilities in Sweden.—A bill to repeal the empowering ecclesiastical councils in Sweden to prohibit the preaching of dissenting ministers was carried through one Chamber of the Reichstag by a vote of 85 to 64, but rejected in the other by 54 to 25 votes. Dissenters can, therefore, still be imprisoned for preaching contrary to the prohibition.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Ivory Trade of the Future.—People talk as if the ivory of Africa were inexhaustible; thing could be more absurd. In my sojourn of fourteen months, during which I passed over an immense area of the Great Lakes region, I never once saw a single elephant. Twenty years ago they roamed over those countries unmolested, and now they have been almost utterly exterminated. Less than ten years ago Livingstone spoke about the abundance of elephants at the south end of Tanganyika—how they came about his camp, or entered the villages with impunity. Not one is now to be found. The ruthless work of destruction has gone on with frightful rapidity. There are few corners of Africa where they have not been harried out.

Each year the Arabs have to extend the area of their operations. Up to the present they have been able to resort to new districts, hitherto not molested, and thus the trade has been kept up to a certain pitch. A few such fresh areas now exist. The traders from East Africa have overrun the interior till they have met those from the Cape, the Zambesi, and Benguela. They have extended hands with those from Loanda and the Congo, and interchanged courtesies with traders from North Africa and the Nile region. In one great area can now be pointed out where the elephant can be said to roam undisturbed. The ivory trade has certainly reached its turning point.—J. Thomson.

California Pumpkins.—[The following statement is taken from the Santa Barbara Press. It is its probable accuracy is vouched for by a friend who has resided in that neighborhood lately, where the crop was raised, is about ten miles from Santa Barbara.—Ed.] There are some true stories that take upon themselves the tinge of extravagance, that tax our credulity considerably, yet nevertheless, the following pumpkin story is true, as can be attested by several notable parties. Philander Kellogg has nine pumpkins raised on his place this year, the aggregate weight of which is over a ton. He has opened one of the largest ones, simply taking out the seed and into the space thus occupied he put his daughter, a finely developed miss of eighteen years, and completely closed her in by putting the two halves together. I put into one half two boys, each eight years old, and completely closed them in with the other half. P. Kellogg put his three youngest children into the cavity and completely closed them in.—G. B. Taylor.

Power of the Waves.—The tremendous force of the ocean waves has been illustrated at Wick, on the extreme northern coast of Scotland, where a break-water has been building for some years past. It may give an idea of what is meant by wave power. It was found that stones of ten tons weight were as pebbles to the waves, which have been measured to be there fifty-two feet from crest to the bottom of the trough. The outer end of the break-water where the storms beat most violently, was built of three courses of one-hundred ton stones laid on the rubble foundation; next above these were three courses of large flat stones, and upon these a mass of concrete built on the spot, of cement and rubble. The end of the break-water was thought to be as immovable as the natural rock, yet the resident engineer saw it yield to the force of the waves and swing around into the less troubled water inside the pier. It gave way not in fragments, but in one mass, as if it were a monolith. The displaced mass is estimated to weigh about 1,850 tons.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 24, 1881.

In a letter received from a Friend living in a distant Yearly Meeting, the apprehension is expressed that there is danger of Friends following the custom of others in the observance of Christmas and the week that follows it; a period that is known as "the holidays."

The amount of money annually expended in presents at this time, is very great. The stock of one house alone, in this city, is believed to be valued at about a million of dollars. Many articles intended for children, have no other use than the temporary gratification they give. Others are positively injurious, as they are calculated to cultivate or encourage a taste for the grotesque and unreal, or the unpractical. While a large number of articles are so costly and at the same time of such little use, as to present an objection to their purchase for any purpose.

The example of George Fox is commended to our members, where he went about, "on the day that is called Christmas," visiting the sick and afflicted, and ministering to their necessities. Let us bear in mind how many worthy people there are whose hearts might be made glad by means of the money expended by many well-meaning, but inconsiderate persons. Substantial food, comfortable clothing, furniture or other needed comforts to their dwellings; and useful reading for their spiritual and mental benefit, would be a blessing to many whose outward means are restricted, and would yield to the giver a more solid satisfaction and comfort than if the money they require was expended in the purchase of many of the holiday presents which it is fashionable to give to relatives and friends.

The 52nd report of the Bible Association of Friends in America, read at the Annual meeting held on the 2nd of 11th month last, has been received. It states that the sale and distribution of the Scriptures through its agency during its past fiscal year, was 3122 volumes, of which 2178 were donated. Of these 104 Bibles and Testaments were sent to Indians residing principally in the State of New York.

A legacy of $2000 had been received from the late Elizabeth Wahn Wistar.

Respecting the Revised Version of the New Testament, it remarks:

"It is a cause of profound satisfaction to find that the exhaustive labors of twenty-seven men selected by a competent body as those peculiarly qualified for the work, after ten years of attention to the subject, have shown that no radical error of doctrine or practice has been taught by the old version of 1611."

The managers do not feel that the time has arrived for their Association to print an edition of the Revised Version, and therefore they propose to continue issuing the old one as heretofore.

The original object of the Association was to furnish the families of Friends, where needful, with copies of the Scriptures. This demand, the report thinks, has been pretty fully supplied; and now their books are distributed in other ways,—largely to schools and among the young.

We have received a copy of The Freedmen's Friend, issued in the eleventh month of the present year, containing an account of the educational labors of a "Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philadelphia" for the past year.

There appears to be a steady decrease in the number of schools supported by the association from year to year—there being the present winter (11th mo. 20th) but five. Last year the number was 14, and the year before 18. The association is now relieved from the work at Danville, Va., heretofore the most important centre of its operations. The school-board of that city have erected additional buildings for the education of the colored children, and have assumed the entire control and expense of the schools there.

Under these circumstances, it has not been thought needful to retain any one as superintendent of the work, which will effect a pecuniary saving, but a supervision of the different schools is expected to be exercised by members of the Executive Committee.

Though the increasing facilities for education in the Southern States is encouraging, and to some extent, relieving, yet the association appears to feel that there still remains a field of labor for it to occupy. Those disposed to assist in its benevolent operations can remit such amounts as they may be willing to contribute to its Treasurer, Richard Cadbury, at 409 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

We have received the first Annual Report of "The Friends' Institute for Young Men."

One of the leading objects of the Institute is to provide accommodations for "closer ac-on the 23rd of the 11th mo. 1881, in the year of her age, LYDIA S., wife of Henry W. Willborn member and elder of Upper Evesham Methodist Church, died. Josephine, her daughter, was attached to the friends and testimonies of our society, and was a good example of simplicity and militancy, which, with her affectionate and benevolent position, endeared her to a large circle of friends;

 to her family, over whom she was a watchful and dear caretaker. In her life she showed forth in an ever increasing measure the precious spirit of the last painful illness, which was the consoling balm of her life. His everlasting arm were round about and under-for her support, and that through redeeming mer-after her faithful labors in the church militant, she been permitted to join the Church Triumphant.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, TWELFTH MONTH 31, 1881.

NO. 21.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 154.)

While attending the meetings in the neighborhood of Muncy, I was afresh reminded of the great truth, that all true knowledge of God must come from Divine revelation, even from that Light which shines in the heart of man, and which comes from Christ, the uncreated and eternal Word, power and Spirit of God. This Light, and nothing short of it, can so convict us of our sinful state as to lead us to repentance, the forsaking of sin, and the experience of the remission of sins that are past, through the atoning efficacy of the offering on Calvary. As we pass through these experiences, we come to have a real sense of the truths of religion, and become really acquainted with God—we are born again of the incorruptible Seed and Word of God—we are washed, we are sanctified, we are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. This change will pass through before they can enter the kingdom of Heaven; which must be established in our hearts while in this state of existence, or we cannot be prepared for its enjoyment hereafter.

At Williamsport the Susquehanna river ends more to the westward (as we ascend towards its sources), and the Northern Central Railroad follows up the narrow valley of Wyoming Creek among the peaks of the Alleghenies. About 40 miles from Williamsport we came to Canton, where we left the cars, and where a public meeting with the inhabitants of this small town had been arranged.

Canton is the railroad station for Elkland friends, who live among the mountains about fifteen miles to the south-east. On one occasion our late friend Joseph Elkinton stopped here and engaged the owner of a lively stable to send him to Elklands. The man employed young boy named Wilson Scudder as driver, whom Joseph took an interest, and promised that if the boy would write him a letter, he would send him a book after his return home. Then Willy (as he was called) came back from his trip, he reported the conversation, and said he intended to write the letter. Some of his companions tried to dissuade him, telling him the Friend would never send the promised book. But Willy's faith was unshaken; he said he did not believe his new acquaintance was that kind of a man. The letter was written and the book received. Other letters followed, which I remember reading with interest years ago, during the lifetime of our friend.

Having some time at my disposal, while at Canton, I called on James and Mehetable Scudder, the parents of Wilson. During the late civil war, he joined the army, when only 16 years old, and died in the South at the age of 19, of a wound in the leg. When he left home, he requested his mother to write to his Philadelphia friend and tell him of his going away. She did so and received in reply a good letter, which she keeps among her treasures. She told me that J. Elkinton's letters "have been a very great comfort to me in days of sorrow. Many are the times that I have read them and found comfort in them."

A copy of this letter the mother sent to Willy. During the war she paid her son a visit, who told her that being out on picket duty, and a sudden movement being ordered, he had lost his baggage and with it his "Quaker letter," as he called it. He regretted this much, for he highly valued it, and had loaned it so much to his comrades in the ranks, that the paper on which it was written was almost worn out. It contained valuable religious counsel, and bore a clear testimony to the inconsistency of war with the precepts of our Saviour. What effect it had on the minds of the soldiers who read it, we shall probably never know; but it is an interesting circumstance, that such a writing should have been greatly appreciated and circulated among those whose employment it condemned.

With the permission of Mehetable Scudder I copied the letter, which is as follows:

"Philadelphia, 6th mo. 17th, 1862.

Respected friend, Mehetable B. Scudder.—Thy interesting letter of the 15th came to hand this morning, and was very acceptable; having frequently had you in remembrance since the cessation of our correspondence a few years ago, and I can truly say that the perusal of thine called forth my sympathetic feelings on thy account. I have children, and am not a stranger to the anxiety of a parent for the welfare of his or her offspring. I desire thou may be engaged to cherish day by day a righteous concern for the welfare of thy children, for I am a firm believer in the efficacy of the sincere and fervent prayers of the righteous, of which I have no doubt thou desires, (at times) to be. Although thou art personally unknown to me, thou need not have commenced thy letter with 'Forgive me for the intrusion,' for I do not consider it any, but on the contrary the effusion of the heart of a mother for the welfare of a separated child that induced thee to take thy pen to address me. I have felt much interested in Wilson since we met in Canton, and I greatly desire his preservation and welfare; may he be engaged daily (saith my spirit) to look unto his Heavenly Father for protection and preservation, who alone is able and will effectually to preserve all those who sincerely call upon Him for preservation from the snares of the evil one, who goes about seeking whom he may destroy; but thanks be unto God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, there is a power above the power of the enemy, that is not only able to preserve from all evil, all those who sincerely crave He may so do, but is very willing as they on their parts yield entire submission to his will concerning them, manifested in the secret of their hearts—and that thy son Wilson may be of the number who are thus wisely engaged to seek the Lord while He may be found and to call upon Him while He is near, is my sincere desire for him. May he be preserved from grieving the Holy Spirit, saith my soul, but on the contrary may be engaged to look unto his Heavenly Father and seek strength of Him to enable him faithfully to yield in every respect to the manifestations of his holy will, which will require on Wilson's part a willingness to take up the cross to his own will whenever it comes in conflict with the Divine will, that wilth our preservation from all evil. It is very pleasant to me to be informed that Wilson has been a kind and affectionate son to his mother, the recollection thereof; I have no doubt will afford him satisfaction. I regret that his sister did not find out our residence when in the city last fall, for I think it would have been pleasant to me to have met with my unknown (to me) correspondent, and if she should again come to the city, thou can tell her we live at No. 753 South Second St., between German and Catharine Streets, upon the east side of the way. I think of sending thee out one or two volumes treating on the subject of war, for thy perusal, and to make what disposition thou mayest think best of in regard to them.

Thou art probably aware that our Society have a testimony against war, and believe the taking of life is contrary to the injunction of our Saviour when personally upon earth, who said in his memorable Sermon upon the Mount, 'Ye have heard that it hath been said, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also.' And again, 'Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy; But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in Heaven; for He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? and if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect even as your Father which is in Heaven is perfect." The foregoing I think are the words of our blessed Redeemer, delivered when personally upon earth, and no doubt they were given for our observance. We cannot attain to the state He spoke of in our own strength, but blessed forever be his holy name, He is able and willing to abilitate his dedicated children, to perform all that He may be pleased to require at their hands, if they on their part are willing to be as clay in the hands of the Potter, to be formed and fashioned as He wills. And that it may be thy and my own concern to be thus engaged is the desire of my heart at this time.

With desires for thy welfare,

I remain thy friend,

JOSEPH ELKINTON."

J. W.

(To be continued.)

From the "Fall Mail Gazette."

Egg-Gathering on the English Coast.

In a ramble along the coast we came upon a nest belonging to the stone-crow, which contained two eggs of a very pale brown color, just flecked unevenly with a deeper shade of brown; the nest itself being a hole scooped out of the ground. "Don't take those eggs," said Joe, "they will not be any use to you; for they have been sat upon, and are very likely set. I have two I can give you. You see these are close together now; when they are just laid they are quite a foot apart, and are drawn close when the bird begins to sit. You can always tell by that." So we left them and proceeded on our way. The stone-crow is much more of a plover than a curlew—to which bird, indeed, he is no relation at all; and he is supposed to be called after his note, which certainly sounds like "cur-loo-oo" very much drawn out. But he has a variety of names, one of which is "thick-knee," from the abnormal size of his knee-joints. The bird lays on the beach sometimes, but generally on the edge of the plots of green that are all about the shingle. Presently we came to a deep dip in the shingle, and to our great astonishment saw close to us two calm inland lakes, deeply bordered with quantities of vegetation, white cotton rushes and iris and several stunted willows being most prominent round them; and then suddenly from their midst rose a cloud of small black-headed gulls, that flew up together, then flew back, then off once more, finally settling down in a long line, like soldiers at attention, along the ridge of shingle, watching our movements cautiously. The ponds, called "pits" locally, are popularly supposed to be bottomless; and we were assured by every one that this is indeed the case. The water is quite still, and scarcely undulates at all, and is the constant resort in winter of all sorts of wild fowl; but in the spring and early summer it is entirely occupied by the black-headed gulls; and round the edges of the pits the nests are laid, close together on the sedges and rushes, that are just thick enough to bear them up out of the water. Sometimes egg-gatherers place planks from the shore on the yielding morass that surrounds the ponds, and with a bag at their backs proceed to fill it from the nests, that are only reached in this manner, or from a canoe; but as these ponds are luckily preserved, this has been in a great measure put a stop to, and the birds are almost un molested.

On the seaward side of the pits the morass is narrower and the vegetation much less thick, and we could easily see the birds seated close together, their heads just raised, looking out of the reeds and rushes. The nests themselves look just like a tuft of dried grass resting on the water, and are laid all along the land side of the pond; none of the birds appearing to build the other side, where they are not protected by the marshy edge and the closely growing rushes. The pits are fresh water, and have tiny creeks running up into the shingle, where the brown water sparkles among little stones. But if these nests can be protected from the human egg-stealer by rules and laws, the black-headed gulls have to look out and defend themselves against enemies of their own kind, one of which—a great grey gull—took advantage of our presence having disturbed the birds to pounce down on an unoccupied nest, where he proceeded to forage for himself. He was, however, soon discovered, and before he could destroy another egg the black-headed gulls all rose, flew savagely at him, and never rested until they had driven him away, screaming loudly and protesting vigorously against the onslaught; after which the little gulls returned, and while some went back to their nests the others swam on the ponds, where presently they remained quite quietly—just rocking themselves up and down a little, as if they wished to keep themselves afloat—their black heads, and the black tips to their tails, showing most distinctly out of their grey bodies and the grey water. About these pits is often seen the common red godwit, who comes very early in the spring, yet has at present not been found to lay here. And often, too, in the palmy days of long ago, when every one did not own a gun or proceed to murder every rare bird, as is done at present, have the wonderful avocets been seen here—they used to be called "cobblers' awls," from the curious shape of the bill—but now they are seldom met with, although in 1876 a pair was constantly noticed in the winter feeding on the edge of the water, occasionally wading in and bowing up and down in their peculiar manner; which said bowing is caused by the habit they have of being constantly on the watch for intruders; for though sociable among their own kind they are of a suspicious nature, and are always looking out for surprises; perhaps they have developed this habit from the ruthless manner in which they have been pursued and shot at whenever they have put in an appearance. Here, too, in the late spring come thick flocks of the ox birds, but they, too, are not known to breed here; they keep close together, and come in such numbers that sometimes thirty of them have fallen at one shot from a shoulder gun.

Occasionally an oyster-catcher's nest has been found near the pits, but, as we said before, the black-headed gulls seem to keep them all to themselves in the breeding season, yet in the winter curious birds have been seen here—the white spoonbill, with the wide, spoonlike bill from which he takes his name, and which he rattles noisily when disturbed or frightened, the pelican, the stork, and the buzzard, having been either seen to pitch about the flats or grass spots in the shingle, or round the little creeks that are to the right of the town. These birds have all evidently been blown across by the strong wind, and are generally most exhausted when perceived, sometimes scarcely being able to get out of the way of their pursuers. In 9th n there is a great deal of partridge shoot about the bushes; and often when so engaged the sportsmen disturb short-eared owls, that fly heavily out into the sunshy blinking and winking and tumbling stupid away inland, to return once more at night when all is quiet. The ruff and reeve were to breed constantly in the marshes, but they were so extremely good to eat that they are almost extinct, though even now at times they are to be seen feeding near the pits, but their nests are no more known; neither are they seen at all, except in the very ear spring, after which they disappear mysteriously, doubtless to some place even more unknown to man than are these bottom ponds. The sews drain here from the marshes into the sea, and down their sides cut the young herons, that also fall victims to the gunner, who is always on the look-out for them, before they have time to become "fishy," for then they make excellent prides, and are eagerly shot; and here, too, are constantly seen kingfishers flitting hither and thither, and occasionally alighting close enough to human beings to be closely served. On one occasion a gunner was in pursuit of a little boat lying down among the rushes in the pits with his oar stuck straight up; he was doing nothing and was quite still; a kingfisher was flitting to and fro, presently he alighted on the oar, and appeared to be meditating profoundly; the like a flash of lightning, he darted head first into the water, bringing up a tiny fish in his beak. He alighted again on the oar, and deliberately dashed out the fish's brains on to the beach. He then swallowed the fish, resumed his meditative attitude, gazing into the quiet water, then in a moment he was down again, returning once more with a fish, which he served exactly as he had served the first, and he repeated four times, after which he seemed satisfied, sat for a little time quietly on the oar preening his feathers, then he darted away and was seen no more. A most interesting and wonderful insight into the marvelous code of manners and ways possessed by wild birds is to be obtained in this lone spot; and you can lie for hours behind any of the little tufts of green, and by the aid of glasses watch the birds at home and note their individualities and extraordinary differences of character for yourselves, as they see few people in the breeding season except the Coastguards, who seem to interfere very little with the birds, and an occasional emissary from Lloyd's sent down to see about the wrecks that are constantly cast up on the iron coast. But "as there must be wrecks," said an old inhabitant, "why should they not be here?"—a line of argument we were hardly prepared for; but the nature of the coast certainly keeps off intruders, and preserves the shingle almost entirely for the birds. Even in the early summer, under bright sky, and with the tall fox-gloves and sweet-scented roses springing out of the stones, the shingle has a most dreary appearance; and what then must it be like when the sea comes roaring in, and the snowdrift and the powerful wind rises until the one or two cottages are almost blown straight away land? Indeed, once or twice the cottages were being obliged to be pulled down, and placed farther away from the sea. The inhabitants shake their heads when questioned about this aspect of the shingle, and only remark that perhaps it is a trifle cold; but the birds are always there, and there is always something or other to look at.

For "The Friend."

The Excessive Struggle for Wealth.

Was there ever a period when the immoderate struggle for wealth in this country was so great as it is at present? or when it was so imperative to give close heed to the warning words of the Apostle: "They that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which draw men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil." This opens out the sad effects which such a course of action has upon the ensnared and enslaved themselves, and what can calculate the sum of worldliness and spiritual dwarfishness which these exert on their families, if such they have, and on all who come within the sweeping tidal wave of their influence? The loudest or most effective preaching is, perhaps, that of a life and conversation. Hence, where those around us, the young particularly, see strenuous efforts early and late, eager and fervent, that are put forth to accumulate wealth, and this not because of need, not to help others, and last of all, not to manifest by precept and example how to enjoy the fruits of labor in a Christian, or even rational manner, but to excel and make a show, may not these, yea, will they not be strongly tempted, not beguiled into the same current of pursuit after worldly gain and grandeur which we example around them is so calculated to excite, to foster, and to intensify? This is a hint of too great importance to be at all overlooked; inasmuch as, perhaps, there is one talent for which we shall have more largely to account, than for that of our rapidly-operating influence over those about us.

Then, if the mind and heart, the time and talents, are swallowed up in the pursuit of greed for wealth, too unmindful of our Divine Lawgiver's injunction, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness;" with the after-promise, all things needful shall be added; what must be the fearful accountability that we shall have to render to a God of knowledge, who searcheth the reins and the thoughts, when no less true is what is written: "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also?"

We may be esteemed by our fellow men to live amiable and moral lives; may be benevolent and generous; and may aim to keep pace with others in the legal standard of right; and thence float smoothly and easily upon the tide of time: but what better than this than living to ourselves, without deference to the unspeakable gift of the Holy Spirit—our guide into all truth—being a part of the rich blessings derived through a vicarious sufferings and a Redeemer's blood? precedent to which great epoch, the Apostle to the Athenians declared: "The times of our ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent," and wherein, also, is the difference between Moab and Moab? who was thus judged for lying down at ease, in carnal security; and in trusting in his works and in his treasures: "Moab hath been at ease from his youth, and he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity: therefore his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed." "The unmortified Christian and the heathen," writes William Penn, "are of the same religion."

It is noteworthy that in the examples which our Lord has given of those who were destroyed in the days of Noah and of Lot, they were all for moral, and for the most part, necessary duties; though no doubt carried to an unlawful or too excessive and absorbing extent; even to a forgetfulness of God. Thus in the first case the record is: "They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all." In the second: "They did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all." Underlying these—the too great love for, and devotion to, lawful things—there were no doubt more flagrant sins and abominable iniquities, such as together to fill up the cup of their transgressions, and to cause their overthrow and destruction. Nevertheless, He who looketh on the heart and judgeth by its estrangement from Him, can, and no doubt will, bring into judgment for idolatry, whether that idolatry consist in giving the heart too fondly and exclusively to the lawful things of earth, or to those which men account more corrupting, as more likely to obscure the beams of the Sun of righteousness, and to call down the displeasure of heaven.

Never, perhaps, was the exhortation more needed: "Trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy." Where this trust becomes the predominating feeling of the heart; or where the desire is uppermost to use this world as not abusing it, knowing that the fashion thereof passeth away, how careful it tends to make us in seeking to avoid the very appearance of evil! How diligent to ask counsel and wisdom of Him who seeth the end from the beginning, in whose hand our breath is, whose are the cattle upon a thousand hills, and who at his pleasure can bless the little or blast the great deal! By such a course the dreadful denunciation against the rich man, and those like him, in the parable of our Lord, "So is he who layeth up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God," would be avoided. Hereby, likewise, the blessing promised to such as hear the sayings of Christ and do them, would be forthcoming. The betrayal of trusts, now so painfully restrain for wealth, with the cherished distinction which it gives, would cease. The emulation and envy excited in the breasts of the poorer classes, would no longer have place. And above all, the great risk of souls, the forfeit of the future inheritance beyond the humble hope, that having endeavored, with the measure of grace received, to serve our generation according to the will of God, He will accept us, all unworthy as we are, for his dear Son's sake, who loved us and gave himself for us.

The following allegorical, but admonitory caution from the pen of a ready and pious writer, is commended to the careful attention of all who are in danger of being drawn aside by this lurking evil, or engulfed in the great love and struggle for wealth now so prevalent, and which, when it is given way to, seems to drown out well-nigh everything but the insensate worship of Mammon, causing forgetfulness of the holy precept: "Bodily exercise profiteth little; but godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."—"Among the chief attractions of the things below, were certain little lumps of yellow clay, on which almost every eye and every heart were fixed. When I saw the variety of uses to which this clay could be converted, and the respect which was shown to those who could scrape together the greatest number of pieces, I did not much wonder at the general desire to pick up some of them; but when I beheld the anxiety, the wakefulness, the competitions, the contrivances, the tricks, the frauds, the scuffling, the pushing, the tumbling, the kicking, the shoving, the cheating, the circumvention, the envy, the malignity, which was excited by the desire to get this article; when I saw the general scramble among those who had little, to get much, and of those who had much to get more, then I could not help applying to those people a proverb in use among us, that gold may be bought too dear."

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

VISIT OF SAMUEL COPE.

In the progress of a religious visit within the compass of Bucks Quarter, performed by our dear friend Samuel Cope, late in the year 1842, he attended Quarterly Meeting held at Falls, and the regular meeting for worship held at the same place on the First-day following. The following memorandum of his public services was preserved by a member of Falls Meeting.

Our friend Samuel Cope arose and handed forth a lengthy and instructive testimony. "I know Abraham, that he will command his children and his household after him;" and an evidence of his faithfulness was, that he was called the friend of God. When judgment was pronounced against that wicked city, Sodom, his prayers availed much with the Lord. When he supplicated for the preservation of the city provided fifty righteous were found therein, his supplication was granted; and his further intercessions were availing, until the number was reduced to ten; the Lord promising, that if ten righteous were found in the city he would not destroy it for ten's sake. But the Lord, willing to deliver the few righteous from the impending calamity, sent his angels to Lot, directing him and his household to flee from the city, and cautioning them not to look back. But Lot's wife, disobeying the injunction, looked back and became a pillar of salt—a monument of her own folly, and a warning to the disobedient; thus holding up to view the reward of faithfulness, the efficacy of the prayers of the faithful, the deliverance of the righteous, and the forbearance toward the wicked for the righteous sake, the final punishment of the wicked, and the fate of those who have been delivered and look back: presenting an instructive lesson to us as a Society and as individuals, that the Lord is willing to spare our Society for the sake of the faithful.

But those who have been delivered out of spiritual Sodom, should beware of looking back. Our worthy predecessors and forefathers in the truth were led out of the ceremonious worship in the outer court; and how necessary for us to be careful and maintain the watch, that we go not back to what our early Friends in the light of the Lord were held out of. George Fox exhorted them to hold out their meetings in the power of God; and they were weaned from a dependence upon man, and enabled to worship the Father in Spirit and in truth. How different this from the ceremonious worshippers in the outer court, who think if they have no minister they can have no worship—looking unto man as their teacher rather than unto Him who can teach his people himself, immediately or instrumentally.

The interesting parable of the ten virgins was also impressively brought to view; how important it is for us to have oil in our vessels, that when the midnight cry is heard, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet him," we may arise and trim our lamps, and be ready to enter with him into the guest chamber, before the door is shut; that our situation may not be comparable to the foolish virgins who had no oil in their vessels when the midnight cry was heard, and the bridegroom came; but after they went to buy and came saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us, a voice was heard from within, saying, "Verily I say unto you, I know you not."

The Lord's visitation to man was compared to a day of twelve hours, in which he has ability to work out his soul's salvation; and if he does not work while it is day, the night cometh when no man can work.

Much encouragement was given to the sincere seekers after righteousness, and warning to the backsliding and rebellious. It was an instructive season, and I trust that many hearts were thankful for the favor.

In the meeting for discipline, the deficiencies amongst us, as exhibited by the answers to the queries, were pertinently spoken to by this dear friend. The neglect of the attendance of our week-day meetings seemed to be a cause of much concern to him, intimating that the neglect of this great duty paves the way for other weaknesses to enter; and if we neglect our meetings on other days of the week, it is not likely we can bring an acceptable offering on First-day.

Demas has forsaken me, having loved this present world. He was not charged with any immoral conduct, but he loved the world; and it is to be feared that there are too many of us in this day, who, Demas-like, are preferring the things of the world to the following of Christ. He cautioned us to beware of little neglects of duty, for it is the little foxes that spoil the tender vine; and exhorted us to improve our talents in the time given, for the Lord will require an increase thereof according to what He has committed to our care.

Sleeping in meeting was also held up to view as an offence to those not of our Society; causing the way of truth to be lightly spoken of, and the feet of honest inquirers to stumble. And it is a grief to well-concerned Friends.

(To be continued.)

ANOTHER YEAR.

Another year is dawning!
Dear Master, let it be
In working or in waiting,
Another year with thee.

Another year of leaning
Upon thy loving breast,
Of ever-deepening trustfulness,
Of quiet, happy rest.

Another year of mercies,
Of faithfulness and grace;
Another year of gladness
In the shining of thy face.

Another year of progress,
Another year of praise;
Another year of proving
Thy presence "all the days."

Another year of service,
Of witness for thy love;
Another year of training
For holier work above.

Another year is dawning!
Dear Master, let it be
On earth, or else in heaven,
Another year for thee!
Frances Ridley Havergal.

A NEW YEAR'S EVE VISION.

I was sitting alone in the twilight,
The work of the day was done,
And the sombre evening shadows
Were gathering one by one.

The wind in the tall pine tree-tops
Was chanting a requiem drear,
For the old year was slowly dying,
The old, that had been so dear.

Within, on ceiling and casement,
The firelight's crimson glow
Was making its weird reflections
Dance merrily to and fro.

As I gazed in the glowing embers,
My thoughts went back to the past,
And a throng of vivid memories
Came burying thick and fast.

I thought of the joy and sorrow,
Of the pleasure and the pain,
Locked in the old year's casket,
Never to come again.

And, as the silent procession
Glided through memory's hall,
The ghosts of wrong and idle deeds
Were sadder and sterner than all.

My life was a pitiful failure,
A wretched blunder at best,
And where I had been most earnest
Seemed but a mocking jest.

When the year in its new-born beauty
Was singing its opening song,
I said: "I will serve the Master
Who has led me the way along."

"I will follow his blessed teaching,
And will lay at his dear feet,
The gift that I count most precious,
The hope that I count most sweet."

But now how poor and worthless
Looked the little I had done;
How many the hapless failures,
How few the victories won!

I had turned from the Master's teaching,
I had made me paths of my own,
And, instead of leaning on my Guide,
I had tried to walk alone.

And I cried in bitter anguish:
"It is only a hopeless thing;
I can not serve the Master,
And I have no gifts to bring."

The glowing embers had faded,
And darkness, chill and gloom,
Were falling on my heavy heart,
As they gathered in the room.

Selected.

When I was aware of a presence,
All-glorious to behold,
With a glistening robe of whiteness,
And a gleaming crown of gold.

Speechless in raptured wonder
I gazed upon his face;
Bewildered by the wondrous light,
And by such heavenly grace.

"Fear not," the angel uttered,
In accents low and sweet,
"I have come from the land immortal,
From the gracious mercy-seat."

"With a message from the Master,
Whose tender, pitying eye
Hath seen the fabric of thy life,
Hath heard thy sad heart's cry."

"He bids thee take up the warp and woof,
And straighten the tangled skein,
And begin with the birth of this new year,
To serve thy King again."

"Forget those things that are behind,
And reach toward the things before,
Press toward the mark for the heavenly prize
Of Him whom the saints adore."

Knelling there in the moonlight,
My soul went out in a song,
To the tender patient Master
Who had led me the way along.

Again I said: "I will serve Him,
And will lay at his dear feet,
The gift that is noblest and purest,
The hope that I count most sweet."

—Selected.

Old Aunt Sally.

A writer in the Chicago Standard describes a visit paid to an old colored woman in poor-house at Columbia, S. C.

"As it was 'visitor's day,' the outside soundings were passably clean. On entering, however, I was obliged to call to my aid every particle of will-power that I possessed in order to endure the sight of the complete wretchedness of the place. The walls were grained with smoke and dirt. Not a vestige of effort was to be seen. Two poor old women, one of them blind, sat crouching over a dyer's fire, while on a miserably dirty bed lay Aunt Sally, about ninety years old, perfectly blind and helpless, shrivelled and shrunken, a body tortured with intense pain, she had been there for years, looking longingly 'for home just over the way.'

Can there be such a thing as beauty at such wretchedness? Yes, out of the depths of that hopeless suffering and poverty, in radiance of Aunt Sally's poor old black face shone the beauty of the Lord.

I went to see her with the dim idea that might, perhaps, be able to afford her a little comfort in her affliction, but I soon found from the heights in which she dwelt, that had already appropriated all the comfort the Lord had to give to such as she, so that poor attempts seemed quite out of place. said, however, 'I am very sorry to see you suffering so much, Aunt Sally, and wish I could help you.'

"Oh, la, Missus, don't you feel sorry. Lord is mighty good to dis poor creature."

"But you are helpless and blind, Aunt Sally. 'No, no, not blind. I see Jesus, I do want to see the way you sees.'

"Not want to see with your eyes?" said quite surprised.

"No, Missus, for if the Lord wanted me see, he'd make me blind. De Lord I blessed me with a long head of 'flection."

"Blessed you with affliction?" I said.

'Yes, Missus, blessed me, or He would not give it to me. All He does is a blessing. De will of de Lord must be done. You're so good a me, but la, you can't help yourself; it's de spirit of de Lord. It works just like medicine, 'pears like to me it comes jes like a peach on an apple on a waiter.'

'Are you not lonely? feeling that I must say something.'

'Oh no, not lonesome, Missus, I done got plenty of company—plenty o' company at idnight. I'se no time to get lonesome.'

'You live so near to the Lord, then, that de devil never comes to trouble you. Does a, aunty?'

'Oh, la now, he done tries to get in here every chance he can get.'

'But you have lairn on this bed all these years, Aunt Sally; how can you stay so cheerfully?'

'Oh,' said she, 'I don't want to hear tell of years—if Jesus says "stay," I stay. When Jesus says "come," all de world can't stop me, I'll want to set de time; but He'll come, de'll come!'

Thus her simple faith in Christ took hold of everything. We could say nothing. He must say it all.

Address to the Members of Brighthouse Monthly Meeting.

(Concluded from page 157.)

Mission Meetings, &c.—Then again, there be the practices of holding what are called Friends' Mission Meetings, Prayer Meetings, and the singing of hymns. They are falsely called Friends' Mission Meetings, for no true Friend could take part in them.

Some time ago, a series of General Meetings as held in Leeds, similar to those held in America, at which it was pretended many were converted; but I fail to see the real fruits. I attended one of these meetings, at which several of our leading members were present. One of the leaders, after a hymn had been read from the Bible and then from another book, and addressed the people, using such expressions as this: "If any one is not saved, come just now; none need go away unsaved," naming the numbers saved—so called on a previous night. Prayer was then called for by the same individual saying, "Let pray," and a recorded minister accepted the invitation to do so. An overseer said they were just the sort of meetings George Fox could sanction. But to show that this statement is false let us compare what George Fox says—

"The next day we came into Cumberland again, there was a General Meeting of thousands of people. A glorious and heavenly meeting it was; the glory of the Lord did shine over all. They were fixed on Christ their teacher, and they were to sit down under their own vine; inasmuch at Francis Howgill, coming afterwards to visit us, found that they had no need of words, for they were sitting under their teacher Christ Jesus; the sense whereof he sat down amongst them, thout speaking anything."—Fox's Journal, Vol. 1, 241.)

We read how careful they were not to "give any to the least fleshly notions of the mind." William Dewsbury, (who lived, at one time so far from where the Modern General Meetings were held,) writes,—

"Meet often together in the name and fear of the living God; and take heed of words. See that the fitness speaks, which will cut down your own will, and minister to the witness in others, to the slaying of their wills."—(Wm. Dewsbury, p. 122.)

Many precious prophetic meetings were held, which were attended by thousands; and at some of these meetings, James Parnell, a lad of seventeen, was present and bore a noble testimony to the truth; at which many were convinced. But in none of these meetings, is mention made of any having been saved "just then." And no mention is made of singing in time and metre; but on the contrary they "denied singing in time and metre and poetry that is the invention of the brain."

George Fox says,—

"I was moved to cry out against all sorts of music, for they burdened the pure life."

Many of the hymns that are sung by professed Friends are such as all true Friends have denied, they being such as cause people to tell lies in the sight of God, inasmuch as they sing words which do not answer to their conditions.

Unsound Doctrines.—I feel it right to remind you also of the unsound doctrines that are held by many amongst us, even by those recorded as ministers. One of these errors is a denial of the inward appearance of the Light of Christ with the saving power thereof. Another error is the assertion that conversion is instantaneous, quoting the words "Now is the day of salvation," and saying "None need go away unsaved, only believe." Now, this language, "To-day," &c., does not refer to a salvation of a day of twenty-four hours, but unto the day of a man's visitation, and it is a dangerous and hurtful thing to persuade a sinner that he can be saved when he will, or if he pleases.

Then again we hear much concerning a mere belief in the sufferings and death of Christ, and that when we believe these things we are converted. Also much about the blood being the only means of salvation; with little or no allusion to the essential part of salvation, that being lost sight of. Indeed many amongst us have experienced as little of, and believe as little in, the work of the Holy Spirit as the great bulk of other professors.

Another error which has crept in amongst us is calling the Bible the Word of God; also calling the books, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, the Gospel; both of which terms, when so applied, are unsound.

The Light of Christ Saving.—Now to deny the Light of Christ in man, and its saving and cleansing power, is to deny the very foundation of Christianity; for except we take heed to, and are led by this Light, we can never have a right knowledge or belief in Christ's death, sufferings, and resurrection; and unless this Light or Power work in us we can never be truly converted. Those who hold contrary views to these, as laid down by Fox, Barclay, and Penn, and a host of others, are not Quakers, for—

"They [Friends] deny the teachers who tell the people that Christ hath not enlightened every one that cometh into the world, and that say God hath not given every one a measure according to his ability . . . And such teachers as tell people that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John is the Gospel, which are but the letter . . . The letter is but a declaration of the Gospel, and many have the letter, but not Christ; but we, having received the Gospel, know them to be no ministers of it, therefore we deny them."—(From a Paper sent forth by the people in scorn called Quakers.)

George Fox says,—

"I was glad that I was commanded to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit and Grace by which all might know their salvation and their way to God; even that divine Spirit which would lead them into all truth, and which I infallibly knew would never deceive any."—Fox's Journal, Vol. 1, p. 113.)

Another Friend says,—

"That very light which before reprov'd, convinced, judg'd and condemn'd in all for unbelief and unrighteousness both in heart and life, is still the same which doth convert, confirm, cleanse, justify, and save. . . . And, (mark the words,) it is no less than Blasphemy to say the Light of Christ is insufficient, and not able to save all that come to God thereby."—(Jas. Jackson, p. 23.)

This light is not a natural light, but a divine seed sown in the heart of man; and is the gift of God for man's salvation. Let none charge me with Hieksism, as some true Friends have been, for we do all own that same Jesus whose body was crucified at Jerusalem, and who rose again for our justification.

Again, it is a false doctrine to teach that we are justified by Christ's blood as soon as we believe, and before we are sanctified. And the doctrines of imputed righteousness; that a literal belief in the history of Christ's death and sufferings, is conversion; and that justification first occurs, and then sanctification, are not Quaker doctrines, though taught among us as the truth.

Robert Barclay, that worthy champion of the Truth, says,—

"And therefore Christ lives always making intercession during every man's day of visitation, that they may be converted; and when men are in some measure converted, He makes intercession that they may continue and go on, and not faint nor go back again."—Apology, p. 203.

These doctrines have been proved again and again by many writers to agree with the Scriptures.

Now the practices and unsound views of many amongst us are quite contrary to and inconsistent with the Truth, and the principles thereof; and in unison with John Barclay,—

"I long that those who cannot see with us, would honestly go their ways from us, and we should be the stronger, purer people, and take more root downwards."—(J. Barclay's Letters.)

Many amongst us have broken our bond of unity. "For we are gathered," says Robert Barclay, "into the belief of certain principles and doctrines."—(Anarchy of the Runters, p. 33.) And on these do the terms of membership in the true Society exist when in the true life and power of God. Again he says,—

"If any one or more so engaged with us should arise to teach any other doctrine or doctrines contrary to these, which were the ground of our being one . . . Such cut themselves off from being members by dissolving the very bond, by which they were (or ought to have been) linked to the body."—(P. 34.)

Some say, "Oh, we don't follow George Fox, but Christ;" but if they did so, they would come into unity with George Fox, and with all the children of God in all ages of the world. Others say, "We must not judge, but let all work together."

"Now," says Robert Barclay, "were such a principle to be received and believed, that in the Church of Christ, no man should be separated from, no man condemned or excluded the fellowship and communion of the body, for his judgment and opinion in matters of faith, then what blasphemies so horrid, what heresies so damnable, what doctrine of devils might harbor itself in the Church of Christ! What need then of sound doctrine if no doctrine make unsound!"—P. 35.)

As to judging, George Fox says,—

"Yea, the least member of the Church of Christ, hath power to judge of such things, having the one true measure and the true weight to weigh things and measure things withal, without respect of persons."—(Journal, Vol. 2, p. 281.)

We may take it for granted that our Society will never prosper in the true life of religion until we become a purer people and more in unity with each other, and faithful towards God. The evil things now come upon us were clearly seen, and a warning went forth from such Friends as Thomas Shillitoe, John Barclay, Ann and George Jones and Sarah L. Grubb. The last named of whom in 1820, after alluding to the various good-looking schemes which had been set afloat amongst us, said,—

"That we should be so taken up with them, and be so mingled with the world in them for want of keeping close to the leadings and restraints of the Spirit of Christ revealed within as to get mingled with the world's spirit, and by little and little almost imperceptibly should lose our zeal and uprightness in the testimony of the truth; and should begin to think there was no good in this or the other query until by degrees our discipline, once so excellently set up amongst us, would utterly fall to the ground, and we should become mingled with the spirit thereof, and become like the other various professors of the world."—(L. A. Bareilly's Letters, p. 435.)

And these sayings have been literally fulfilled amongst us; for some members of this Monthly Meeting have said 'There is no good in those old stereotyped queries.' For a full and clear description of departure in doctrine, &c., see an "Exposition on behalf of the Truth," by Daniel Pickard, wherein the ancient and modern forms of Discipline are examined and compared, and the declensions pointed out.

The faithful mourn over this sad state of things amongst us; though comforted in the belief that the Truth will not be permitted to fall to the ground. That mourner in Israel, S. L. Grubb, writes,—

"Friends! there will be a little living suffering remnant preserved to support it, [the Truth], and after they have suffered awhile, there will be a docking to the standard."—(S. L. Grubb's Letters, p. 364-388.)

And as another mourner in Israel said, "We want some plough-boy preachers again," which will be so; and a reformation will come. May Paisley says,—

"The instruments thereof must differ in their trials from the sons of the former morning, and will find them to be of a more severe and piercing kind. There was from the world and such as they might justly expect [persecution] beforehand, not exempt from false brethren; ours will chiefly arise from those under the same profession, clothed with the disguised spirit of the world, and that amongst some of the foremost (so-called) in the Society."—(P. 364.)

This paper is sent forth to clear myself of a burden that has long rested on my mind; with the desire that those who have lately joined this people may not be deceived. Let us not measure ourselves by others; nor take up a false rest short of the true rest in Christ. William Dewsbury says,—

"God is alone the teacher of his people! He hath given to every one a measure of his Grace, which is the Light that comes from Christ. It checks and reproves for sin. All who wait in that light come to know the only true God and Father in Christ Jesus, who is the way to Him. This I witness to all the sons of men: that I came not to the knowledge of Eternal Life by the letter of the Scriptures, nor by hearing men speak of the name of God, I came to the knowledge of Scripture and to the eternal rest in Christ, of which they testify, by the inspiration of the Spirit of Jesus, the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, who alone is found worthy to open the seals of the Book."—(Wm. Dewsbury's Works.)

These things are not mystical to the true babe in Christ, so let us not be deceived, nor look to lo heres! and lo theres! amongst this people.

All who are seeking and longing for the True Rest in Christ, must find it within themselves. They must turn the mind inward and away from all outward things; yea to that which alone can lead to, and which can give true rest and peace. That we may all come to this is the desire of my heart both for myself and you,—not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect.

WILLIAM LAND.

7th mo. 1881.

Too Late to do Good.

Annie A. Preston, in The Illustrated Christian Weekly, relates an interesting circumstance in connection with the death of a kind-hearted but gay and worldly woman of wealth who lived in a suburban district. To the simple country folk, who, while realizing from her bounty good returns for their products, yet regretted her apparently entire indifference to her soul's interests, she would say: "I am a butterfly; let me flit where the flowers are brightest. I cannot be thinking of another world; there will be time enough for that when I find I must go there. As for Sunday, I must make that a pleasant day for my friends. Some of them are so pressed by business cares that they cannot visit me at any other time. I must make the day bright for them. They are not used to church-going, and your little sanctuary would be filled with fog and mould and cobwebs for them."

One day, however, she was thrown from her carriage, and was so badly injured that it was told her she must die. She saw her mistake now, and so great was her self-condemnation, and so sincere seemed her contrition and repentance, that it was believed she had, through great mercy, received pardon and acceptance from her Lord, even at the eleventh hour.

In accordance with her dying request, her funeral was held in the little meeting-house to which she had seldom gone while in life. Many of her friends came out to the burial. The old minister had often seen these gay, showy people on their First-day visits and picnics and clam-bakes in the groves and gardens of the villa, and had desired the opportunity now before him to speak to them. His heart was stirred within him, and as he rose he thought he was going to pour down the very rain and hail of condemnation upon them. But his words found altogether different utterance, for instead, he said, with much gentleness of voice:—

"My friends, I bring a message to you from the dying lips of that precious sister. There was not time to summon you to her bedside, and after hope came to her like a flood of light she forgot self, and thought only of the gay circle she was leaving behind. She said: 'Tell my friends as they gather about my coffin, that I am one more example of the death-bed repentance of a sinner who had long known but wilfully neglected her duty, and repented after she had no time left which to do good. I can now see that nifts, although they were often prodigal, we never made in the name of the Master! They may have alleviated suffering for a moment, but were never of the kind that brings the reward promised to the Christian! Do not delay. Seek the Saviour now. I want to see you all again. I know now it not possible, only through the blessed blood of Jesus. Seek Him now, without delay and take up the work I have no time to do."

He delivered his message, and, whilst a sound of much weeping filled the room, s down. "I meant to give them a regular lecture," he said afterward, "at have never known what controlling influence guided my tongue, and bade me desist after had repeated the beloved sister's last words.

We may not doubt that this sweet, controlling and limiting influence was that God's own promised Spirit, and so great was the brief and tender message blessed that one after another of the gay circle gay hopeful promise that they had found the way of life.

The villa was turned into a country home for poor children, where the energies that were once wasted in amusement are now in directing, teaching and managing. The minister and the village folk look upon the wondrous change and say: "Verily, God had was in the departure that to us seemed so sudden, so shocking, and so sad."—Selects.

For "The Friend."

"Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." This injunction of the apostle Paul is fraught with instruction, and is one to which the members of the Church militant, the living members have need to give heed.

There often arise among these, different views in regard to church matters; not in relation to our precious principles and testimonies, but about points of interest, perhaps their own particular meeting; and where there is this diversity of view, great care needed, lest imperceptibly to ourselves, we become interested in carrying our point, as we be found pressing it beyond what is consistent with the meekness and gentleness of Christ, and in such a manner as to endanger the unity existing among the members. If this state of mind there will be great danger of judging incorrectly and uncharitably of actions and motives of those differing from us. How important then, when any diversity of feeling arises in a meeting, that the members thereof should watch narrowly over their own spirits, and seek to be brought into an humble, teachable state of mind, in which they would be a willingness to be instructed, if in error, and if in the right, a care be felt to correct it by a truly Christian spirit, who would not admit of cherishing any unkind feeling towards those of different views, by which would indeed endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit unbroken. As differences in judgment are thus met, no hard feeling would find entrance, but regarding our fellow members as dear children of the same Heavenly Father, we would love as brethren, and every exercise of patience and forbearance which, by this diversity of view, would be called forth, would tend to bring all nearer and nearer to the feet of our common Master, and nearer to one another in Him.

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Liquor Traffic in Kansas.—Governor St. John, of Kansas, has issued a proclamation stating that in some of the cities of that State combinations of persons exist who are violating the prohibitions of the law in reference to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. For the arrest and conviction of such offenders against the law, he offers rewards ranging from $100 to $500. The classes for whose conviction rewards are offered, include not only those who sell such liquors, but the city and county officers who connive at the violations of law.

Customs and Principles of the Dunkers, or German Baptists.—[The following description taken from an article in the Century for the 10th month; corrected in accordance with the criticisms of The Primitive Christian, a paper of that denomination, published at Intindongo, Pa.]

The Dunkers profess all the fundamental principles of Christian faith. They baptize neophytes, as their founders at Schwarzenau did—by immersing them three times in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Their communion is preceded by the rite of footwashing. A curious discussion has lately engaged their attention—upon the question whether the single or the double immersion has the better claim for observance. When the same brother both washes and immerses the feet, it is the single mode; when the service is performed by a separate person, they call it foot-washing by the double immersion. It is not to be understood, however, that the whole congregation is thus served by one or two of their number. There are enough of them going around with tub and towel to finish the ceremony within a reasonable time. Foot-washing and communion are always administered in the evening; and just before the communion a love-feast is held, in commemoration of the supper which Jesus took with his disciples. There is no binding as to the choice of food, though among the Dunkers lamb has the preference. Even the luxuries as coffee and butter, unknown in Scriptural Palestine, are not objected to. After the love-feast comes the "holy kiss," the minister gives it to the brother that sits next to him on the right; he applies it, in turn, to his neighbor, and thus it is passed along the line, and by the last is carried to the next table. The same order is observed with the women, with the exception that the holy kiss is applied by the minister to the first of their hand.

The Dunkers live in peace with one another, seek no redress for injury done to them, and recourse to law. Disagreements among themselves are settled by the elders, whose decision is final. Only in exceptional cases, after permission is granted by the officers of the congregation, do they institute lawsuits against the people of the world. Like the Quakers and the Mennonites, they refrain from taking or administering oaths, from participating in warfare, or giving countenance to it in any manner whatever. They are averse to accepting public office. Their members support. Among their host of two hundred thousand people there is not one who is a slave.

error in itself is always invisible. Its nature is the absence of light.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Gum Copal.—As most readers are aware, this is a fossil or semi-fossil gum resembling amber, found in the reddish sands which cover the low-lying country near the coast in Eastern Africa. The tree from which it exudes is practically extinct, though occasionally specimens are seen near the sea. The gum of living trees is of little value.

Curiously enough, the tree seems never to have grown any distance from the coast, as no copal has ever yet been found in the heart of the continent, neither has the living tree. Livingstone, it is true, on several occasions speaks of them occurring to the south and east of Tanganyika, but certainly this has been a mistake. I made every inquiry possible among my men, and told them to be on the look-out for the tree, but without result.

The natives have certain seasons when they dig for the copal. Sufficient only is dug out to buy all the cotton or beads they desire, but even then they are so independent that if they do not receive the price they set on it, they are content to wait another season for a higher price. The mode of digging is characteristic of the native. Proceeding to the forest, he looks about him for a place which appears to his eyes promising. He then takes a sharp-pointed stick, and begins digging a round hole 8 inches in diameter, vertically downward as far as his arm will reach. If he be successful he digs a few more holes near the same place, but if he is unsuccessful one or two times, he gives the place up and looks out for another to resume work in the same manner.—J. Thomson.

Eye-Sight.—Milton's blindness was the result of over-work and dyspepsia.

One of the most eminent American divines having, for some time, been compelled to forego the pleasure of reading, has spent thousands of dollars in value, and lost years of time, in consequence of getting up several hours before day, and studying by artificial light. His eyes never got well.

Multitudes of men and women have made their eyes weak for life by the too free use of the eye-sight reading small print and doing fine sewing. In view of those things, it is well to observe the following rules in the use of the eyes:

Avoid all sudden changes between light and darkness.

Never begin to read, or write, or sew, for several minutes after coming from darkness to a bright light.

Never read by twilight, or moonlight, or on a very cloudy day.

Never read or sew directly in front of the light, or window, or door.

It is best to have the light fall from above, obliquely over the left shoulder.

Never sleep so that, on the first waking, the eyes shall open on the light of a window.

Do not use the eye-sight by light so scant that it requires an effort to discriminate.

Too much light creates a glare, and pains and confuses the sight. The moment you are sensible of an effort to distinguish, that moment cease, and take a walk or ride.

As the sky is blue, and the earth green, it would seem that the ceiling should be a bluish tinge, and the carpet green, and the walls of some mellow tint.

The moment you are instinctively prompted to rub the eyes, that moment cease using them.

If the eyelids are glued together on waking up, do not forcibly open them, but apply the saliva with the finger—it is the speediest diluent in the world—then wash your eyes and face in warm water.—Hall's Journal of Health.

[The flickering light of a "bat-wing" gas burner is especially injurious to the eyes. Substitute for this the steady flame of the argand burner, and the relief afforded will far more than compensate for the cost of the argand.]

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 31, 1881.

It seems seasonable to remind some of our readers of the advice contained in our Discipline, that Friends should carefully inspect the state of their affairs once in a year, and make their wills and settle their outward business while in health. The close of a year and the commencement of a new one is generally accepted as a suitable time by business men to make this close investigation into their concerns—of its importance there can be no doubt. For want of this many an one has gone on in fancied security, while he was becoming entangled in financial difficulties which have ultimately brought great distress upon himself and family, and loss upon others.

A prudent man, who is a dealer in merchandise, will take an accurate account of the stock on hand, estimating his goods, not at the price at which he hopes to sell them, but at their actual cost, and making a proper deduction from that, in the case of those which have depreciated in value or become in measure unsalable.

He will value his counters, shelving, and other appliances of his business, not at cost, but at the price which he would probably procure for them, if he should retire from the business.

He will make due allowance for the probability of loss in collecting the debts which are owing to him—a point on which many persons are over-sanguine, who reckon as part of their estate large sums of money, which they will never be able to procure, or which will cost them in labor and expense as much as they will realize from their claims.

On the other hand, he will not fail to charge himself with every cent that he owes to others.

Similar principles apply to those who are pursuing other branches of business than trading.

When such an examination is honestly made, and is compared with the record of that at the close of a previous year, it enables the person to know whether he is becoming impaired in his estate, remaining stationary, or increasing in worldly possessions. If the first of these should be his situation, he can then consider what must be done to prevent a further loss. It may be his duty to bestow more labor and thought in "providing things honest in the sight of all men." He may need to cut off needless expenses in the management of his business, or to make some changes that will render it more profitable; or to practise greater self-denial and economy in personal and family expenses.

He who finds his estate increasing, may profitably remember the Scripture advice—"If riches increase, set not your heart upon them"—and reflect upon the danger which William Edmundson mentions, of being laden with them as with thick clay, and thereby hindered from the Lord's service. As we are only stewards for a few years of what the Lord permits us to control of his earthly goods, we ought earnestly to desire that we may be faithful stewards, so that when the Lord calls us to account for the trust committed to us, we can render our account with joy and not with grief. Let us inquire whether we have, in proportion to our ability, fed the hungry, clothed the naked, warmed the cold, cared for the neglected, given of the means in our care to spread sound principles and useful knowledge among men, and in other ways devoted to the Lord's service, and the good of his creatures a proper portion of that increase with which He has prospered us.

But may not this annual inquiry into our condition profitably go deeper than a mere investigation of our outward estates? Is it not well to revive the advice of an apostle, "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobrates?"

Let us honestly reflect, whether or not we are so joined unto Christ, that we are habitually living as in his presence, submitting all our thoughts and desires to his controlling influence, looking to Him for wisdom and help in all difficulties, cheerfully submitting to his will, and prizing above all earthly treasures the sweet contriving evidences of his love with which he favors from season to season the soul that is joined to Him in the covenant of spiritual life!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has nominated and the Senate confirmed Timothy O. Howe, of Wisconsin, to be Justice of the Supreme Court, in place of William H. Hunt, of Massachusetts, who was appointed to be Justice of the Supreme Court.

A case was argued last week in the Supreme Court of the United States, involving the question whether real estate which was used by the rebel authorities during the war, with the consent of the owner, could be confiscated for a period beyond the owner's life. W. H. Trescott and Walker Blaine, our Special Envoys to Chili, Peru and Bolivia, arrived at Panama, by the steamer Colon, from New York, and sailed on the 13th inst. for Callao, on the U. S. steamer Lackawanna.

News of the Arctic steamer Jeannette is received from Siberia. The Jeannette was crushed by the ice about the 14th month, in the sea north of Western Siberia, and her crew embarked in three boats. They were separated by wind and fog, but two of them, containing Captain De Long, Dr. Ambler, Eugene Melville and twenty-three men arrived at the mouth of the river Lena in the 9th month. The other boat has not been heard of yet. The men suffered great hardships and were terribly frost-bitten. Assistance has been sent to them by the Russian authorities.

General Pope has informed Secretary Kirkwood that "it is impossible for Payne, alone," to get into the Indian Territory, and that the only way of effecting Payne's raid was started for the purpose of inducing Congress to interfere in his behalf.

The Mexican Kickapoos, a semi-civilized band in the Indian Territory, are reported to be on the verge of starvation owing to the failure of their crops and the disappearance of game.

Mr. Carleton, of Port Huron, Michigan, chairman of the Port Huron Relief Committee, estimates that $200,000 more is needed for the sufferers by the forest fires last fall.

The Oceanic Steamship Company, on the 23d inst. filed articles of Incorporation in New York. The Company proposes, with a capital stock of $2,500,000, to conduct "a general freight and passenger business between San Francisco and the Hawaiian Islands and other points on the Pacific and elsewhere."

A telegram from New Orleans reports that Phillips, Marshall & Co., of London, have just concluded a purchase from the State of Mississippi of 1,300,000 acres of land, 760,000 of which are known as the levee lands, situated mostly in the Yazoo delta. The tract comprises some of the richest cotton lands in the State. The purchasers intend to colonize and cultivate the land.

The Leangle interest in the Florida Central Railway was sold on the 23d inst. to Sir Edward J. Reed, an English capitalist, who has recently purchased 2,000,000 acres of land in Florida. After the transfer, Sir Edward, having acquired a controlling interest in the railroad, was elected its President.

The first of the dredges to be used in the draining of Lake Okechobee, Florida, has been finished at Cedar Keys, and is on her way down the coast to the Coosa-hatchee river.

Director Barchard, of the United States Mint, estimates that at the close of the present fiscal year there will be in circulation $140,000,000 in gold and $171,500,000 in silver coin.

According to the census returns, the New England States nearly $322,000,000 permanently invested in railroads.

Twenty-five thousand persons are employed manufacturing tobacco in New York.

There has been $421,801.60 of the Pennsylvania State debt extinguished during the past fiscal year.

The following summary for the past week numbered 35, as compared with 319 for the previous week and 339 for the corresponding week of last year. There were 175 males and 175 females. Of consumption 55 died; of pneumonia 35; of typhoid fever 14; of diphtheria 13; of crop 13, and of small pox 11.

Markets.—U. S. 3's, 104 1/2; 4's, 114 1/2; 4's, registered, 117 1/2; coupon, 115 1/2; currency 6's, 130.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, but prices were without essential change. Sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 to 12 3/4 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Flour.—Standard white, 7 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Barrel was dull, but prices were steady. About 1000 barrels sold in lots, including superfine, at $1.50; western and Pennsylvania extras, at $1.75 to $1.85; Minnesota extras, clear, $6.75 to $7; Minnesota extras, clear, straight good, at $7.25 to $7.50; Pennsylvania extras, good, at $6.25; do, do, fancy, at $6.50 to $6.80; Ohio, do, do, good and choice, at $7.25; winter wheat patents, at $8; Minnesota patents, at $8.25, and 500 do. City Mills, family, on private terms. Rye flour was dull; sales, in small lots, at $1.75 to $1.85. In corn meal there was a good doing, and prices were steady. Buckwheat meal sells slowly within the range of $1.40 to $1.45. Feed.—Sales are reported at $21.50 to $22.50 for winter, and $21 for spring wheat bran.

Grain.—Wheat was dull, but prices were unchanged; 1600 bushels Pennsylvania and western red and amber sold at $1.38 to $1.45. No. 2 red at $1.38 to $1.38 1/2. No. 3, 95 to $1.35. Corn was firm; about 5500 bushels mixed sold in lots at 69 cts. for yellow, 69 cts. for mixed, 67 cts. for steamer, 66 cts. for No. 3, 65 cts. per bushel for rejected. Oats were unchanged; sales of 4000 bushel white at 51 to 53 cts. and rejected and mixed at 49 to 50 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 12th mo. 24th, 1881.—Loads of hay, 23; loads of straw, 35. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; Straw, 85 to 95 cts per 100 pounds.

Reports are that the iron trade, in keeping with textile manufactures, is very brisk in Philadelphia. The increased inquiry having stimulated prices to some extent. This demand is claimed to be legitimate and not speculative.

FOREIGN.—A recent meeting of landlords in Dublin was an unimpressive demonstration. The resolutions adopted, condemning the way the Land Act is administered, and demanded compensation and purchase by the State.

Joseph Chamberlain, President of the Board of Trade, answering a correspondent who criticized the policy of coercion, was strongly in justification of the policy of coercion. He said, "He is not a man who is unbearable that the goodwill shown by the farmers after the passage of the Land Act should be nullified by the illegal acts and teachings of those who have avowed a sinister desire to render reconciliation impossible. The Mormon missionaries here held a conference in London on the 23d inst. in which they were not very successful, but many converts have been made in the provinces."

It is proposed to take the converts to Utah either in 1882. Some of the elders will remain to proselytize a number of them will return to Utah. Fifteen hundred converts have been made in England since month.

EMIGRATION.—Berlin correspondent says: "Emigration in 1882 promises to become more colossal than in 1881. Fourteen thousand tickets have already been taken for transportation by vessels leaving Bremen America in the spring. Almost an equal number emigrants will go from Hamburg."

An epidemic of typhoid fever in Genoa is in progress seems to be on the increase.

On First-day last, during a Catholic service in W. saw, a Jew was seized while picking pockets. The man to effect his escape the culprit cried "Fire." Immediately a great panic seized the congregation. The Jews, the doctors, the police, the constabulary, sons, mostly women, were crushed to death or fatally injured, and sixty others more or less seriously hurt. The pick-pocket was soundly beaten by the crowd. Very serious rioting ensued in the palace. Most of the Jewish liquor shops and many Jewish houses were sacked. The police were powerless. A number of policemen assisted in plundering dram shops. Five hundred arrests have been made.

The Standard's Vienna despatch says: "A telegram from St. Petersburg reports that the whole naval arm of Cronstadt is on fire. One quarter of the town is reported to be already destroyed. The loss is enormous. The fire is believed to be the work of nihilists."

Owing to the influence of Ali Ben Kalifa, the Arab chief, three of the largest tribes in Southern Tripoli hold out against the French. The insurgents have pillaged the large town of Kasr Mondenig. The military General Legros's column of 5000 men, in consequence, thereby postponed.

Alexandria, 12th mo. 22d.—There were 32 deaths from cholera at Elwejd during the week ending on 15th instant. Some of the caravans have broken through the quarantine by avoiding the ordinary route.

General Legros's column of 5000 men, in consequence, thereby postponed.

The yellow fever is reported to be disappearing Barbados. The census returns just published, 171,860 as the number of inhabitants of the island, being an increase of 9811 over the returns for the year 1879.

The police in Havana have arrested a number of counterfeiters of Spanish quarter dollar pieces, seized their implements and a large quantity of spurious coin.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The Committee who have charge of this institution met in Philadelphia on Sixth-day, 1st month, 6th, 11 at 11 A. M.

The Committee on Admissions and the Committee on Instruction met at 9 A. M., the same day.

WM. EVANS, Clerk.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Cranford, (Twenty third Ward,) Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at his residence in Reading, Pa., on the 1st of Dec. 1881, TYSON EMBREE, in the sixty-third year of his age, a member of Exeter Monthly Meeting Friends.

On the 7th of 11th month, 1881, CHAS. STOKES, an esteemed member and elder of Exeter Monthly Meeting of Friends, N. J., in the 62nd year of his age. The example of this dear Friend in the tenderness of religious meetings, and his quiet, but walk through life, with the patient, cheerful submission to the will of his Heavenly Father manifested through months of indisposition, leaves a very comforting lie in the minds of his relatives and friends that loss is his everlasting gain.

—12th mo. 6th, 1881, at her residence in Delaware Co. PA., ABIGAIL P. ELPRETH, in the 74th year of her age. She was a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends. Her life had been one of true loving dependence on her Divine Master, and grew toward evening, she manifested much single of heart toward God and unselfish devotion to her loved ones. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord both, in that day when I make up my jewels.

WILLIAM H. PALE, PRINTER,

No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 7, 1882.

NO. 22.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Notes of Travel.

(Continued from page 162.)

One of the Elkland Friends kindly met us at Canton, and conveyed us in an open wagon over the mountains to their settlement. A thunder shower in the previous evening had laid the dust, and refreshed the parched surface of the earth, washing from the road-side the thick coating of dust which had so far marred its beauty.

We met many teams hauling loads of hemlock bark for the tanners' use. In some parts of the mountains the hemlock abounds, forming dense woods, composed of enormous trees thickly set together and covered at their instant summits with evergreen foliage, that at little underwood can grow. As found in their native woods, these trees have no large spreading branches like the oak, hickory, or apple; only a group of small branches at the top to bear the leaves. The general outline of the tree is conical. It has been a pleasure to me to wander alone in one of the grand hemlock forests, and enjoy the feeling of sublimity, almost amounting to awe, that covered the mind, when surrounded with trunks 3, 4 or 5 feet in diameter, running to a height of 70 or 80 feet without a limb, and surprisingly near to each other.

The summits of the hills often presented a considerable area of level or gently rolling land, comparatively free from stone—and in such situations some of the farms looked as if their owners might raise from them a comfortable living. On the hill-sides there was frequently a large amount of loose stone, which the farmers gather into great piles in their fields.

We saw many pieces of land, which were being cleared from the timber for agricultural purposes. As we estimated the amount of labor required to hew down, roll together, and turn the heavy growth of timber, and gather the stones that often were thickly strewn over the surface; thought of the tedious process of bringing into cultivation ground that was almost filled with roots of trees, and which would require years to decay; and noted the numbers of stumps that for a series of years would remain in the way of the plough; we could but sympathize with the early settlers who had so energetically hewed out homes for themselves; and rejoice at the evidences we frequently met with, of comfort and thrift.

In these mountain tops grass flourishes, so that raising sheep and cattle are among the principal occupations of the farmers. In some of the pasture-fields, I noticed great patches of fern which reminded me of similar growths on the tops of the Catskill Mountains. It proved to be the same species as is so abundant there—the Dicksonia pilosiuscula. Among the more interesting shrubs was a large flowered raspberry, Rubus odoratus, which I had before seen on the banks of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia. It grew abundantly by the roadside on the edge of woods. The bright red flower was about one inch across and the fruit, of the same color, was pleasant to the taste, but not abundant.

We saw but a single specimen of the mountain Elder, which bears a cluster of brilliant red berries, not spread out like the common elder, but gathered into a bunch resembling in appearance the fruit of the common sumac.

A species of Hawthorn (Viburnum lantanoides), was very common. Its berries were quite eatable. The broad leaves easily distinguish it from the surrounding shrubbery. The branches, when they come in contact with the ground, take root, thus forming loops which impede the traveller and give it the popular names of "Trip-up," and "Hobble-bush."

It was in this rough country, then almost covered with the primeval forest, that Joel and Ellen McCarty settled about the year 1798. She was a daughter of that good Christian and faithful sufferer for the Truth, Moses Roberts, of Catawissa, of whom some account was given in the former numbers of these articles. She was born either during the time of his imprisonment or soon after his release from jail. Her history shows that hardships and exposure do not prevent those who pass through such experiences from richly partaking of the visitations of heavenly love, and profiting thereby. Her influence and that of her husband were largely for good, in that new settlement, and we found abundant traces of it still remaining. Of their large family, six children are still living, and numerous grand-children and more remote descendants. Surely such pioneers, who sow the seeds of virtue in a community, and give it an impulse in the right direction, may well be remembered with honor.

The testimony of Muncy Monthly Meeting concerning her says:

"She was the daughter of Moses and Jane Roberts, who were among the early settlers in the neighborhood of Catawissa, [in Pennsylvania], and at that time members of Exeter Monthly Meeting. Her father dying when she was quite young, she was left under the care of her widowed mother and other branches of the family, in a situation not very favorable for literary or religious instruction; yet during this period she appeared to be preserved in a state of innocency and tenderness of spirit.

"In the year 1798, she was united in marriage with Joel McCarty, a member of Muncy Monthly Meeting, and soon after removed with her husband to Elklands, [in Pennsylvania,] where a small settlement of Friends was then forming within the limits of this meeting.

"In this retired situation, very much secluded from the busy scenes of life, and subjected to many of the privations attendant on the settlement of new countries, her mind became more deeply impressed with the importance of seeking those treasures which neither moth nor rust can corrupt.

"Under these renewed exercises she often expressed the concern she felt on account of their not having a meeting for worship, and encouraged her friends to unite in making application for an indulged meeting, which was granted them in 1816.

"She was very diligent in the attendance of our religious meetings, though frequently having to press through many difficulties and hardships in the performance of this important duty; often speaking of the sweet peace she was at times permitted to experience, when sitting in their little silent meetings; and encouraged her own family and friends not to suffer any worldly business so to engross their attention as to prevent them from a regular attendance.

"Having thus learned in the school of Christ, the excellency of his government, and by yielding to the manifestations of Grace in her own heart, she became qualified to invite others to come, taste, and see that the Lord is good.

"Though her literary acquirements were very limited, she was enabled in her public ministry to express herself in clear and impressive language.

"Her early communications carried with them an evidence that they were from that Anointing which alone can qualify for true gospel ministry; and in the year 1819 were approved by the Quarterly Meeting of ministers and elders.

"By closely following the leadings of the true Shepherd, she became a lively and acceptable minister; was a firm believer in the doctrines and principles of our religious Society, as set forth in the approved writings of our early Friends; and opposed to all speculative views and unprofitable theories. She bore a faithful testimony against the unsound views of Elias Hicks and his followers, being frequently led in her communications to express her full belief in the authenticity and Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, and in the divinity and offices of our blessed Saviour as therein set forth.

"She several times visited the families of this Monthly Meeting, a service for which she was well qualified; frequently administering counsel and encouragement suited to the conditions of those present.

"With the approbation of her friends in 1830, she performed a visit in gospel love to the meetings composing Farmington and Scipio Quarterly Meetings, [in the State of N. York.] and to those of Friends in Upper Canada.

"Although domestic duties necessarily claimed much of her time, having a large family of children, yet these seldom prevented her from attending to the calls of duty.

"Christian love so warmed her heart towards the whole human family, that she was a truly sympathizing friend to the afflicted in body or mind. The last few years of her life were much spent in visiting and nursing the sick; frequently having to endure many hardships and privations when attending on the poor and remotely situated families of her neighborhood. And while administering to the wants of the body, she was ever mindful of that more precious part, the immortal soul; endeavoring to turn their minds unto Christ Jesus, as the only hope and means of salvation.

"In the last meeting she attended, the day before she was taken ill, she spoke of the shortness of time to some present, and encouraged those who might remain a little longer, to greater diligence in the attendance of their religious meetings.

"From the first of her sickness, she was impressed with a belief that she should not recover, and was much engaged in fervent supplication to the Father of mercies, that He would be pleased to preserve her in patient resignation to his blessed and holy will.

"The evening before her close, being asked if she would like to see her physician, she calmly replied, 'No! there will be a change before morning;' and soon after requested her children might be sent for; some of whom resided a few miles distant.

"On their arrival, her powers of speech had so failed, that she could say little more than 'I have told you the truth before;' and in a few minutes quietly passed away, on the 20th day of the Fourth month, 1844, in the sixty-third year of her age."

J. W.

For "The Friend."

The words of the wise are as goods, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd.—Eccl. xii. chap., 17 ver.

The above passage has been brought to mind while reflecting on the remarks in the editorial columns of No. 19 of The Friend. It would be well for all of us to seriously ponder them, and be willing to apply them to ourselves as they meet our own state and condition. How apt the remark of the experienced minister, that "Those who should act as nursing fathers and mothers, had so long been trained to guard the walls from enemies without, that they seemed to have lost sight, in measure, of cultivating the field within." And how applicable the epistle of George Fox which follows. True it is, "that the Lord is able to prosper his own work without instrumental help; yet it is in accordance with his will and wisdom to have a gathered church, and that the members of his church should be one another's helpers in Him."

If the "field within" was properly cultivated, there would be much less danger from "enemies without." We who are tillers of the soil know how important it is to have our grounds well set with proper kinds of plants, so that noxious weeds may not have the same chance to take root. And in order that the good seed may grow and bring forth fruit, more is required than merely to keep out or pluck up noxious weeds; cultivation is necessary; and whilst we are cultivating and cherishing with care every germ that is springing up from the true root, we may be, unaware to ourselves, rooting out many a germ of a noxious plant that was secretly taking root.

"Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him, let him know that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."—James v. 19, 20.

The work of converting a sinner from the error of his ways, or of having our minds turned towards the "cultivation of the field within," may not bring us out so prominently before the view of others, as that of guarding the "walls from enemies without." But if we go forth to battle in our own strength, the Truth will suffer thereby, and we have our swords turned backward to our own shame.

The Lord said to Ananias, when he would send him to Saul (who became Paul), "Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel. For I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake." "How great things he must suffer for my name's sake!" Suffering is not pleasant to flesh and blood; but what matters it? If the poor servant is permitted to be where his Master is, he ought to esteem it enough for him. Although the saying in reference to Paul may have had reference to his outward persecution, yet it is still true, "that those who would reign with Christ, must also suffer with Him." And this baptism may not be for ourselves alone as individuals, but for the Church's sake also. Neither "the field within," nor the fields without, can be cultivated without toil. It is often necessary to rise up early and to lie down late; the heat of the midday's sun is to be endured; the hands and garments are often soiled in the labor, and we are sometimes sorely discouraged, fearing that when the harvest does come, we shall miss of our reward. And we may miss in the outward, but the promise as to the inward is, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

To return to the editorial alluded to, "The talk at the breakfast table." How instructive the remarks of the Friend, "whose mind had been increasingly drawn to seek communion with his Heavenly Father." He felt disturbed if, while thus engaged, a minister offered that which had not the savor of Life attending it. Well would it be if ministers did at all times dwell under a sense of their own inability of themselves to minister to the profit of any class of hearers. But to those whose minds are drawn to seek for themselves that heavenly communion which is so comforting to the rightly gathered soul, a communication without the heavenly unction seems like calling away from that table where "The Master Himself serves," and offering nothing to the hearer but husks.

The effect of prejudice was also alluded to instructively and truthfully.—"The effect on both preacher and hearer." The poor preacher feels that somewhat is laid upon him to offer; and he feels very desirous that what he may offer may tend to lessen the prejudice that felt towards him. In his anxiety to have just right, he is in great danger, indeed, of sufficiently regarding the injunction, "Preach the preaching that I bidd thee." And so finds and feels that he has been too anxious about his own honor whilst he was aiming to be engaged for the Master's honor, and has been dipped in Jordan oftener than the Syrian Lord, before he gets rid of all his spots. Y with a little "cultivation of the field within" by those who might be qualified, he may escape some of his plungings. If his friends feel that there is a goodly root the why not cherish it? If they see something springing up that they feel is not from a true root, lop it off. If they feel that there that springing up from the true root which needs training, train it. If they feel that he have no ability given them to help a brother who may err from the Truth, let such an act be careful how he takes the seat of judgment.

"The words of the wise are as goods," as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies which are given from one shepherd."

Our Lord instructed his disciples that there were to pray "the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers into his harvest." We not also pray that the number of those who are qualified by Him to use the goods and to fasten the nails, may be increased. There is felt to be at this day a great need our Society of a more united exercise and travail of soul with and for one another.

As is said in the editorial to which I have referred, "An unsound ministry, or one not authorized by the Lord, tends to close up the way for the coming forth of those who are truly called to that service;" and "In the state of things which has existed for years critical spirit has been developed."

Our Discipline is clear in regard to the treatment of those who give cause for uneasiness in their appearances in the ministry; and if there is not strength with those whose place it is to labor with such for their restoration the fault must be theirs. We do not believe it is the will of the Head of the Church that such should be our condition. "Judgment would the Lord have laid to the line of righteousness to the plumb-line." And we trust there are those still preserved here at there who are qualified of the Lord to that judgment where it belongs; but the number of such seems small at this day; and a not their places often occupied by mere critics.

From the records of our Society, from the journals of the "called and chosen" of the Lord, we find that they sometimes miss their way; that in the warmth of the feelings they were sometimes led beyond the depth to their own sorrow. We have our treasure in an earthen vessel, and unless it is closely kept, our natural warmth may be mistaken for the "coal from off the holy altar." At the present day there much that is calculated to arouse the feelings of those who are honestly concerned for the "welfare of Zion and the enlargement of its borders." Unless these are kept upon the watch, they are as liable as any others to be led beyond their depth, and thus bring wound upon themselves. Such need the tender care and sympathy of those who feel the force of the apostle's injunction, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

12th mo. 24th, 1881.

Westtown Boarding School.

For "The Friend."

In a recent number of "The Friend," allusion was made to the early records of the transactions of the Committee in charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, bearing ample evidence of its having been from its first inception, a carefully considered project, commenced and carried on under a deeply felt exercise for the right performance of a religious duty.

Having recently had the privilege of looking over the first book of Minutes, embracing a period of time extending from 1794 to 1840, and becoming interested in observing the exercise and care of our predecessors in the establishment and proper conducting of the concern of the Yearly Meeting, it was thought that some extracts from these minutes might be acceptable to the readers of "The Friend."

"At a Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia, or Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the eastern parts of Maryland and Virginia in the 9th and 10th mos. 1794.

"Third-day, the 30th of the 9th mo. p. m. the matter respecting the establishment of a boarding school (brought up from Philadelphia, Quarter in the year 1792), in order to encourage a guarded education of our youth under the superintendence and care of this meeting, being now entered upon and considered,—as the subject appears weighty and a meeting not being prepared to determine result thereon; in order to open and throw light on the proposal, it is judged best that a committee be appointed to investigate and report the same, who (after having had a conference with such Friends as have for a length of time had this concern on their minds) are desired to report their sense and judgment when prepared, a committee of 54 Friends is thereupon named to the service."

10th mo. 3rd.—This committee brought in the following report:

To the Yearly Meeting of Pennsylvania, &c. In pursuance of our appointment we have fully attended to the concern brought up from the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia, the year 1792, relating to the establishment of a boarding school. It appearing that many Friends in that and other Quarterly settings, prospects had been entertained of tentative advantages to our religious Society be derived from one or more such institutions in some suitable place or places in the country, within the limits and under the direction and care of the Yearly Meeting, the use of benefit whereof to be confined to the children of Friends; and that divers members of those Quarters, many of whom have had been subject ripening in their minds for a number of years past, have by donations and subscriptions, already received the amount of over 5000 pounds to be applied to the prosecuting such an establishment when the Yearly Meeting shall take the same under its care and patronage.

On our taking the subject into deliberate consideration, we are united in sentiment that institution of the kind proposed, if managed with religious care and circumspection, may tend to the prosperity of Truth by promoting the real good of the rising generation; do therefore recommend the said proposal to the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia to its patronage of the Yearly Meeting, and propose that a committee thereof be appointed consider and digest a plan and rules for the government and management of the house, school, and other parts of the economy; to receive contributions from those Friends disposed to encourage such an establishment, with authority to purchase lands, erect houses and other conveniences, out of the funds which may come into the hands of such committee, who, after having prepared a plan of rules and regulations for the well ordering and right management of the institution, should submit the same to the sense and judgment of the Yearly Meeting; and that such committees as may from time to time be appointed, should render a general account of their proceedings to that meeting annually. Which is submitted to the meeting, and signed on behalf and by desire of the committee by

JOS. POTTS.

THOS. GASKILL,

DANIEL SMITH,

ROBERT KIRKBRIDE.

Philad., 10th mo. 2d, 1794."

After due and weighty deliberation thereon, it appears generally easy to the meeting to unite therewith; whereupon the same is adopted and the following committee are nominated and appointed to carry into effect the several matters contained in the report; and they are desired to submit a full and clear state of their proceedings to our next Yearly Meeting, viz:

Henry Drinker, Owen Biddle, Jno. Drinker, Thos. Fisher, Jesse Poulke, William Jackson, Humphrey Marshall, Joshua E. Pusey, Warner Mifflin, Jona. Evans, Jr., Nicholas Wain, Geo. Churchman, John Hoskins, and 33 others, added to the committee 2nd of 10th mo. 1795.

PHILIP PRICE, JR.,

WM. EMLEY,

J. M. SAVERY,

ELI YARNALL, and others.

Extracted from the minutes,

NICHOLAS WALN, Clerk.

Selected for "The Friend."

In the journal of Catharine Phillips, she mentions that in the year 1755 she was in Philadelphia, and that it was a time of great trial on account of an Indian war, upon which she remarks as follows: "During the time of the people's being in so great confusion and distress on account of the Indian war, my mind was much exercised; but for several months I know not that I could at all, even secretly, petition the Almighty for their relief, with any evidence of such a petition arising from the spring of Divine Life. But a little before a step was put to their depredations, my spirit was almost continually clothed with intercession that the Lord might be pleased to stay the sword: and in two public meetings I was concerned in like manner; and I did not hear that any mischief was done after that time by any Indians who had occasioned that disturbance, and a cessation of arms ensued. I record this as an instance of Divine wisdom, instructing his servants to ask what it is pleasing to Him to grant, as well as restraining them from petitioning for what might be exceedingly desirable to themselves before the proper time; and I believe that if ministers thus kept under the government of that spirit of wisdom, which giveth liberty in the appointed season to approach the throne of Divine Grace, it would be more evident that they asked in the name and spirit of Jesus, by their prayer being answered."

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

VISIT OF SAMUEL COPE.

(Continued from page 164.)

In the First-day meeting, our beloved friend Samuel Cope again handed forth testimony, and to a numerous audience. "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven, but to them that are without in parables." He thought this was the language of the Redeemer to his followers when personally upon earth; bringing into view the reward of the faithful. Those that walk in the way of the Lord's requirements, He will teach of his ways; and give them to know of the things of the Heavenly kingdom; but unto them that are without, in whom the light has become darkness, it is not for them to know of the things which belong to the kingdom of Heaven. But still, there was much encouragement for those who have long rebelled. The invitation is extended even until the eleventh hour, or until man becomes spiritually dead and there is no hope.

The condition of the repenting sinner was beautifully portrayed by the application of the parable of the prodigal son, who it is evident had received a share of the inheritance or Grace of God, but had wasted his substance in riotous living in a far country, and was reduced to that condition that he fain would have filled himself with the husks such as the swine did eat,—or with the lowest of natural things. In this forlorn situation, he came to himself and thought of his father's house; and said, "how many hired servants of my father have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger;" and he came to this good resolution, "I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, 'Father, I have sinned before heaven and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son, make me as one of thy hired servants.'" And he arose and went to his father; and when a great way off his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him. And the son said, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and in thy sight and am no more worthy to be called thy son;' but the father said to his servants, bring forth the best robe and put it on him, and bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, for this my son was dead, and is alive; was lost and is found." Here there was encouraging language extended to the repenting sinner, to the awakened prodigal desirous of returning to his father's house.

But a warning was given in the fate of the foolish virgins who had no oil in their vessels when the midnight cry was heard, and the bridegroom came. No man will be forced into the kingdom of Heaven, and it is dangerous to defer the work of preparation—for the young man and the strong man may be brought to the bed of death. He had been witness himself when the young and strong man had been reduced almost to the confines of eternity; and oh! how he bewailed his lost and undone condition, and how bitterly did he regret his mis-spent time at that awful period. He had been moral in his conduct, and upright in his walking amongst men, but he had not been obedient to the requirements of the Lord. An extension of mercy was granted, but how unsafe and unwise for any of us to delay the work of preparation.

Oh! it is good for the lofty spirit of man to be subdued, to be brought down into the valley of humiliation, for there flow the waters of the river of life; and it is only there that he can find true peace. If he dwells near unto this fountain he shall never thirst; and all are invited to come and partake of these living waters. "Whosoever is athirst let him come, and whosoever will may come and partake of the waters of life freely." "And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb."

The importance of the revelation of the Divine Will, as lying at the foundation of all individual growth in religion, was brought into view. What is to be known of God is manifest in man; but man cannot look into his own soul without the Grace of God. The will of the Lord is revealed to him, which, if obeyed, would lead to salvation. "But whom say ye that I am?" Peter, answering on behalf of the rest, said, "Thou art Christ the Son of the living God." Our Saviour replied, "Blessed art thou, Simon bar-Jona, for flesh and blood has not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in Heaven." "And upon this rock will I build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." "I thank thee, Oh Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes."

It is not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, that shall be accepted: not the hearers but the doers of the law. The body must return to dust, and the spirit must return to God who gave it, and appear before the just Judge to answer for the deeds done in the body. And what a lamentable thing, if judgment is given against us, after all the advantages that have been cast in the balance in our favor. For the Lord will divide between the sheep and the goats; and will set the sheep on his right hand but the goats on his left; and will say to those on his right hand, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you;" but to those on his left, "Go, ye cursed, into everlasting torment." What is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? And he verily believed that the earth would at this time send forth an ill savor unto the Lord, was it not for the sake of the righteous which it contains,—these are the salt of the earth.

The Cherokee Nation.

The following statement is from a proclamation of D. W. Bushyhead, principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation:

"Last year the census of the population and possessions of the Cherokee Nation was first taken within their history. We have now counted our treasures and know for what and for how much we should feel grateful as a family of people having and occupying one home in common. From this authentic source we find our people blessed with one hundred and two primary schools for a rapidly increasing population of twenty thousand three hundred citizens: two high schools—male and female; an orphan asylum; an asylum for the unfortunate insane, blind and helpless; forty-five churches, and as many native ministers of the gospel; one hundred and fifty native teachers by profession; a written constitution and code of laws; a government consisting of executive, legislative and judicial branches, well understood and administered;

a people peaceful and progressive, and in all material regards more than self-supporting, and having but five fishermen and fifteen hunters by occupation left among them as the last vestige of a savage state from which we have been rescued within the memory of men yet living, by the goodness of an overruling Providence.

Such is the situation of the Cherokee Nation to-day, in a fair and ample country, secured to them by treaty and by patent, and of which the honor and honesty of their great earthly protector, the United States Government, is pledged to guard their possession."

HYMN FOR THE NEW YEAR.

I take my pilgrim staff anew,
Life's path untrodden to pursue,
Thy guiding eye, my Lord, I view;
My times are in thy hand.

Throughout the year, my heavenly Friend,
On thy best guidance I depend;
From its commencement to its end,
My times are in thy hand.

Should comfort, health and peace be mine,
Should hours of gladness on me shine,
Then let me trace thy love divine;
My times are in thy hand.

But should'st thou visit me again,
With languor, sorrow, sickness, pain,
Still let this thought my hope sustain,
My times are in thy hand.

Thy smile alone makes moments bright,
That smile turns darkness into light;
This thought will soothe grief's saddest night—
My times are in thy hand.

Should those this year be called away,
Who lent to life its brightest ray,
Teach me in that dark hour to say
My times are in thy hand.

A few more days, a few more years—
Oh, then a bright reverse appears;
Then I shall no more say with tears,
My times are in thy hand.

That hand my steps will gently guide
To the dark brink of Jordan's tide,
Then bear me to the heavenly side;
My times are in thy hand.

—Charlotte Elliott.

THE THREE BIDDERS.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF ROWLAND HILL.
Will you listen, young friends, for a moment,
While a story I unfold.

A marvellous tale, of a wonderful sale
Of a noble lady of old:—
How hand and heart, at an anction mart,
And soul and body, she sold.

'Twas in the broad king's highway,
Near a century ago,
That a preacher stood,—though of noble blood,—
Telling the fallen and low
Of a Saviour's love, and a home above,
And a peace that they all might know.

All crowded around to listen;
And they wept at the wondrous love,
That could wash their sins and receive them in His spotless mansions above:—
While slow through the crowd, a lady proud
Her gilded chariot drove.

"Make room," cried the haughty out-riders,
"You are closing the king's highway;
My lady is late, and their majesties wait;
Give way there, good people, I pray."
The preacher heard, and his soul was stirred,
And he cried to the rider, "Nay."

His eye like the lightning flashes;
His voice like a trumpet rings,
"Your grand fete days, and your fashions and ways,
Are all but perishing things.
'Tis the king's highway, bid I hold it to-day
In the name of the King of kings."

Then,—bending his gaze on the lady,
And marking her soft eye and all—
"And now in his name, a sale I proclaim,
And bids for this fair lady call.
Who will purchase the whole—her body and soul,
Coronet, jewels and all?"

"I see already three bidders,—
The World steps up as the first.
'I will give her my treasures, and all the pleasures
For which my votaries thirst;
She shall dance thro' each rosy morn, more joyous and gay
With a quiet grave at the worst."

"But out spake the Devil, boldly;
'The kingdoms of earth are mine.
Fair lady, thy name, with an envied fame,
On the bright tablets shall shine;
Only give me thy soul, and I give thee the whole,
Their glory and wealth to be thine.'

"And pray what hast thou to offer,
Thou Man of Sorrows, unknown?
And He gently said, 'My blood have I shed,
To purchase her for mine own.
To conquer the grave, and her soul to save,
I trod the wine press, alone.

"I will give her my cross of suffering,
My cup of sorrow, to share;
But with endless love, in my home above,
All shall be righted there:
She shall walk in white, in a robe of light,
And a radiant crown shall wear."

"Thou hast heard the terms, fair lady,
That each hath offered for thee.
Which wilt thou choose, and which wilt thou lose,
This life, or life to be?
The fable was mine, but the choice is yet thine,
Sweet lady! which of the three?"

Nearer the stand of the preacher,
The gilded chariot stole;
And each head was bowed, as over the crowd
The thundering accents roll;
And every word, that the lady heard,
Burned in her very soul.

"Pardon, good people, she whispered,
As she rose from her cushioned seat.
Full well, they say, as the crowd made way
You could hear her pulses beat;
And each head was hure, as the lady fair
Knelt at the preacher's feet.

She took from her hand the jewels,
The coronet from her brow;
"Lord Jesus," she said, as she bowed her head,
"I'm the highest bidder art thou;
Thou gav'st for my sake, thy life, and I take Thy offer—and take it now.

"I know the world and her pleasures,
At best they but weary and cloy;
And the Tempter is bold, but his hours and gold
Prove ever a fatal decoy:
I long for thy rest—Thy bid is the best;
Lord, I accept it with joy!"

"Give me thy cup of suffering,
Welcome, Arctur's sorrow and loss,
Let my portion be, to win souls to Thee,
Perish her glittering dress:
I gladly lay down her coveted crown,
Saviour, to take thy cross."

"Amen!" said the holy preacher;
And the people wept aloud.
Years have rolled on—and they all have gone,
Around that altar who bowed,
Lady and throng, have been swept along
On the wind, like a morning cloud.

But the Saviour has claimed his purchase,
And around his radiant seat,
A mightier throng, in endless song,
The wonders story meet;
And a form more fair; is bending there,
Laying her crown at his feet.

So, now, in eternal glory,
She rests from her cross and care;
But her spirit above, with a longing love,
Seems calling on you to share
Her endless reward, in the joy of the Lord.
O! will you not answer her here?

—Faith and Works

The Hop-Pickers.

"One half the world does not know how the other half lives."

Perhaps some of the readers of The British Friend do not know what kind of life the travelling hop-picker leads in our district during the 9th month when the hops are ready to be gathered.

A large number of people, many of them on the lowest ranks of life, flock out of the larger towns into the country districts at these times, and those who live in these districts catch a glimpse behind the scenes of some other people's lives, which is enough to cast a shadow on every kindly heart.

Some thousands of these people may be said to gather yearly in our Alford district, where some of them are accommodated in rough sheds, and others build for themselves huts which make one think of dog kennels, made of sticks and straw, where there is just room to crawl in at night, and lie down to sleep.

In rainy weather the people's clothes are often wet through, but a fire in many of these places is not to be thought of, and it is very plain that some refuge is needed for the hours after their work is finished, until bed-time comes. Of course, until something better was provided, a large number of them went to the public houses. Six years ago Samuel Chinn, who has long interested himself in the highest welfare of these people, arranged to put up a Mission Tent for their accommodation. This year the number of tents has increased to four, and most successful the plan has proved.

At six o'clock every night the pickers are provided with a cup of coffee, and they are expected to bring their own food. After the tea-drinking is over, the evening is occupied in a variety of ways. Sometimes a magic-lantern is shown—sometimes a suitable story is read—and, very often, the old, old story of Jesus and his love is told in simple words, and listened to with deep attention.

The testimony of the police for some years past has been not the least encouraging result of the work. They tell how much less they have to do since the tents have been in operation; and at one of our village inns the other day the landlady testified that the pickers improve in their behavior every year. The farmers also see the change in the better conduct of the people in the gardens, and those who go to the tents, and hear the heart-felt testimony of the people, listen to delightful tales of lives altered for the better, and wretched homes made bright by the presence of love.

Samuel Chinn writes; "Some of the characters we have had in these tents have been very sad. We have seen men, from their low filthy habits, almost covered with vermin; but after a week's attendance at the tent services, and brought under Gospel influences, we have seen these same men washed, their hair combed—thoughtful and attentive; and some have given evidence of a better state of mind, and have said, 'This tent has been a God-send to us chaps.'"

We extract the following from one of our local newspapers: "We desire to claim a widespread recognition of the vast importance of Mr. Chinn's interesting work—a work that has proved most healthy and useful to the home pickers, and of inestimable value to that still larger class known as the 'out-comers.' Among this through there are to be found classes so low in the moral scale that they have but the crudest notion of a God, or of a spiritual existence, and whose only aim is to get through the world in the rudest possible manner. The temper and bearing of a numerous throng is too often coarse and brutal in the extreme. Bringing with them, as they generally do, troops of young girls, boys, and children, the atmosphere of the hop-picking districts too often becomes the atmosphere of a moral pestilence. All this has been partially righted by the establishment of the hop-pickers' tents."—The British Friend.

For "The Friend."

"You that are Young."

The following is an abridged biographical sketch of the life of Jonathan Raine, of Sunnyside, Lancashire, England, who departed this life the 27th of the Eleventh month, 1773. "His parents being members of the Society of Friends, educated him in the principles of our profession; but he seems to have neglected in great degree the circumspect way in which they had endeavored to direct him; and to have been much infected with the spirit of the world, and the vanities of life.

"At length, as his friends relate in their testimony of him, it pleased the Lord to reveal his righteous judgments against the transgressing nature in him; when he stooped to the cross of Christ, and patiently endured the baptism of the Holy Spirit; thus becoming qualified for the work to which he was called. The reader may here truly anticipate, and conclude that the work in question was gospel ministry; but let him also be qualified that by these means likewise, and also, qualifications for other services, and for every service in the Lord's house, must be obtained.

"In order to be more fully at liberty to follow the vocation with which this Friend perceived himself to be called, he left off business, in which he had engaged when young; for something of what has been termed 'true moderation' now bounded his desires.

"About two hours before he breathed his last, having lain still for some time, he desired to be helped up, and, as nearly as can be remembered, spoke as follows: 'I want to tell you a little of what has appeared to the view of my mind, as I was lying and reflecting, that my time seemed to be near the conclusion. I earnestly breathed to the Great Informer, that He would be pleased to show me my own state, and how it was with me, and to forgive all my sins. And there was shown me some little stones, laid in regular order, and a path through the middle of them. The first heath, it was told me, were the sins of my youth; and they were all passed by and forgiven, for the sake of Christ: though my sins and backslidings were many. Yea, there was a time when my trouble and distress were such, I could have wished that man had died as the beast that perishes, and that there had been no rewards or punishments after death. I could have been content to have been shut up in a dungeon, never to have seen the light again, if I thereby might have gained peace. In unutterable condescension it pleased the Lord to break in upon my soul, as the light of the sun after a long darkness; which so overcame me, that I believe that if an account had been brought me that all I had in the world had been lost, it would have given me no concern. Oh, Friends, you that are young, my desires have been earnest for you, that you might seek after that which is better than any earthly enjoyment; and bend your necks to that which is able to yoke down every unruly passion, and every inordinate desire; that thereby you may obtain everlasting peace.

"The others that were shown me were all white stones. There was no dirt upon them. Though there had been many slips, and many omissions, yet they had been all washed away and remitted. There remained only one, which was, that I had been sometimes too thoughtfully spoken to them; and as that sprung from a good intention, it was also remitted; and then, friends, the peace, the comfort, and sweetness that I felt, was unspeakable.

"I was desirous to leave this as a legacy with you. Oh, you that are young, seek after it. Press after that divine help, which alone can make you possessors of that peace which the world cannot take away."

New African Explorations.

In the work of African exploration, Belgium is now taking the lead of all the countries of Europe. Her extraordinary enterprise in this direction results from the active interest shown by King Leopold, who is the President of the General European Society, formed to carry forward the work of opening the Dark Continent to scientific research and commercial enterprise. This Society has branches in England, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium and Austria, which contribute to its funds, besides prosecuting more or less of American research on their own separate accounts. Last year Belgium kept an expedition in the field in the region west of Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika. Next season she will have four parties at work upon a joint plan, which is much the most comprehensive yet undertaken. It contemplates nothing less than the meeting in the heart of the continent of expeditions coming from the north, south, east and west.

The four Belgian parties organized for this great project are now preparing to start from Brussels. The first, under Colonel Wouvermanns, will go to the east coast, and, striking westward from Dar-es-Salaam, a port near Zanzibar, will proceed to Lake Tanganyika, passing over unexplored ground for a portion of the distance. After mapping the southwestern shore of the lake, they will cross the hill country to Lake Moero-Okata and ascertain whether the river Luabalo flows into that body of water. Then they will go northward to Nyangwe, the point of meeting for all the four expeditions. The second party, under Professor Dusief, will leave Capstadt on the east coast and follow in the footsteps of Livingston on the river Zambesi as far as Lethosi, where they will turn northward, in order to reach Lake Bangweulu, the least known of the great African lakes, which it is their chief purpose to explore. They expect to overtake Colonel Wouvermanns' party in Casembe, and go on to Nyangwe with them.

The third party, commanded by Colonel Stranch, is to meet Stanley on the Congo, and aid him in the exploration of that stream. They take with them a fleet of small stream boats, which can be transported in sections and carried around the falls and rapids of the lower river for service above. Mr. Stanley has collected a force of 1,000 natives at Vivi for the portage of these boats. From the head of possible navigation on the upper Congo, wherever that point may be, Colonel Strauch's party will make their way to Nyangue. The fourth expedition, under Emil Banning and Captain Theis, starts from Khar-toum, at the junction of the White and Blue Niles, and ascending the White Nile to the Albert Nyanza, will explore the western shore of that lake, and passing through the Uregga country, will join the other expeditions at Nyangue. After the four parties meet, the probability is that they will seek the east coast at Zanzibar, though the route of the homeward-bound journey is not yet determined. It will be at least two years before we can expect to hear the results of this splendid scheme of systematic and extensive exploration.—New York Tribune.

How an Old Pasture Cured Consumption.

The family of my old colleague, Dr. G., of Namur, adopted a young relative who had lost his parents and his only brother by febrile consumption, and was supposed to be in an advanced stage of the same disease. The Antwerp doctors had given him up, his complaint having reached the stage of night-sweats and hectic chills, and, though by no means resigned to the verdict of the medical tribunal, he had an unfortunate aversion to anything like rough physical exercise. But his uncle, having from personal experience a supreme faith in the efficacy of the open-air cure, set about to study the character of the youngster, and finally hit upon a plan which resulted in the proudest triumph of his professional career. Pierre was neither a sportsman nor much of an amateur naturalist, but he had a fair share of what our phenologists call "constructiveness"—could whittle out ingenious toys and make useful garden chairs from cudgels and scraps of old iron. That proved a sufficient base of operations. The doctor had no farm of his own, and the only real estate in the market was a lot of poor old pastures on a sparsely-wooded slope of the Ardennes. Of this pasture-land he bought some ten or twelve acres, including a hill-top with a few shade-trees and a fine view toward the valley of the Sambre. At the first opportunity, one of Pierre's garden-chairs was sent up to the lookout point, but rain and rough usage soon reduced it to its component elements—scraps of iron and loose cudgels. Pierre volunteered to repair it, and was supplied with such a variety of materials and tools that he made two more chairs, and while he was about it also a rustic round-table with a centre-hole corresponding to the diameter of one of the shade-trees. The bill was only two miles from town, and soon became a favorite evening resort of the G. family; but the road was rather steep, and Mrs. G. appealed to the ingenuity of her constructive nephew,—could he not try and make a winding trail by knocking some of the rocks and bushes out of the way? Pierre tried, and his success, the uncle declared, proved him an intuitive engineer, the peer of Haussmann and Brunel. That new road had so increased the value of the old pasture, that it would be worth while to put up a pavilion and make it a regular hill-top resort. The only drawback upon the advantage of its situation was the want of good drinking-water; but there was a sort of a spring in an adjoining pasture on the opposite slope of the ridge,—would Pierre make an estimate of the number of bricks requisite to wall it up and keep the cattle from muddling it? The requisition proved an under-estimate, but Pierre made up the deficiency by collecting a lot of passably square stones. The water now became drinkable, and somehow the rumor got abroad that Pierre had discovered the spring, whereupon his uncle's neighbor urged him to exercise his talent for the benefit of his valley-meadow, in all but the want of water the best pasture in the parish. Pierre selected a spot where a lot of day-laborers were set to work, and actually struck water—by digging deep enough. The gratitude of the farmer was almost too demonstrative for the modest lad, who, however, agreed with his uncle, that a talent of that sort might make its possessor a public benefactor, and ought to be cultivated. Would Pierre undertake to locate a well on his uncle's hill-pasture, a little nearer to the lookout point? The brick-spring was too far down, and it would be so convenient to have water on one's own premises. Judging from analogies, the young hydrologist fixed upon a spot at the junction of two ravines, but too near the upper boundary of arboreal vegetation, and after digging down to a stratum of dry sandstone detritus, the workmen gave up the job in disgust. But Pierre himself would not yield his point, and offered to dig the well alone if they would give him time and a boy to turn the windlass of the sand-bucket. His wish was granted, and before he had been a week at work, his asthma had left him, his digestion improved, and his appetite became ravenous. The well-project had finally to be relinquished, but his uncle consoled him by purchasing the adjoining lot and letting him make a winding road from the brick-spring to the hill-top. The road was built, but Pierre indorsed the opinion of a professional engineer that the well-hole, too, would be full of water if the woods of the upper ridge had not been so ruthlessly destroyed, and that the replanting of forest-trees along the line of the subterranean water-courses would not only replenish the springs, but redeem the arid pastures of the foot-hills. The doctor controverted that point, but—just for the sake of experiment—procured a hundred beech-tree saplings, which Pierre planted and watered with untiring assiduity. Some sixty per cent. of the trees took root, to the unending astonishment of the uncle, who now declared that his confidence in the fertility of the ridge-land had increased to a degree which encouraged him to try his luck with orchard-trees. They procured a lot of young apple, almond, and apricot trees, about two hundred of each, and planted them along the line of the suppositive water-courses. Pierre superintended the work, and was kept so busy for the next eighteen months, that he had no time to be sick for a single day. The boy that was given up by the Antwerp doctors is now a well-to-do horticulturalist, able to climb without a stop the steepest ridge in the Ardennes, and to fell a forty-years' oak-tree in twenty minutes!—Dr. Felix Oswald, in the "Popular Science Monthly."

"The life being the truth and the way, go not one step without it, lest you should compass a mountain in the wilderness. Let the enjoyment of the life alone be your hope, your joy and consolation, and let the man of God feel those things that would lead the mind out of the cross, for then the savor of life will be buried, for it was only with the man while he was in the life of innocency."

For "The Friend."

Religious Items, &c.

Boy Bishops.—The English correspondence of the Episcopal Recorder revives one of the peculiar customs of Salisbury Cathedral—a selection on the feast of St. Nicholas (6th 12th mo.) of a boy bishop from among t choristers, whose term of office lasted on Innocents' Day, on the 28th of the month. The boy was invested with the full authority of a genuine prelate; dressed in episcopal robes and mitre, carrying also the pastoral crozier. His fellow-choristers, for the boy named, acted as prebendaries, and were obliged to render due homage and respect to such. The evening before Innocents' Day there was a special service, attended by the juvenile prelate and his juvenile clergy, solemn procession, chanting hymns as they marched up the aisle to the choir. There the little bishop took his seat on the episcopal throne, surrounded by his youthful clergy, when a solemn service was rendered in remembrance of the massacre by Herod of the male children that were in Bethlehem. Multitudes used to assemble to witness the spectacle; and so great was the crush that special enactments were passed to prevent any undue crowding of the little fellows. The boy elected as prelate died during his term of office—twenty-two days—his funeral was conducted with the pomp and ceremony of a veritable prelate; and he was buried in his full canonicals. There is a monument on which he died during this brief period of official life, carved in stone, with mitre on his head and crozier in his hand, and two angels with canopy over his head, keeping in memory this reminiscence of a by-gone age.

Opium Traffic.—The Government of Madagascar, having heard of the evils of the opium traffic in China and other lands, has prohibited the growth of the poppy by the following clause in its new code of laws, lately published: "The planting of the poppy is forbidden on the Island of Madagascar, and whosoever shall plant the same shall be fined $100; and in case of failure to pay, the guilty shall forfeit every 6d. unpaid spend a day in long irons chains." Such a law is a credit to the Government of the Christian Queen of Madagascar. Our treaty, prohibiting Americans in China from engaging in any way in the opium traffic is honorable to us as a Christian nation. The world is waiting to hear from England; and Gladstone cannot afford to halt much longer over the question, "Where shall we get our Indian revenue?"—Chris. Adv.

It has something of the odor of a garden-spices, rather than of the convict's domain when we read that: "The convicts in the Ohio Penitentiary have sent $100 to Michigan sufferers. They raised this sum by denying themselves the luxury of tobacco and the sale of trinkets which they had made."—Ep. Recorder.

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Winkle, or Ladle-Shell.—One of the most common objects to be met with on the sea-shore are the strings of egg-cases, or capsules of the Winkle, or ladle-shell. These strings vary from 12 to 20 inches in length and contain from 40 to 75 capsules. The first few capsules are always small and barren, while the others contain from 50 to 100 eggs. After having exhausted the jelly-like substance with which the capsules are charged, the young Winkles eat their way out through tough membranes at the ends of the egg-cases. On escaping from the capsule, the young Winkle buries itself in the sand, leaving only the end of its siphon (through which it breathes) exposed.

When newly laid, the egg-cases are of a light creamy color, and the tough, leathery substance of which they are composed is translucent. These egg-cases are deposited by the Winkle when buried underneath the sand. Several deposits are made from early in the spring until late in the fall.

The Winkle does not like a rough rocky bottom, and frequents only sandy and muddy bottoms. It feeds on small crustaceans and graptolite worms. "The flesh of the Winkle," says A. W. Roberts, in the Scientific American, is the toughest of all marine food that I have eaten. Still, there is a colony of colored people back of Keyport, N. J., known as "Winkle Town," from the fact that its inhabitants are largely on Winkles, whose shells line the inside in large heaps. In Europe the Winkle is known as the pear-shell, because of its shape; in this country it is called the laddell-shell, because the fishermen when calking their boats, sometimes use the empty shell to get in the tar into the seams. On our Jersey coast, we believe, it is known as a Conch, though it is very different from the West Indian shell of that name. The Winkle is one of the largest shells on the North American coast, sometimes measuring seven inches in length. It is found from Cape Cod to Mexico. Hay for Fuel.—A missionary of the American Sunday-school Union in Central Dakota, writes that at one of his schools, situated on prairie, one mile from the nearest house, when a meeting was held to organize, the question was asked, "What shall we do for fuel, with which to warm the house?" Coal was there very expensive, and wood is scarce as high as, so nearly all the farmers burn in their stoves at home. One of the ladies suggested that each family bring one hay in their wagons when they came to school. It was so decided, and the children were to twist the hay and place it in the wagons. The hay is twisted with the hands into long knots or skeins, resembling somewhat a skein of yarn. It makes a hot fire, but burns out quickly, which makes it necessary for one person to remain near the stove and as fireman.—Selected.

Let the Heart Rest.—I was able to convey considerable amount of conviction to an inquisitive scholar a little time ago by a simple experiment. I was in his house, and he was drinking wine and singing its praises. He

Life is chequered o'er with woe,
Bid the ruddy bumper flow,
Wine's the soul of man below.

He said that to me every morning in order, he said, to rouse my flagging spirits. I said, "You singing that song well. Why not begin with wine at breakfast, and give it to your servants?" "My dear friend," he said, couldn't get through a day. I should be ready as possible. I couldn't, and as for servants, if I gave it to them I don't know at what would happen." Then, when do you give it?" I asked. "When the cares of the day are over, there's the time for a few glasses of wine and a nightcap." "Will you," I said, be good enough to feel my pulse as I stand here?" He did. "Count it carefully. What does it say?" "Your pulse says 74." I then sat down in a chair. "Will you count it now?" "Your pulse has gone down. Your pulse is now 70." I then laid myself down on the couch, and said, "Will you take it again? What is it?" "It is 64; what an extraordinary thing!" "What is the effect of position on the pulse?" When I lie down at night that is the way nature gives your heart rest. You know nothing about it, but that beating organ is resting to that extent, and if you reckon it up it is a great deal of rest, because in lying down my heart is doing ten strokes less per minute. Multiply that by sixty and it is 600. Multiply it by eight hours, and within a fraction, it is 5000 strokes different, and as my heart is throwing up six ounces of blood at every stroke, it makes a difference of 30,000 ounces of lifting during a night." "That is a curious fact; but what has it to do with me?" "When I lie down at night without the alcohol, that is the rest my heart gets; but when you take your wine or grog you do not allow that rest, for the influence of alcohol is to increase the number of strokes, and instead of getting this rest you put on something like 15,000 extra strokes, and the result is you rise up very seedy, as you yourself have said, with the result of a restless night, and unfit the next day for work until you have taken a little of the wine which fills the ready bumper, and which you say is the soul of man below." His wife said, "That is perfectly true. The night is attended with a degree of unrest and broken sleep which I can hardly describe, and which gives me very much anxiety." That had an influence. He began to reckon up those figures, and to think what it meant lifting up an ounce so many thousand times, and in the result he became a total abstainer with every benefit to his health, and, as he admits, to his happiness.—Dr. Richardson.

Example.—Light will shine, true religion will be acknowledged and felt, and a faithful Christian example will have power. A young minister stated, that at one period of his life, he was almost carried away by the arguments of infidelity; "but," said he, "there was one argument in favor of Christianity I could never get over, and that was the consistent Christian life of my father." And when a young lady, on uniting with the church, was asked, "under whose preaching were you converted?" Her reply was: "Under no one's preaching; it was under Aunt Mary's living." And of even Peter and John we are told, that it was their open and bold and faithful avowal of the crucified Saviour, that led all to "take knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 7, 1882

The following graphic account of a movement towards Arkansas on the part of some of the poor colored people in the south-western portion of South Carolina, will interest many of our readers. It is taken from a letter dated 12th mo. 30th, 1881, and written by our friend David Heston, who is now engaged in a religious visit among the Freedmen in some of the Southern States.

When accompanying D. H. on a previous visit of this kind, the advent of the New Year found us in the interior of South Carolina, and abundant opportunity was then afforded of seeing the unsettlement and distress among the colored people attendant upon the renewing of their leases for the plots of ground which they cultivated. There was reason to think that in many cases, they were unfairly treated; at least they themselves so believed. What was witnessed at that time enables us to understand the eagerness with which a plan of escaping from oppression has been embraced by those whom D. H. has recently been among. There would seem to have been no properly organized scheme of emigration in this case, but a spontaneous rush of the people, hoping to benefit themselves by a change of residence, but without proper means of transportation or subsistence, and without arrangements for homes or food to be occupied at the end of their journey.

Unless supervision and assistance are received from some source outside of themselves, it is scarcely possible but that great suffering and much loss of life must befall these emigrants.

"I must now tell thee something of the unsettlement in Aiken and Edgefield counties, which has resulted in an extensive exodus movement. Thou knows, I presume, that these counties have long been noted for the wickedness of many of the white population, and for the gross injustice done the colored people in many ways. Although as far as the political situation is concerned, peace and quiet seemed to increase and spread, since the Democratic party managed (by means of their own general control of the polls; yet there was still much dissatisfaction among the blacks, on account of the oppression and unfairness, and often downright dishonesty of the land owners, who so generally manage to get every thing, and the Freedmen nothing save the most miserable suffering and want. This continual state of things, when added to the poor crops generally, (occasioned by the drouth the past summer,) became so exceedingly discouraging to a large portion of the Freedmen that many of them felt their situation growing really desperate and that something must be done, if possible, to relieve them from this long-continued suffering and want. So a plan was devised to send chosen men to spy out a land, if not one flowing with milk and honey, one, at least, where with an earnest and honest effort they might manage to live with some small degree of comfort, and with brighter prospects before them for the future.

They accordingly sent three men, one of them a minister among them. These, after a trip far as Little Rock, Arkansas, concluded that that was a desirable part of the country for their people to flee to. Their report on their return appears to have spread over this unsettled section with great rapidity, and many hundreds were eager to go, and not a few seemed willing, if needs be, to suffer almost any hardship, even to death itself, in an attempt to reach what they were led to believe to be a good land for them to live in.

As the first of the year is the time to change tenants in the south, it was thought that by the 20th they must be ready at Augusta for starting off on trains which they hoped their leaders would be able to charter for them. So on the appointed day they began to pour in, (though I can hardly say began, as quite a number (300 or 300) were there the Seventh-day, and took train for Atlanta,) and the time I reached Augusta a perfect crowd had assembled in and around the Union Depot. I had passed several groups on their way to Augusta as I drove down from Edgefield, trudging along through the mud, and wet to the skin from the heavy rain that prevailed nearly the whole day. I was naturally somewhat anxious to see how things looked at the depot. So as soon as I had my horse cared for and got my supper, I wended my way to where they were collecting, and was quite unprepared to find such a motley crowd as I found standing and squatting in and around the large depot. Some were moderately well dressed, others were 'in rags' for certain. All colors, all sizes and ages, mixed up among piles of boxes, trunks, bundles, &c., formed a curious medley that, but for the serious aspect of affairs was calculated to produce or provoke a smile. But the thing was too grave for this. I soon found two children very ill, one not likely to live many hours; while all around me I beheld that which soon brought over me feelings of sadness. In interesting myself a little, by enquiring if something could not be done to better protect and shelter the poor things, for the night at least, I was soon picked out by a policeman as 'the Nankoo who was giving his insolent behavior,' and I don't think there were many around but what thought it such. I spent most of the evening around among them, talking with one and another, and hearing what they had to say, and greatly did I desire that some one was with me better qualified than I was to counsel them, and help them in any way possible. I spent a considerable part of the next two days among them. Not that I could do much to help or alleviate, yet I did what I could in a small way to relieve a few special cases, and to extend advice to some others, feeling sorry I could not do them more good.

Although each gave a large number who had the money, paid their fare as far as Atlanta and went on, yet the crowd seemed not to diminish, and was continually on the increase. I found many men without wives or children, were deciding to walk the 750 miles, concluding they could subsist somehow on the road, and reach their journey's end in a month or so; while others who had, said they would gladly walk if it were not for their families. There were flocks of ragged little children, of almost all ages, and of infants of a few weeks old, while here and there were to be seen men and women bending with age and its attendant infirmities, yet as anxious as any, apparently, to go to the new country they had heard talked so much about, where, I suppose, they hoped to end their days in comfort.

That these people have often been greatly wronged, there can scarce be a doubt; but whether relief is to come from the desperate move now in the shape of winter, remains to be seen. All tell much the same tale of their wrongs,—that they are at the mercy of cruel and unprincipled men, who care only for themselves, and who at the end of the year are sure to produce an account against them sufficient to make all they have raised. As one expresses it, 'They bring out a paper and number some tens and figures they do not well understand, and then sum up the amount with 'an 6 is an 0 and a 9 is a 9, all the corn and cotton is mine.'"

The printed Minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting, the Larger Body, have come to hand, from which we learn that the meeting commenced 10th mo. 7th, 1881.

A proposition to revise the Discipline and change the manner of appointing elders, resulted in the appointment of a committee to make such revision, and report next year.

A proposal to establish a Quarterly Meeting in Arkansas, to be called Siloam, was referred to a committee, who are to visit its constituent meetings and establish the Quarterly Meeting, if they see fit.

The statistical tables give the number of members as 4555. The number of births for the year was 137, and of deaths 56. In our own Yearly Meeting, the deaths, we believe, outnumber the births.

A bequest of $1000 had been left to the Yearly Meeting by Thomas Wells of England, the income to be applied to educational purposes.

A joint committee of men and women was appointed on addressing other religious bodies on the proper observance of the First-day of the week.

Returning minutes were prepared for 26 visitors, 19 of them in the station of minister.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Martinez, the Chilean Minister, at Washington, has received a despatch from his Government, stating that the latter has issued a manifesto to the former, giving the reason why Chili went to war with Peru, and defining "in a measure" the Chilean policy in reference to the present difficulties. The circular has been forwarded to Martinez and other Chilean envoys by mail.

Chin Lan Pin and Yung Wing, the retiring Chinese Ministers, on Seventh-day last presented to the President their letters of recall, before leaving Washington on the night train for San Francisco. The new Chinese Minister, Cheong Tiao In, was then presented to the President, and the customary compliments were exchanged.

A despatch from Santa Fe, New Mexico, reports that the Navajo Indians threaten reprisals for continued petty outrages inflicted upon them by whites, "attached to or following the movements" of the Atlantic and Pacific Railway. The Indians have had their dogs and other domestic animals killed, their tepees pulled up during their absence, and suffered other annoyances.

A despatch was received by the Indian Bureau recently from the Navajo Agency in New Mexico, asking for the immediate shipment of smallpox vaccines, to vaccinate 500 persons, as the small pox is spreading there.

The assessed valuation of Colorado is $96,059,000, an increase of $23,000,000 since 1880. During the year just closed the output of bullion from that State, according to the lowest estimate, was $20,000,000, and over $1,000,000 was spent in the construction of railways. In the city of Denver more than $4,000,000 was expended in the erection of new buildings, and the total assessed valuation of the city shows an increase of $9,400,000 during the year.

Extensive coal veins have been discovered near Grand Junction, Iowa, on the line of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway.

The State Treasurer of Iowa reports that the receipts of that State during the two years ending 12th month 1st, were $2,426,900, and the disbursements $2,065,050, leaving a balance of $91,850. "Funds are now on hand to meet every legitimate demand against the State, a condition not before attained since 1876."

The sale of postage stamps, stamped envelopes and postal cards for the quarter ending 9th mo. 30th last, amounted to $7,017,788, an increase on the sales for the corresponding quarter of 1880, of $1,099,100.

The factories in Richmond, Virginia, sold during the year 1881, $32,802,756 of their products—$8,097,864 more than in 1880. The shipping of the port of Richmond increased about 50 per cent. during the year.

Statistics of the trade of Petersburg, Virginia, during 1881 show a large increase in all branches of trade with the preceding year. There was an especially large increase in the receipts of cotton and tobacco.

Engineers are now surveying a route for a railroad from Danby, Vermont, to a point on Lake Champlain, opposite Ticonderoga, where the lake is to be bridged. The length of the route is 55 miles. This road will be the links connecting the Massachusetts Central and Grand Trunk railroads will, it is stated, make a route from Boston to Chicago 150 miles shorter than any other now in existence.

The coinage at the U. S. Mint in this city during 1881 aggregated, it is reported, 9,977,210 gold pieces valued at $67,372,810; 9,212,900 silver pieces, $9,175,203.75, and 40,264,525 live, three and one-cent pieces, $248,151.75.

Deaths in this city for the week ending 12th mo. 31st were 414, as compared with 350 for the previous week, and 392 for the corresponding week of last year. The number of males was 205, females 209. There were 62 deaths from consumption; from small pox 29; pneumonia 28; crop 17, and diphtheria 16.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3½'s 104½; 103½; 114½; 4's, registered, 117½; coupon, 118½; currency 6's, 130. Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported 12½ a cent, per lb. for uplands and New Orleans. Petroleum.—Standard, 7 cts. for export, 81 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 1100 barrels, including Minnesota extras $6.50 a $6.75 for clear, and at $7.12½ for strap; Penna. extra family at $6.25 a $6.95; western do. at $6.30 a $7.25, and patents at $7.50 a $8.25.

Wheat.—Wheat is quiet and rather lower. Sale 2600 bushels red at $1.40. Rye is steady at 97 cts. bushel. Corn is in steady request and firmer. Sale 5000 bushels including new yellow and white, at 68½ cts.; old yellow, at 70 cts.; do. mixed at 69 cts.; new sieumet, at 67 a 68 cts., 45, No. 3, at 66 and rejected at 65½ cts. Oats are quiet but firm. 8 of 6000 bushels, including white at 51 a 52½ cts., rejected and mixed at 50 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 12th 31st, 1881.—Loads of hay, 150; loads of straw, 100. Average price during the week.—Prime timothy, $5 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 100 pounds; Straw, 75 to 95 cts per 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—A large consignment of cotton has arrived at Oldham from Bremen, one firm alone taking bales. It is said that the cost is a farthing below Liverpool.

The Dublin correspondent of the Times, reviews the events of 1881 in Ireland, says: The year has been in confusion, contention and a war of races and class. Commercial credit is broken. The spirit of the country is sunk in deep depression. The agricultural class has no outlet for its produce. The mercantile class has abated. The result of the year's trade shows a decrease of 30 cent. in imports. The Irish cattle trade is improved.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says: "The Government has opened negotiations with France, Germany and America for a visit to the large industrial centers of America, etc. The result of the year's trade shows a decrease of 30 cent. in imports. The Irish cattle trade is improved."

It now appears that the wheat crop of France is 294,000,000 bushels, while the quantity necessary for her consumption is 352,000,000 bushels.

An inventory of the property in Paris belonging to the city estimates its value at about $200,000,000.

A despatch to the Times from Tunis says: "The ability and durability of the submission of the tribe the south of Tunis are doubted by all acquainted the native feeling. It is generally believed that it will be an extensive rising in the spring."

Several Portuguese journals publish articles inciting the Government to take measures to regulate the emigration of people of the Azores Islands to Sandwich Islands, and complaining of the treatment received by Portuguese in Hawaii.

Two expeditions are to be sent out next year (1) by the German Government for observing the trip of Venus. One will proceed to the month of the Plata River and the other either to the Straits of Malan or to the Falkland Isles. The expedition of cost the Government about $150,000, but the one of the latter is not to cause a greater expenditure than $175,000.

Reports from Warsaw show that the damage do property during the recent riot there is enormous portion of the city was virtually destroyed.

A Russian expedition to take scientific observations on the coast of Kamchatka, during the year 1881 started on the 27th ultimo.

At last accounts, the outbreak of small pox in Sydney New South Wales, was assuming alarming proportions.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.

Wanted, numbers 2 and 3 of the "Tract Repository Reports of the Tract Association of Friends," for 1879, 1880, and 1881; and the "Discipline of the Yearly Meeting of Friends," the different editions. Copies of any of the above may be sent to the Store, 304 Arch street.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE
New Franklin, (Twenty third Ward), Philadelphia
Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL.
Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Members.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 14, 1882.

NO. 23.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,

No. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,

AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS, PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Extracts from the Diary of Rebecca Dewees.

In reading some of the memoranda left by his dear friend, I have believed they were adapted to stir up the pure mind in others, and to comfort and encourage some who are earnestly pressing towards Zion,—the everlasting, heavenly home of those who are redeemed from the spirit of the world.

She was the daughter of James and Anna Edgerton, and was born on the 10th of 9th mo. 1822, in Belmont Co., Ohio. The country was then newly settled, and in one of the localities of fever, to which such districts are liable, her father was taken away, leaving her mother with a flock of little children to be trained and cared for. These duties were faithfully performed; and she has been heard to describe the manner in which she took the one which had dropped from her husband's side, and labored for the support of her family, while the tears of sorrow for her loss flowed on her eyes. The divine blessing rested on her labors for the spiritual and temporal welfare of her offspring.

In 1847, Rebecca Edgerton was married to Jesse Dewees, and removed to reside with him in Morgan Co., Ohio, which continued to be her home for the remainder of her life.

For many years she was in the habit of occasionally writing down her mental exercises, the desires of her heart, or the acknowledgments of gratitude for seasons of spiritual refreshment. Many of these memoranda are chiefly Scripture quotations, which expressed her feelings at the time, or had been revived in her memory with comfort or instruction. The earliest of these is dated in 1848, when she was about 22 years of age. On 11th mo. 1st of that year, she writes:

"What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me? This day has been one of renewed favor, a feast of fat things; enough in humiliation of the creature, not attended by conflicts and baptisms. May I long be remembered; and may it please Him whose compassions fail not, to seal on our minds the impressions made this day; and graciously grant the feeble petitions which have been poured out as incense before Him."

The main bent of her heart and desires was to serve the Lord and to be united to Him in an everlasting covenant. He, who thus drew her to Himself, did not fail to answer her petitions, and gave her a sense of the forgiveness of her sins and acceptance with Him. Yet she continued to feel the need of watching and praying, lest she should slide into a careless or lukewarm state, and thus lose the crown immortal promised to those who continue the warfare against sin to the end of life. The following passages from her diary will show her humble view of her own attainments, her watchfulness, her gratitude for seasons of refreshment from the presence of the Lord, and her fervent concern for the eternal welfare of others.

1844. 12th mo. 13th. "One thing have I desired of the Lord, and that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life to behold the beauty of the Lord and to inquire in his temple; for in the time of trouble He shall hide me in the secret of his pavilion, from the strife of tongues."

25th. "I have opened my mouth to the Lord and I cannot go back." "Oh strengthen me, I beseech thee, O Lord, to make a full surrender, faithfully to perform my vow, though it require the sacrifice of things dear, comparatively, as an only daughter; an unserved sacrifice is what thou requirest; a free-will offering alone is pleasing in thy sight. Oh make thou me as the passive clay in thy Heavenly hand; form and fashion as seemeth good unto thee, and in thy own time and will, restore to my bosom the enjoyment of peace. But spare thou not until thou hast subdued all—until thou hast made me what thou wouldst have me to be."

1845. 4th mo. 27th. "But I am poor and needy, yet the Lord thinketh upon me. My soul is bowed this day in humble thankfulness under a renewed evidence that the Lord thinketh upon me—though unworthy of the least regard. And while reviewing my past life, and the many hours I have spent in levity and forgetfulness of God, how am I lost in admiration that I am yet spared. Oh may I never more offend—never more grieve thy good Spirit; but may my few remaining days be wholly consecrated to Him who has been my support in distress, my shield in danger, and an ever-present helper in the needful time."

6th mo. 3d. "O that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness. As I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle." "Oh for a little strength to endure; Oh for more of that patient endurance which marked the footsteps of him who thus bemoaned the departure of his Lord; and oh for ability to resist the insinuations of a cruel enemy; and a renewal of faith and confidence in the unfailing Arm. Revive thy work in the midst of the years; in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy."

7th mo. 11th. "Concluded this day, as at many others, that there never was a heart so feeble, so unstable—now mourning over past offences, lamenting my poverty of spirit, and resolving, through the help of the Lord, to walk more in his fear—and now yielding to my volatile disposition, and indulging in mirth and vanity. What shall I say. I appear to be farther removed than ever from the right way. The Lord is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets, by vision nor by dreams. But I desire not to murmur, I know that his ways are equal and just; I feel that He hath not dealt with me after my sins, nor rewarded me according to my iniquities; and that it is of his unbounded compassion that I am yet spared—yea, and desire to ascribe thanksgiving to Him, though unworthy to take his sacred name on my lips."

12th. "Last night I watered my couch with my tears under a fresh extension of unmerited mercy; how was my cup made to run over, even at a season when I dared not ask for favor—never more deeply felt my unworthiness in the Divine sight; surely with the Lord is forgiveness that He may be feared."

7th mo. 20th. "While assembled this day with my beloved friends for the solemn duty of divine worship, felt it almost impossible to withhold crying aloud, even for sorrow of heart; and though this has been, in a degree, often my portion, I think never before was I so deeply plunged, never before felt such anguish of spirit. But in the end the language sweetly arose: 'Though thou slay me, I will trust in thee; and I felt that I could adopt the language of the prophet: 'In the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name, and to the remembrance of thee.' And I had also to remember this cheering declaration: 'The Lord will comfort Zion, He will comfort all her waste places, He will make her wilderness like Eden and her deserts like the garden of the Lord. Joy and gladness shall be found in them, thanksgiving and the voice of melody.'"

(To be continued.)

Our Heavenly Father, in his good providence, sends us blessings sometimes by one, sometimes by another and very differently gifted servant. Let us remember there were twelve distinct tribes in Israel, each bearing a different standard, each inheriting a different blessing; nor could he who belonged to one, transfer himself to another; yet all formed one army, all looked to one sacrifice of atonement; all had the same ark, over which was the same mercy-seat, in which was laid up the same holy law, the same sweet manna of promise, and the rod of the same High Priest; and while each stood in his own division, all were united in one great body under one Lawgiver and one Captain of their salvation.

—M. A. Schimmelpenninck.

For "The Friend."

Colorado and California.

A friend has kindly placed in our hands a series of letters from Colorado and California in 1880 and 1881; with permission to extract therefrom such portions as might interest our readers. The writer is one whose habits of close observation and scientific knowledge, give value to his remarks.

The first letter is from Colorado Springs, near the base of Pike's Peak, Colorado, and was written on 4th of 7th mo., 1880.

"We have been pretty quietly settled in our new home in the West, with little or nothing of interest to communicate, or I might have written earlier. We occasionally take an afternoon's drive in the neighborhood. Have visited the 'Garden of the Gods,' about five miles distant, 'Monument Park,' ten miles north, and Cheyenne Cañon, some six miles south of this place. The wonderful tower and cathedral-like red granite rocks, rising up hundreds of feet, nearly perpendicular, out of an almost level plain, that are found in the first, I have no doubt are familiar to thee from better descriptions of them than I can give.

In Monument Park there are hundreds of statue-like rocks, standing singly and in groups, from 10 to 30 feet high. The rock is a light colored coarse sand-stone, and each monument is capped with a hard, flat stone, forming what looks like a broad-brimmed hat to the figure, and explains at a glance the origin of the form. Where the same kind of rock occurs on the brow of a hill, and is more largely protected by the surface rock, it takes the form of an old ruined fort or castle.

Cheyenne Cañon is not a cañon proper, but a deep ravine from which a small stream flows from out the mountain. You enter it between red granite rocks, two or three hundred feet in height, and these become higher as you ascend the stream, until they become a thousand feet high, and are terminated at the top with turrets and towers. About a mile from the entrance the cañon terminates in a sort of an amphitheatre, with nearly perpendicular walls, on one side of which descends a small cascade from the mountain above. Like every thing one sees here, this gorge in the mountain is simply grand. There is nothing, it seems to me, in the natural scenery here that is either picturesque or beautiful. As its vastness cannot be portrayed on canvas, it must be seen to be appreciated.

About two weeks ago, K. W. and myself joined an excursion party to the Grand Cañon of the Arkansas, about 60 miles south-west of Colorado Springs, but some 90 by railroad. We first went 45 miles south to Pueblo, then by a branch road west up the river. Owing to some of the excursion party being behind time in starting, the train was half an hour later than it should have been in leaving, and as a consequence we lay switched off more than half the time, in uninhabited parts generally, waiting for the regular trains. We had plenty of time, therefore, to see what grew on the brown lands near by. The cacti were the most conspicuous,—some of these were four or five feet high, and covered with brilliant crimson flowers. These were full of branches, while there were smaller ones, nearly globular, half buried in the ground, with yellow flowers.

In one place where we stopped under a high cliff, we noticed thousands of cliff-swal-low's nests, plastered up against the rocks; but did not see a bird; but whether the nests had been deserted, or the birds had not yet arrived for the summer, we could not tell. These nests had longer necks to the entrance than with us.

The railroad has within a year been completed through the cañon, and is here spoken of as a wonderful piece of engineering. In one sense it is. But as it is built in the only possible way it could be, it did not require a great deal of skill or planning as to the how. For some twelve miles, the rocks on either side descend from a vast height above, either nearly perpendicular or very abruptly into the river, which is all the way a roaring, headlong torrent. In some places there is a small beach,—but perhaps half the way none. At an elevation of ten or fifteen feet above the surface the road-bed has been formed by cutting out the rock and tumbling it down on the beach or into the river—the grade being that of the river, which is pretty steep. As the river is very winding, the road is very crooked and the curves short. Only a small reach of the river can be seen at any one time; and the immense height of the wall on both sides, from one to two thousand feet, I think, makes it appear as though the whole train were completely enclosed with a wall of rocks. Standing in the front door of the baggage-car, and looking ahead, I found it difficult, and often impossible, to tell to which side of the river the wall directly ahead of us belonged.

How wide the river really was in its narrowest parts I do not know, but it certainly did not appear to be more than 15 or 20 feet. At the Royal Gorge the train stopped, and we got out of the rear of the train and walked back on the track. The immense height of the cliff, and the roaring, rushing river, was almost too much for weak nerves, and many soon retreated to the cars; and I soon found myself feeling dizzy. On returning we had the same kind of luck as in going, and as a consequence did not get home till after midnight.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

"Learn of Me."

The above is the language of one who said, "I am the way, the truth and the life," and "he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." It is the language of Him of whom the Father spake in the transfiguration, saying, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well-pleased; hear ye Him." And "Moses truly said unto the fathers, a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; him shall ye hear in all things, whatsoever he shall say unto you." And it is the language of this same prophet who invitingly said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest to your souls." So let us hear Him, and learn of Him, for He has left us an example that we should follow his steps. And one of the first, and perhaps the greatest lessons that we have to learn in following Him, is meekness and lowliness of heart. For it is "the meek He will guide in judgment, and the meek will He teach of his ways." "And they that hear shall live." "For He will guide them by his counsel and afterward receive them into glory."

But we have to take his yoke upon us, as learn of Him. And "it is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because I hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth in the dust, if so be there may be hope. He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him, though he be filled full with reproach." Yet the reproaches with which our Lord was reproached will fall on us if we turn our backs upon the world, and our faces towards Zion. But "if we be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are we, for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon us." And by it we are made more largely to partake of his blessedness. As we are thus brought down in humble prostration before Him, as in the verdant, we can most availingly learn of Him, the silence of all flesh, who is meek and lowly in heart. So let us be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world. And He will, amid all our tribulations, if we confidently look to Him, and learn of Him, enable us to overcome also; and finally to be made "more than conquerors through Him that loved us."

It is good for a man that he bear the yoke of Christ until all that is unruly or lofty brought under into subjection to his will. There is much about us naturally that is wayward, and that needs the restraining yoke to keep us within the bounds of his government. Even in our places of worship, we often find that which is wild and unruly, or inclined to overleap the gospel bounds. The wandering and roving imagination of the busy mind has much need to bear the yoke of Christ in order to keep man in the heavenly inclosure, that he may feed with Him of the pastures of life, and that he might hear Him, and learn of Him who is meek and lowly in heart, and find rest in Him for the wear and heavy laden soul. For when we present ourselves before the Lord, as the sons of God did in the days of Job, Satan may present himself also. And as he is the same wandering spirit now, unless we are wearing the yoke of Christ and learning of Him, he may take our wandering spirits or minds with him into the world or into "the volume of the Book," and assist us in hunting up a multitude for us to offer to the God of heaven, which may be no more acceptable than Canaan offering was, which was of the earth.

Now this same Jesus that spoke outwardly to his disciples, while He was yet personally with them, saying, "Learn of me," told them also, near the last of his visible mission, that it was expedient that He should go away. But He "would pray the Father, and He shall give you another comforter, that He may abide with you forever,—even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him, but ye know Him; for He dwelleth with you and shall be in you." The world, or the people of the world, did not see Him, then, nor know Him; neither do they now. But He not only dwells with his humble follower but in them as their spiritual guide, to guide them into all truth, and even to show them things to come. How can this be, only as we hear Him, and learn of Him the way to the kingdom, who is the way, the truth, and the life; and who said, "No man cometh to the Father but by me." As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God

And if we are not led by the Spirit of God, and are not taught by Him, and if we do not learn of Him, we are not His children. And if we are not His children, we are not heirs; and if we are not heirs, we shall not be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. If we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his. But if we are his, and turn to Him with full purpose of heart, and take up our daily cross and follow Him in the way of regeneration, He will, by his grace, "teach us, that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world." And if we hear Him and earn of his teachings, He will, by his co-operating workings on our willing hearts, redeem us from all iniquity. Not by his works alone, nor by our works alone, nor by faith alone. For as the work without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also."

While the children of God are led by his Spirit, and fed spiritually with heavenly food, so as to grow strong in the Lord; it is said, "And dust shall be the serpent's meat." And the children of the wicked one are fed with earthly food, and grow strong in his cause on that; and are led by the groveling, twisting, wining serpent. Yet the power of our glorified Redeemer is over all the powers of the enemy; and greater is He that is in us, than he that is in the world. So let the thimble, trembling, wrestling seed of Jacob, be of good cheer. For as Christ overcame the enemy and the world, He will enable us to overcome also. And if we hold fast our confidence steadfast to the end, and continue faithful and patient in well-doing, and continue to earn of Him, and lean not to our own understanding, we shall, in due season, if we faint not, reap a glorious reward in a better world; where "the wicked cease from troubling, and he weary soul be at rest." For Christ says: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne."

D. H.

Dublin, Ind., 12th mo, 14th, 1881.

Carl Springel.

A SOUTH GERMAN INCIDENT.

Carl Springel is the name of a boy who is held in remembrance over half of Germany, or a deed of self-sacrificing heroism which is unparalleled in the legends of Greece and Rome, or in the annals of more modern bivalry.

It is not so very hard for the soldier to face bullets and cannon-balls upon the battle-field, or he knows that while there are many chances of death there is still some chance for life.

Carl Springel, a poor, lame German boy, to be many human beings from an awful death, walked straight into the face of certain death itself, and met it like a hero.

On the 19th of [Eleventh month], 1867, a terrible rain storm swept over Southern Germany. For twenty hours the rain poured down in such torrents as had never before been known in that region, and it seemed as if the day were to be the beginning of a second deluge. Rivers overflowed their banks and little streams were swollen into rivers.

At nine o'clock at night the storm raged on with unabated violence, when Carl Springel set out on his crutches from the hut in which he lived, alone to carry an evening repast to his parent, who was on watch-duty at the bridge over the "Devil's Gulch," on the Great South German Railway.

The Devil's Gulch is a fanciful name given to an immense cleft in the rocks, two hundred feet wide and a hundred feet deep, which had been spanned by a strong bridge of wood and iron, believed by the engineers who constructed it to be capable of withstanding all possible assaults of wind and water.

It was the duty of Wilhelm Springel—Carl's father—to keep guard at this bridge on stormy nights, and warn the oncoming trains of any lurking danger which might exist.

Beneath the bridge a mountain-stream boiled and bubbled in ordinary times; on that night the heavy rains had swollen it to a furious torrent.

Carl Springel hobbled slowly along upon his crutches through the almost Egyptian darkness of the night, half blinded by the rain, but buoyed up by the thought that he was bringing cheer and comfort to his beloved father.

When within a hundred yards of the bridge, an awful crash sounded out upon the night-air loud above the din of the storm, and a shudder of horror ran through his brave young soul.

It was the bridge—the bridge which had been deemed impregnable. The bridge had succumbed to the fury of the water, which rushed down upon its foundations in irresistible torrents from the mountain side.

Hurrying on as fast as he could, Carl reached the railroad track, and his worst fears were realized. Upon the track, some ten feet away from where the entrance of the bridge had been, was his father's hand-car, with his red lantern burning dimly in it, and by the lantern's light Carl could see the full extent of the disaster. Every section, every timber of the bridge had been swept away, and the yawning gulf and the roaring flood were all that were left.

"Father, father!" cried Carl, in his loudest tones. "Father, father," he called again, "where are you?"

But no answering voice responded, and there rushed across his brain the terrible certainty that his father had gone down with the bridge.

For a moment his breast was filled with unutterable anguish. But it was only for a moment. Quick as thought, it flashed upon his mind that it was almost time for the last night train from the great city above to come rushing along with its living freight.

No danger-signal gleamed from the watch-tower upon the bridge, and on they would come, unsuspecting of their peril, until it would be too late, and they would be dashed in a moment into the seething flood, more than a hundred feet below.

What was to be done? Forgetting for the instant the great woe that had befallen him, Carl decided at once that it was his duty to supply his father's place, and warn the train of its peril in time to save it, if possible, but what could he do?

The tempest increased in its fury, and the rain poured down as though it could never stop. Hark, the train is coming! Already he heard it rumbling on toward destruction, and it must be near, or he could not hear it above the storm.

He cannot run with his poor, crippled legs, so he throws himself upon the hand-car, and nerves himself for a mighty effort.

As though his own life were at stake, he begins to turn. Slowly at first, then faster and faster, he drives the car in the direction of the approaching train.

On, on dashes the mighty iron-horse; nearer and nearer it comes. Oh, if he can only warn them while there is yet time to stop the train! If he can only get far enough off to save the train from rushing headlong into that terrible grave!

Around the mountain side, on the curving track, the train speeds along. The gleam of its lights is now shed upon the valley, and the boy knows that the supreme moment is at hand.

On thunders the engine, and the track trembles beneath the heavy burden. Suddenly, around a sharp bend a hundred feet away, full on his sight, bursts the blazing head-light of the engine.

Ceasing from his labor, Carl Springel braces himself with one hand, and, grasping the red lantern in the other, swings it wildly above his head.

"The bridge is down! The bridge is down!" he cries with all his power. "The bridge is down! The bridge is down!"

The engineer has seen him, but cannot save him. With a dull thud, the engine clears the obstruction from the track and dashes along—but slower and slower now.

The hand-car and the boy are hurled fifty feet through the air, and when the boy is found his body is crushed, mangled and lifeless. But the train is saved. Trembling, gasping, staggering, the engine halts—halts not a dozen yards from the mouth of the yawning chasm—and all on board are saved. Saved by the unparalleled heroism of this crippled boy who has given up his life that they may live.

Two years ago, in a quiet village cemetery in the south of Germany, I saw the grave in which he sleeps. Upon a modest tombstone at its head, erected by the gratitude of those whose lives he had preserved, is this inscription:

CARL SPRINGEL,

AGED 14.

"He died the death of a hero and martyr, and saved two hundred lives."

A hero and a martyr he was indeed, and, some time yet, bards and poets will sing the story of this brave, young peasant boy of Germany.—Sabbath Visitor.

The Immigrant Woman's Testimony.

In Fifth month, 1880, the Dutch steamer, Rotterdam, arrived in New York with about 250 Hollanders who had come to seek homes in the new world. Most of them were able to start for the West the same day the vessel entered New York. Some fifty or sixty, however, remained until the next day. A. H. Bechtold, pastor of the Holland Church in New York city, having met his countrymen on their arrival, and aided in speeding the strangers on their way, availed himself of the opportunity afforded by this delay in giving the wayfarers such suggestions and religious counsels as he might for their profit.

The Christian Intelligencer gives an account of an interview which occurred at the Holland Hotel, where A. H. Bechtold, after welcoming the new comers, gave them appropriate religious counsel, and in conclusion expressed the hope that none of them had embraced the principles of "modernism," which is the Hollandish name for the most advanced Rationalism and skepticism. For some minutes there was entire silence. At last one man arose and said, "We cannot refrain from offering you our sincere thanks for your kindness to us—in getting our baggage quickly through the custom-house, and changing our railroad checks, &c., &c., without any pecuniary gain to yourself, and especially for your cordial welcome and useful suggestions on our landing. It gives us a good impression of the land in which we intend to make our home; and we shall write back to our friends that New York is not so bad a place as people are wont to say." But we do not agree with your doctrinal views. We are all 'moderns,' and do not believe in the Bible as 'you do.' Here many joined in, crying, "No, no; we cannot accept the stories in the Scriptures—the wonderful things that fly in the face of reason and science."

To this A. H. Bechthold answered that he was not surprised at their way of talking. Of the 1,400 ministers of the Reformed Church in Holland, 1,100 are more or less "modern" in their teachings; and so every city and hamlet is filled with the pernicious influence. What else could be expected from a generation thus taught and trained, than a contemptuous disregard of that blessed book, for the peaceful possession of which their fathers poured out blood and treasure without stint, and fought battle after battle for eighty long years? "But a little while ago you told me that a poor man could hardly make a living in Holland, and that the increasing and intolerable taxation, the hateful aristocracy, &c., are driving every man, who can, to emigrate. There must be a cause for this. Go back fifty years to the time when 'modernism' crept out from the schools of Groningen and Leyden. Then there was no need to emigrate—plenty of work, plenty of food, and taxes comparatively light. The children obeyed their parents, and there was harmony and peace in the family circle. But now there is a great change for the worse. Modernism led the Separatists to leave their native land for conscience' sake, banished the Bible from our schools, and led to a sad decline in morals. And so God has withdrawn his blessings. If you have brought this evil spirit with you here, I could almost wish that you had not come; for we Americans believe that the prosperity of our land is due to the faith of our fathers—a faith which, by God's help, we mean to preserve; making the Bible our [outward] rule, acknowledging the God it reveals, and seeking to do his will in all things. Now, if thousands of so-called Christians like you come here and spread your views, I fear lest the same evils which prevail in Holland should prevail among us, and we should come to be in the sad condition of every land where the Bible is not loved and honored." He then exhorted them all to become true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ.

After he resumed his seat, there was again an interval of silence. At length a woman got up and said, "The dominie is right. The man who spoke before is my husband. And now let me confess that the time when we both joined the church, about thirty years ago, we did it in that simplicity of faith which made us extremely happy. We obeyed our parents, harmony and love prevailed between me and my husband, and we were prosperous on every side. But I cannot and will not deny that since we embraced 'modernism,' about ten years ago, it has gone ill with us. Peace has left my soul. Our families are not in harmony, and our children are not obedient. None of you" (turning to the company) "can deny that this is the case. But now let us take the advice of the man of God. Let us forsake the deceitful doctrines of 'modernism,' and since we have landed in a new country, let us live a new life, a life of faith and holiness."

In this strain she continued for some time, and her words made a deep impression upon the whole company. The circumstance is the more remarkable, in that she first joined her husband in the opposition to the truth; but the Spirit of God so blessed the word spoken by his servant, that her conscience was aroused.

Let faith in God (and the word of his grace) die out in any community, and it will soon be found that that is a good country to emigrate from. No advantages of soil or climate or government can make a nation happy, peaceful, or prosperous, unless they regard the [Scriptures] and fear and love the Lord their Maker.

Some of the evils alluded to in the foregoing, from the "Christian Intelligencer," are just what we have sometimes feared for our country in view of the great influx of foreign immigration with their, so-called, "Modernism" of practical unbelief. If according to Holy Scripture, righteousness alone exalteth a nation, then from the leaven of unrighteousness so increasingly overspreading the land in this way, is there not ground to fear that we too may, in time, witness a withdrawal of the blessings of heaven hitherto enjoyed, because of the prevailing looseness of religious principle? It was pleasant to be able to note that A. H. B.'s words so influenced those of his countrymen whom he addressed, as to induce the desire to turn from their apostate course, and resolve to "live a new life—a life of faith and holiness."

For "The Friend."

REFLECTIONS AT MIDNIGHT,

While sitting at the bed-side of a sick friend, (Mercy Ellis, &c.)

[The account of Mercy Ellis, recently published in "The Friend," has brought to light the following affectionate tribute to her worth, from one who herself has since passed to the unseen world.]

Soon will the closing scene of life be over,
And all we've loved will unto dust return,
The green sod of the valley rest above thee,
Covering more fair than costly stone or urn.

Yes! the bright sun that long has beamed unclouded,
Shining on all with mild and placid ray,
In sorrow and in passing cloud is shrouded,*
To beam more perfect in an endless day.

Oh! I have seen thee when thine eye was glowing
With holy raptures, and thy voice was sweet
As a light zephyr, o'er a harp-string blowing,
As thou discourest of what thou soon wilt greet—

Heaven and its joys—on thee they soon will open,
And thy pure spirit sanctified and free,
Will meet the One of whom thou oft hast spoken,
Whose name, whose words, were ever dear to thee.

Yet though thy sojourn upon earth is lengthened,
Thy counsel and thy care been given so long,
And much thy precious words our hearts have strengthened—
Still would we stay thee here—but that were wrong.

* In allusion to her disease having induced temporary delirium.

"Enter thou in, thou good and faithful servant,
Into the joys thy Lord prepared for thee."
This was thy frequent language, pure and fervent,
This the reward that thou wilt surely see.

Then would we wish thee yet on earth to linger?
Thou, whose whole life has been a constant prayer—
And constant yielding to God's holy finger—
A longing after Heaven. Go rest thee there!

S. E. L.

Muncy, 1844.

THE IVY IN A DUNGEON.

MACKEY.

The ivy in a dungeon grew,
Unfed by rain, uncheered by dew;
Its pallid leaflets only drank
Cave-moistures foul, and odors dank.

But through the dungeon grating high,
There fell a sunbeam from the sky;
It slept upon the grateful floor
In silent gladness evermore.

The ivy felt a tremor shoot
Through all its fibres to the root;
It felt the light, it saw the ray,
It strove to blossom into day.

It grew, it crept, it pushed, it clomb—
Long had the darkness been its home;
But well it knew, tho' veiled in night,
The goodness and the joy of light.

Its clinging roots grew deep and strong,
Its stem expanded firm and long,
And in the currents of the air,
Its tender branches flourished fair.

It reached the beam, it thrilled, it curled,
It blessed the warmth that cheers the world;
It rose toward the dungeon bars;
It looked upon the sun and stars.

It felt the life of bursting spring,
It heard the happy sky-lark sing;
It caught the breath of morns and eves,
And wooed the swallow to its leaves.

By rains, and dews and sunshines fed,
Over the outer walls it spread;
And in the day-beam waving free,
It grew into a steadfast tree.

Upon that solitary place,
Its verdure threw adorning grace;
The mating birds became its guests,
And sang its praises from their nests.

Wouldst know the moral of the rhyme?
Behold the heavenly light! and climb.
To every dungeon comes a ray
Of God's interminable day.

AFFLICTIONS.

As a desolate field,
Left exposed and bare,
To winter storms and chilly, frosty air,—
Yet only thus made ready for awhile,
That richer there the harvest grain may smile;
So is the heart whose sod,
Tender and green,
Hath deeply been
Upturned by God.
His sprouting blades laid low,—
Yet only broken thus by grief's plowshare,
That in its furrows He might sow
The seed of righteousness, which shall increase—
Until it yield the harvest of eternal peace.

WEDDED LIFE.

And if the husband or the wife
In home's strong light discovers
Such slight defects as failed to meet
The blinded eyes of lovers,

Why need we care to ask? Who dreams,
Without their thorns, of roses;
Or wonders that the truest steel
The readiest spark discloses?

For still in mutual sufferance lies
The secret of true living,
Love scarce is love that never knows
The sweetness of forgiving.

For "The Friend."

As we stood around the grave of our dear H. F., on the 28th ult., the words of a loved minister, who was early gathered to his heavenly home, forcibly passed before me. He says: "The messenger of death seems to repeating his visits to our little company, though truly painful are these final separations, such events, I think, are calculated to eminently profitable.

We may gather at the grave side, not only see the remains of a departed friend or neighbor consigned to their last resting place, to ask ourselves how it stands with us in relation to so awful a matter; and whether our day's work has kept pace with the day, and that witness for God in every bosom, and the place our everlasting safety and happiness demand for it."

at no. 24, 1882.

Help in the Time of Need.

Henry G. Stephens, writing in the Daily Standard, gives the following interesting incident, which he heard related at a meeting in Five Points, New York, many years ago. The speaker was a man poor as to this world's goods, but rich in faith.

"My friends, you all know who and what I," he began. Here he paused for a moment, glanced around the brilliantly-lighted hall, at the eager upturned faces before him, and then added: "But no, I see that there are several persons present who are strangers to me, so I will inform them that I am Willie, the coal carrier. I walk up and down the streets of the city every day with my coal shovel and basket over my shoulder, reaching sharp to the right and to the left for places to carry coal and wood into houses and stores, and for any other jobs of rough, hard work that I can get to do. In this way, I get a little help from my feeble but willing hands. I have earned a comfortable living for myself and family for several years. In some months past I have had a deal of sickness in my family, and two weeks ago I found that my little store of savings was exhausted. For several days after my money was all gone I did find nothing whatever to do. For forty-five hours I was without a morsel of food; and for twenty hours my poor wife and children had nothing to eat. My wife was sick at the time, and unable to work; and my children were slowly recovering from a fever. I needed nourishing food to assist nature in her work of restoring their health and strength. Late in the afternoon of the fourth day, as I was walking along one of our up-town streets, closely on the lookout for a job, the baker's wagon was driven up to the curbstone line, and stopped; just as I arrived opposite the wagon the baker lifted out a basket of bread, and disappeared with it around the corner of a street, to serve it out to his customers. There were several large baskets of bread in the wagon, each filled with loaves of bread. I put my shovel and basket down on the sidewalk, and stood there and looked at the bread. Oh, how hungry I was. It did not come to me, then, that I had never been really hungry before. I was famishing for the bread that perished in the using. Oh, how I did dig for a sum of money sufficient to pay for one of the smallest of those loaves. Then the baker came to me and said, 'Pick up your shovel and basket: snatch one of these loaves of bread; throw it into your basket, and then run away as fast as you can go. No one is looking at this moment, and you can get off without detection!'

"No—no, no," said I, 'I can not steal!'

"Fool," said the devil, 'it is not stealing; it is simply helping yourself to food when you are starving. The baker will be none the poorer for the loss of a single loaf; indeed, he will never miss it. Hurry up; snatch a loaf and be off with it.'

"No—no, no," said I again, 'I can not steal the bread.' 'Do it, fool,' urged the devil; 'you are too proud to beg, or to make your wants known to the benevolent. You will find no work to-day. Are you going to starve yourself to death when there is an abundance of food before you, and all you have to do is to stretch forth your hand and help yourself to it? Now is your time. Snatch a loaf and run. Quick, quick, quick!'

"No, no, no," said I, 'I love Jesus; I can not steal the bread; I love Jesus; I put my trust in Jesus; I will not steal the bread!'

I did not say all this out as loudly as I am relating it to you to-night, but in an undertone. I could not have been heard by any passer-by.

Well, just as soon as I said those words, the devil left me, and I was no longer tempted to steal the bread, and I did not feel half so hungry as I was before. Yet still I stood there on the sidewalk and looked at the bread. I could not help it. I was as if rooted to the spot. All at once it occurred to me that it was growing late, and the chances were that I would find no work to do that day, and if I did not I would have to go home empty-handed to my expectant wife and children. The thought made me cry, and I cried, and cried, and cried, until the big tears rolled from my eyes down my cheeks, so that I had to use my coat sleeves to dry them. I suppose it was because I was so weak and feeble, and sore broken. Then I thought I would call on God for help, and I said in a low tone of voice, 'Oh, Lord God, my Heavenly Father, for Christ's sake help me to find some work to do to-day, and give me the necessary strength to do it, that I may earn a little money to buy food for myself and family.'

I can not beg while I am able to work, and I love thee—oh, I love thee too much to steal. My wife loves and serves thee; my children all love thee. Oh, Christ, forsake us not.'

"Well, while I stood there crying and praying and drying my eyes on the sleeves of my coat, I felt the weight of a hand upon my shoulder. I started and looked up, expecting to see a policeman, and to hear his gruff voice say, 'Move on; no loafing allowed on this thoroughfare;' but, instead, there stood a tall, handsome, well-dressed gentleman, with a very benevolent countenance, and with his right hand resting on my shoulder. He put his face close to mine, looked me straight in the eye, and said, in a kindly tone of voice and manner, 'My friend, are you ill? What is the cause of your apparent distress? Come, tell me all about it.'

"So I up and told the gentleman the whole story, just as I have told it to you to-night. He heard me through, and then he took one of my great, hard, rough, coal-stained hands in both of his, and he squeezed it and shook it heartily, and said, 'Bless the Lord! How glad I am that I came this way; how glad I am to have met you, my brother. I am happy to know that you love Jesus so much, and that you put your whole trust in Him. I was on my way to Broadway through another street, but I changed my mind, and turned into this instead, for I thought I would like to see the changes and improvements which have been made on it of late. No doubt the good Lord sent me expressly to relieve your wants. Cheer up, my brother, brighter days may come to you.' The gentleman then let go my hand, went to the wagon and picked out six of the largest loaves of bread and put them into my arms, one after another, like sticks of wood. At this moment the baker came to us, looking very much astonished at the liberties we were taking with his goods, and said, 'What are you doing with my bread?' The gentleman bowed and smiled, and taking out his pocket-book, he very soon satisfied the baker that he was doing a very good thing with it for me. Then the gentleman took two large newspapers out of his pocket, and bending over my old black coal basket, he very neatly and nicely lined the inside of it with them, and taking the bread out of my arms he put it in the basket. Then he took my hand in his again, and said, 'The Lord bless you, my brother, keep you faithful, and give you a home in heaven when He is done with you here. Give me your name and address, please.'

So I told him my name and where I lived, and he wrote them in his memorandum-book, and then picked up my shovel and basket, handed them to me, and sent me on my way home rejoicing. Not long after my return home, and while myself and family were eating our bread with thankful hearts, the door of our room was opened by one of our neighbors, and in walked our generous benefactor. He took me to a large grocery store, and bought a lot of provisions, which he ordered sent to my house at once. There were some canned fruits for my convalescent wife and children, tea, coffee, sugar, butter, potatoes, and other things. The next day I called on him at his office by appointment. Several gentlemen came in to see him on business, and he made them take an interest in me and promise to give me work. Since then I have had all I can do, and I am saving a little money every day. So you see, my friends, that Jesus will help his own, when they put their trust in Him."

At this point a man sitting near the door, whose ragged and filthy garments, bloodshot eyes, and coarse, red face, plainly proved that he was smitten with poverty, and degraded in the extreme by vice, interrupted the speaker, and said with a derisive laugh, "And so will the devil, too!"

"That's so," said the speaker, "the devil will, and often does help his own, but he always manages, sooner or later, to get them into trouble, and then and there he leaves them to get out of it as best they can, or to be punished for their folly in putting their trust in him. What has that to do with you, Jim, that makes you stand up for him to-night. The color of your face and eyes, and the wretched condition of your clothes show that, although you have been, and are still, a good and faithful servant to him, he has not dealt fairly nor kindly with you. Oh, my dear friend, forsake the evil one and put your trust in Jesus, as I did, and as I have done for two years past, and you will find Him a very present help in times of need and trouble."—Henry G. Stephens in Daily Standard.

Resist temptation till you can conquer it.

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

1842. In our meeting for worship at Falls, our beloved Friend Christopher Healy spoke impressively, saying, "The righteous shall have tribulation, but the Lord will deliver them all," holding up to view the necessity of having living faith in the Divine promises, and then tribulations will be borne patiently, and our faith will increase with our trials. There is but one sure foundation, but one foundation that will stand when all things else fail; and unless we build rightly thereon we cannot be saved.

The Divine will revealed in us is always in accordance with the Scriptures; he had never found it different.

He spoke of the necessity of having faith in that Almighty power which a servant of old described in this language, "The sea saw it and fled; Jordan was driven back; the mountains skipped like rams and the little hills like lambs. What aided thee, O sea, that thou fleddest, thou Jordan that thou wast driven back, ye mountains that ye skipped like rams, and ye little hills like lambs?" This was the power that gathered our Society from the maxims and customs of the world, from the forms and ceremonies of a lifeless profession, from all will-worship, and from a hireling priesthood; and though many may fall on the right hand and on the left, yet the faithful will be preserved.

He believed that if our members walked answerably to our high profession, there would be an hundred come unto us to where there is one now; and we would be as a city set upon a hill that could not be hid; our conduct would then speak louder than words; and many would be invited by our example to come, look upon Zion, and behold Jerusalem, a quiet habitation, with none of its stakes broken nor cords loosed.

1842. Attended meeting. Our beloved Friend Christopher Healy bore a short but impressive testimony to the excellency of silent waiting, and warned us against suffering our silent sitting together to become a mere formality; that if our practice is merely to come and sit down in meeting and abstain from words, without endeavoring to have our thoughts gathered to the Master of assemblies, we shall never know the excellency of silent waiting, and perhaps never experience that state of mind which will afford us a lively hope beyond the grave; but if we maintain the warfare and struggle for the blessing, the Lord may condescend to favor us as He did a faithful servant of old, that man after God's own heart; "The Lord inclined unto me and heard my cry, and He raised me up out of an horrible pit, and out of the miry clay; and set my feet upon a rock." How encouraging! "And He established my goings, and put a new song into my mouth, even praises to our God." G.

Beat My Sheep.—An apostle recommends "speaking the truth in love," but some preachers overlook the words "in love," when they read the text. One of these ministers, after preaching a flagellating sermon, was approached by a brother, and requested to preach from the text, "Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, Beat my sheep." "No, no!" said the pastor; "you are mistaken, my brother. He said 'Feed my sheep.'" "Ah, did He?" said the old man, with a searching look into the pastor's face; "I thought methinks you read it, 'Beat my sheep.'"

The Betrayer Betrayed.

History informs us that when, several hundred years ago, the Knights Templars of Jerusalem—an order of knights specially organized and set for the defence of the Holy Sepulchre against the infidel Moslem—consented, for the sake of a paltry bribe, to betray into the hands of their sworn foes their own allies, who, together with themselves, were engaged at the time in the siege of Damascus, these traitor knights were straightway and most effectually punished for their perfidy by being disappointed after all, of their bribe; since, as we are told, the coin with which the wily Turk took occasion to reward their baseness proved to be utterly worthless, because counterfeit. A signal instance truly of what is sometimes called poetic justice—the betrayer betrays, the hypocrite mocked, the counterfeiter paid, as it were, in his own coin.

Is it not ever thus with sin and the sinner? The former delights to hold out the most tempting offers; to make the most dazzling, but delusive promises; to display the gilded bait, the beguiling bribe. He, however, that is deceived thereby, clearly is not wise. Nay, no man ever yet consented, for the sake of any inducement whatsoever, to venture on to the devil's ground, to accept of any of Satan's beguiling prizes, but found sooner or later, and to his bitter sorrow, that in so doing he had been duped.

These reflections have been suggested by the late very sad case of O. L. Baldwin, the defaulting cashier of the Mechanics' National Bank, Newark, N. J. Sin yielded her golden bribe here. Baldwin yielded to the temptation, consenting, in the hope of gain, to betray the sacred trusts committed to his hands. Was ever coin more utterly worthless than that which is found to reward his guilty complicity with evil in this case?

What more pitiable, indeed, than this man's testimony to a friend visiting him soon after the mournful disclosure of his crimes? The poor victim was ill in bed. His weeping, broken-hearted family surrounded him. "I know," said the ruined man, "I know I have done wrong; I know I am guilty; I expect nothing but to go to the penitentiary." Lo, here, reader, the rewards of sin? Yes, look into that once charming but now darkened and desolated home, and behold this melancholy, this truly monumental instance of the betrayer betrayed.

How different all this from the rewards and promises of religion! Promises these that never in a single instance have failed of fulfilment, that have never once been known to be "protested," but which have always been ratified in perfectly good faith.—R. H. Howard.

Nothing Finished.—I once had a curiosity to look into a little girl's work box. And what do you suppose I found?

Well, in the first place, I found a "bead purse," about half done; there was, however, no prospect of it ever being finished, for the needles were out, and the silk upon the spools was all tangled and drawn into a complete wisp. Laying this aside, I took up a nice piece of perforated paper, upon which was wrought one board of a Bible, and beneath it the words, "I love—;" but what she lo was left for me to guess. Beneath the B board I found a sock, evidently common for some baby foot; but it had come to a st just upon the little heel, and there it seemed doomed to remain.

Near to the sock was a needle book, cover of which was neatly made, and upon the other, partly finished, was marked, "my dear—"

I need not, however, tell you all that I found there; but this much I can say, during my travels through the work box I found not a single article complete; and still as they were, these half finished, forsaken things, told me a sad story about that little girl.

They told me that, with a heart full of generous affection, with a head full of useful and pretty projects, all of which she had by the means and the skill to carry into effect she was still a useless child—always do but never accomplishing her work. It was not a want of industry, but a want of perseverance.

Remember, my dear young friends, that matters but little what great thing we mean to undertake. Our glory is not in that, but what we accomplish. Nobody in the world cares for what we mean to do; but everyone will open their eyes by and by to see what we men and women and children have done. Children's Friend.

A Specious Delusion.—I had some conversation with an intelligent settler, who was awakened by shipwreck to a consideration of the importance of eternal things; but, I many others, he shrinks from taking up the cross and practising self-denial, and would rather trust solely to the death of Christ, salvation, than esteem his propitiatory atoning as the means of redemption from sins that are past, and of perfecting forever those who submit to the sanctification of the Spirit in obedience, and who consequently seek Divine help continually to keep the precepts of Christ. Such persons would be saved by what Christ has done for them, without troubling themselves much about the practice of what has enjoined; they seem to settle themselves under a kind of systematic delusion, getting the declaration of the Redeemer, "Every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lo, shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven, he that doeth the will of my Father who is in Heaven."—James Backhouse.

"Speak with calmness and deliberation all occasions, especially of circumstances which tend to irritate."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 14, 1882.

The London Friend for the 12th month, contains a detailed report of the proceedings of the "Home Mission Conference" of members of our Society, held in London on the 29th and 30th of 11th month.

The Home Mission work, as stated in Conference, is an outgrowth of the First-School movement. The meetings held in prosecution are not generally held after manner of our meetings for Divine worship.

at in them, singing, reading and expounding the Scriptures, and other methods of inducing the people assembled, are used, much as such meetings are conducted by those of her religious denominations. The chairman of the Conference said, "It had been felt for long time past a very difficult question to answer, in what way the outside mission work was to be brought into harmony with the work of their own Society." The solution of this problem was one of the subjects that animated attention.

It was truly a difficult problem to bring to harmony things in their nature inconsistent—to reconcile the views of Friends, as the leadership of Christ, our holy Head, in the holding of meetings and the performance of religious labor, where the services are arranged by man, and are not dependent any fresh extension of Divine help or commission.

Some of those who took part in the discussions recognized the fact, that the "Conservative element [the attachment to the principles our Society] that existed in many country meetings at present" was an obstruction to their taking up this work as a Yearly Meeting concern. Others thought that "a great change had come over the Society" in the past few years, "that the Yearly Meeting of 1882 held old opinions very different from those of 1861," that "the Yearly Meeting as it now stood was an entirely different creature from that it was a few years ago."

The outcome of the deliberations was the appointment of a large committee to lay the subject before the next Yearly Meeting, with power to call a future meeting of the Conference.

In the remarks made by the different speakers there are several expressions of attachment to the views of Friends, but the impression left on the mind by the whole report, is that of a very marked departure from spiritual doctrines of our forefathers in reference to worship and ministry. It would seem that many earnest and well-disposed persons—who had entered on a line of labor for the good of others, which they were carrying on without constant reference to the Bible and the heavenly anointing for service—had gradually lost their belief in the efficacy of Friends, as to the inefficiency of ordinary human efforts in religious labor; though we may scarcely know it.

The tendency of the whole movement is to destroy the character of our own meetings for worship, and with them any occasion for the tenure of our Society as a distinct organization of Christians. As time and use familiarize the people with the form of procedure adopted in mission meetings, changes will be called for and introduced into the yearly meetings. Our chief hope for the preservation of a "Society of Friends" lies in those who are willing to suffer reproach for their adherence to its original principles and practices; and in the renewed extensions of our Grace which may raise up in unlooked-for quarters those who will be valiant in contending for the faith once delivered to the saints, and in spreading the truth among men. A letter received from a valued, experienced and judicious friend, thus refers to this sub-

The whole report [of the Home Mission

Conference] furnishes evidence of the rapid growth of what may be termed for convenience Modern Quakerism, and the advanced stage which it has reached—practically towards the same footing as other denominations—and our great and vital doctrine of the government of Christ in the church reduced to nothing beyond an empty profession, with alluring and delusive assertions of loyalty to the Society and adherence to its principles. There are some perhaps almost everywhere, very liable from temperament and surroundings to be caught by this spirit, looking at what appears to be the gradual decline going on all around us, and not having implicit faith in, nor patience to wait for, the experience of the church, that which alone can effectually help the church. And thus the sound of the 'workman's hammer' may be heard in various directions; and the unwary are caught by it, and the burdens of some greatly increased thereby, and our own precious principles have to be contended for even again among our own people—in our own midst."

A friend in England has sent us a copy of a small, neatly printed pamphlet, pointing out the opposition of war to the spirit of the petitions contained in the prayer taught by our Lord to his disciples.

A letter accompanying the pamphlet states that from a desire to see a more full conviction of the anti-Christian character of war, inculcated among the children in the schools of our Society, the writer had offered prizes for the best essays on the subject. The present essay is one produced in response to this offer, and was written by one of the scholars at Ackworth.

We have a strong conviction of the iniquity and impolicy of the military system, and rejoice in the evidences that are from time to time presented of the growth of a sound public sentiment in favor of peace. When the kingdoms of the earth become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, through the submission of the hearts of the people to his Divine Grace, then war will inevitably cease. Till then, we cannot hope to see this curse of mankind entirely removed. Under the influence of evil passions and unregulated desires, men often do that which they will admit is contrary to their real interest. There is no effectual remedy for sin and evil, either private or national, but the restraining, regulating power of the Lord coming into full dominion, and being willingly received as the guide and controller of individuals and of nations.

We commence in the present number the publication of some extracts from the memoranda left by our late beloved friend, Rebecca Dewees, of Morgan Co., Ohio. She attended the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, and a few meetings in the vicinity of our city, with a minute from her friends at home, some years since. Her natural disposition was retiring and diffident; and, as her stay among us was short, it is probable that many friends in this section of country will scarcely remember the visit.

In examining the papers placed in our hands, we have been unusually interested in noticing the fervency of spirit, the humility, the watchfulness over herself, the frequent turning of the heart to the Lord in secret prayer, and the longing for a sense of spiritual life and Divine communion, which these memoranda exhibit. They have seemed so edifying and instructive, that a hope is felt that many of the readers of "The Friend" will derive spiritual refreshment through them.

It is but seldom we allude in this part of our paper to the decease of those valued Friends who are passing away from time to time; but we felt willing to refer to the honest faithfulness and self-sacrificing kindness which were such prominent traits in the character of the late Hannah Flanagan, whose death is noticed in the obituary column of the present number.

Like her Divine Master, she went about doing good to others, especially to the poor and neglected; and she has left a testimony in the hearts of many survivors that she was a true follower of the blessed Redeemer.

Having endeavored to serve her generation according to the will of God, when the end of life drew near, she was favored with a peaceful confidence in the Lord's mercy, and an assurance that a crown of righteousness was prepared for her.

The large attendance of Friends at her funeral showed the solid esteem felt for one who had in an unusual degree been kept "unspotted from the world," as well as diligent in helping the afflicted; and the evidence felt at that time, that her "lot was among the saints," was comfortingly precious.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—General Terry, in his report for the Department of Dakota, says that "the buffalo are rapidly diminishing, the Indians are raiding on the cattle, and the ranchmen are organizing for protection."

The great sugar refinery of Havemeyer & Elder, in Williamsburg, N. York, was destroyed by fire on Friday evening last, only the char house, which is five-story high, escaping. The loss is estimated at $1,500,000, and 1000 men thrown out of employment. The insurance is in 276 companies, mostly foreign, and will cover about 60 per cent. of the loss. A new and larger building is to be erected at once.

The arrivals of vessels at this port during 1881 numbered 5216, of which 1364 were foreign and 3952 coastwise. The total tonnage arriving during the year was 1,069,520, as compared with 1,085,495 for 1880.

The public debt statement for 12th month shows a reduction of $12,793,623. During the year 1881, there was a net decrease in the principal and interest of the public debt of the United States of $102,611,777, and the cash in the Treasury increased $31,078,231.

According to the report from the Bureau of Statistics for the 11th month, 3,429,191 bushels of wheat were exported from the port of San Francisco, against 2,719,236 for the same period from the port of New York.

The Independence Tribune states that the experiments in raising cotton in Kansas were highly successful. One farmer raised, ginned and shipped 100 bales of an excellent quality, and others were successful on a smaller scale. The colored refugees from the South, as a rule, understand its cultivation, and cotton may become as certain a crop in Kansas as corn or wheat.

The message of Governor Bigelow, of Massachusetts, shows that during the last year, the receipts exceeded the expenditures $212,304. He advises that the $877,000 of the State debt coming due at the end of the current year, be paid out of the funds in the Treasury.

The total corn crop of Illinois, during 1881, was 174,996,000 bushels, or 70 per cent. of the crop of 1880, and only half that of 1879.

An anti-Prohibition club, with a large membership, has been organized in Burlington, Iowa. The liquor question promises to be an important factor in the politics of that State this year.

The Post-office Department is reported to be engaged in removing the Mormon post-masters in Utah and appointing Gentiles in their places.

Dr. John W. Draper, famous as a chemist and physiologist, died on the morning of the 4th inst., at his home at Hastings on the Hudson, New York, in the 72d year of his age.

Deaths in this city for the week ending 1st mo. 7th,

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 21, 1882.

NO. 24.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for Postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
No. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Extracts from the Diary of Rebecca Dewees.

(Continued from page 177.)

1846. 4th mo. 5th. "This day twelve months ago was a day not to be forgotten by me while memory lingers. The day in which first felt necessity laid upon me to open my mouth in a religious meeting, and to which I yielded; arising with the language of the prophet, 'Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee.' It ever was the conflict. I felt at that awful moment that my life would have been a much sorer sacrifice. But the Lord's people are a filling people in the day of his power. I could have been nothing else but the wonder-working power of Him with whom all things are possible; I have been constrained to acknowledge this amid all the trials, the varied conflicts which have been permitted to attend me. And when I contrast that day of merciful visitation with this of seeming desertion, how does my soul faint within me. The peace, the joy of that day exchanged for mourning, lamentation and woe. Well, am I not reaping the fruits of my own rebellion; if so, why murmur? And if in the ordering of Divine providence for my sanctification and final redemption, why not rather rejoice? Ah! I ever thought this day that I could freely sink the bitterest cup handed by a gracious Father; not of my own procuring, but intended to promote my establishment in the ever blessed truth. Oh the awfulness of being utterly forsaken. I only desire, O Lord, that you wouldst not utterly cast off. Do with me even as thou wilt, only leave me not a prey to my soul's enemy. I acknowledge my utter unworthiness; I have done nothing on which I hope but thy free unmerited mercy. I desire to love and to serve thee. I desire in the midst of poverty and weakness to return acknowledging to thy adorable name, for thou art worthy, worthy both now and forever."

The sense of desertion and sorrow to which is extract alludes, as 'fruits of my own rebellion,' was probably connected with a want of full faithfulness to Divine requiring in her appearances as a minister; she found that she "withholding more than was meet" tended to her own spiritual poverty. Eighteen years rolled away, before she was again entrusted with the commission to appear in this manner as the Lord's ambassador. Ten years after the act of unfaithfulness, whose bitter "fruits" she related above, she makes this record:

1855. 4th mo. 29th. "Ten years of silent exercise have rolled away; what the future is to unfold is only known to Him who seeth the end from the beginning; that I may not be found a loiterer in the vineyard, or like him who buried his talent in the earth, is often the engagement of my heart. And though one act of disobedience to the Divine requiring seemed to have introduced this long wilderness travel, that act, I believe, was through the compassion of Him who is touched with a feeling of our infirmities, mercifully forgiven, and an indubitable evidence afforded that my sins, which were many, were blotted out. That lesson, so hard for human nature to learn, which I shrunk from declaring to others, 'If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross daily and follow me,' was yet for me more practically and fully to be learned. That I might even be found willing to be anything or nothing, to do or to suffer even as our glorified Head and High Priest may appoint, is what my soul secretly craves."

At last her chains were broken, and in 8th mo. 25th, 1863, she notes in her diary—

"Having after a silence of more than eighteen years, felt bound again to manifest my love by my obedience, I turn to take a retrospect of the past; and desire with gratitude to adore that goodness that waits long to be gracious, and whose workings are incomprehensible to poor finite mortals. An act of unfaithfulness to manifested duty seemed the introduction to this long season of silence; but that act was, I believe, through unbounded mercy long since forgiven. But though many, very many have been the trials and provings of that period, I desire with gratitude to say, that many too were the seasons of Divine consolation and favor; some of these in times of retirement, which was my daily practice, are, I think, never to be forgotten. In one of these in particular, after a season of trial and proving, the evidence of pardon and acceptance were so clearly granted that not a shadow of a doubt remained; at the recollection of which my heart has oftentimes overflowed with gratitude. Sunshine and shade have been wisely intermingled, and this season of favor was followed by tossings as on a tempest, many times being ready to conclude that the Lord had forsaken me, and my God had forgotten me. And now, although resolved through the help of the Lord to follow Him in the way of his holy leadings, what constant watchfulness on every hand is needed—neither to offend by omission nor commission. May the Lord in unmerited mercy enable me to make straight steps for my feet."

Her gift as a minister was acknowledged by her friends in 1866, and in 5th mo. 24th of that year, she says: "Had the privilege for the first time of sitting in the Select Meeting, and felt constrained to return thanksgiving, not only for the consolations of the Holy Spirit, but for trials, for conflicts, and provings, &c."

The humility and dependence on the Lord, in which she exercised her gift; and her faithfulness in declaring the truth without concealment, are shown in the two succeeding extracts.

1868. 7th mo. 8th. "'I have opened my mouth unto the Lord and I cannot go back.' The test of love is obedience; but how does nature shrink beyond the power of utterance, at the thought of going forth in the awful work of the ministry. I know that I am utterly unworthy to be employed as an instrument in the Divine hand; and I know that if then wilt be with me, and be mouth and wisdom for me, all will be well. Preserve me, I pray thee, from sinning against thee in thought, word or deed, and from now looking back after having put my hand to the plow."

1869. 1st mo. 3d. "Felt constrained some months since to ask of the friends of my Monthly Meeting the privilege of an opportunity with them with the shutters opened; addressing them in the language of the prophet: 'Stand ye now in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk in it, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.' That in the early days of this Society, their meetings were held, as George Fox expresses it, in the power of God. The life, the truth reigned; and that while I was contrasting that favored season with (as it appears to me) our low and withering condition, I had been led to inquire the cause; that it appeared to me that we were not the same zealous and untiring advocates for truth and righteousness that they were; that we have become engrossed and entangled with the things of time, and lukewarmness and indifference have spread over us; and those precious testimonies which they believed themselves called upon to bear before the world, though great and grievous persecutions and sufferings, even unto death, we have not upheld in their ancient simplicity and brightness. Our testimony to plainness of dress and address, where is it? What difficulties and dangers did they not surmount in the attendance of their religious meetings; and how richly were they rewarded—the power and presence of the Lord being felt among them, humbling and contriving their hearts together, so that on some occasions we read the floor was wet with their tears. And in some instances, where the parents were all thrown into prisons, the children still kept up their meetings. And how is it with us, my beloved friends? How oft when I have taken my seat in our own little meeting with a few of my elder brethren and sisters, has the query arisen, Where are the children? At home, perhaps, in our employment, or at school.

Bear with me, my beloved friends, if I say, should the succeeding generation wholly discontinue the attendance of mid-week meetings, the iniquity thereof will, in a great measure, lie at our doors. It is painful to my feelings thus to allude to these things, and nothing but the belief that my peace consisted in it, has induced me to do it. For truly it seems to me the language addressed to Ephraim of old has become applicable unto us: 'Ephraim has mixed himself with the people, strangers have debauched his strength, yet he knoweth it not.' And just in proportion as we mix with the people in their associations and in their schools, just in that proportion will we lose our strength, though we may know it not."

(To be continued.)

Colorado and California.

(Continued from page 178.)

ORCHARDS, EUCALYPTUS, DUST.

The next letter of the series was written from Los Angeles, California, on the 3rd of Tenth month, 1880. From it, the following extracts are taken.

"We were glad to get away from the cold winds and fogs of Northern California and get a little further south, where at least it is somewhat warmer, if it is not much less foggy, and where you don't have to wear an overcoat both in the house and out doors, to keep comfortable.

I was very much pleased with San Francisco, and found it much more of a first class city than I expected, as well as cleaner and better kept. I think it would rank as a city but little behind New York, Philadelphia or Boston, and ahead of either Chicago or St. Louis; and I can readily imagine it a very pleasant place to live in, if the same care could be taken to warm the houses when they are cold, as we take in Philadelphia. Often while we were at the Lick House, the mercury would fall below 60°, with a cold, raw wind from the sea, that made seal-skin cloaks and overcoats not out of place in the streets; and yet I did not see a fire in any part of the house to sit by."

"We have ridden out two or three times around the neighborhood of Los Angeles, and were last week up at the villa. It is surprising to see the great number of orange trees that have already been planted, besides lemon, walnut and olive trees. Some of the orange orchards appear to be in nearly full bearing; but many of them, where the trees are equally large, have but little fruit on; and I notice that the leaves of many of the trees are very dark with what they call mildew, but which I think is caused by some minute insect. When all the trees now planted are large and in full bearing, the quantity of fruit will be very great in this section of the State, and as it will not bear transportation, at ordinary rates over the railroad, the California market will be in danger of being glutted. I think either olives or grapes a safer crop to depend on. The market for the first, either as pickles or oil, is almost unlimited, and the latter, when not required for the table, can be converted into raisins or wine. It is wonderful to see how the large bunches of the Tokay and Black Hamburg hang on the vines in the vineyards here.

The vines are not allowed to grow more than two feet high, so that a vineyard looks wonderfully like a potatoe-patch. You can buy all you want of the finest grapes at three cents a pound. We think the Hamburg the best, though the Mission and one or two other kinds are somewhat like them, being sweet and juicy. The Tokay and raisin grapes are too solid unless one were hungry.

It is wonderful how rapidly trees and plants grow here when irrigated. The surroundings of N.'s house would indicate with us at least ten years' occupation. The yard and avenue to it are bounded by a complete lime or citron hedge, on the outside of which are pepper trees, some 20 feet high, with wide spreading tops 12 or 15 feet in diameter—making really fine shade trees—the foliage being similar to the Honey Locust, only denser and more graceful.

A row of Eucalyptus trees, planted by him along the road, are from 40 to 50 feet high; and one on his neighbor's grounds, which he says is only four year's old from the seed, I found measured over 3½ feet in circumference, 5 feet above the ground, and it must be nearly 50 feet in height. These trees are now grown here for firewood. N— has apples, pears, peaches, figs, oranges, lemons and olives, in bearing. The last three are still green, but we have been well supplied with all the rest, and with the best of nutmeg melons, nearly every morning at breakfast. In Northern California we found these of an immense size, and very good; N—'s are smaller and still better. Pumpkins grow to an immense size; in a little patch in his orange-orchard, there are a great many that must weigh over a hundred pounds, and few that are ripe that would fall below fifty.

The greatest drawback to this country is the dust. Not so much that that flies up in the air when you drive, as that that lies on every thing and defaces every thing, except flowers and plants, and such things growing about the house as can be washed off with a hose. Just imagine the trees along the roads with you, if there was not a shower all summer; and here the dust is even finer and lighter than in Plainfield. In Colorado Springs the soil was gravelly, and the dust rarely reached the leaves of the trees, and they always looked bright and clean, and you never there got your clothes dirty in walking. Here it matters little whether you walk in the middle of the road or the most carefully selected places, as all are equally dirty. Newly harrowed ground is perhaps the cleanest, as it is free from dusty weeds."

(To be continued.)

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

1842. 12th mo. 25th. In our meeting to-day our beloved friend Christopher Healy handed forth an instructive testimony, setting forth that his mind had been exercised, almost from his first sitting down in the meeting, in a way comparable to our Saviour's answer to those who spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts: "As for these things ye behold, the day will come in which these shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." And these things must be fulfilled spiritually in us as much as they were fulfilled outwardly. The glory of this world must be stained in our view; our delight in the riches, the fashions, the customs, and whatever is worldly, must be thrown down.

There is too much of a disposition in us to shun the cross. We want to come to the Saviour and at the same time hold fast to the things of the world. We are convinced that there is no better profession than the profession of Friends; and we would love to be come religious members and walk answerable to our high profession; but the cross is in the way; we are not willing to suffer for the Saviour's sake, who was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

He had met with many, while travelling and down through the land, who were willing to acknowledge that Daniel's God is the only true God; that there is no better profession than ours; and yet they would not live there. And when the light of the Divine countenance shines upon us, we are almost or quite persuaded to be Christians, and resolved to live in obedience to the Divine will; but when the light is a little obscured, we stumble to the cross and turn away. The question is put to those whom it is for, "What is the cause of these things?"

The cross must be borne though it may lead into singularity, and cause us to be despised and rejected of the worldly-wise. He did not mean to insinuate that we should make ourselves disagreeable in the eyes of the world further than to live in obedience to the Divine requirements. He had felt it as plain as he had ever felt any thing outwardly with his hands, that there were those present that had sustained great loss by going on from year to year, and not sufficiently confessing their Saviour before men. If there had been more faithfulness to the Divine Master's will there would have been more fathers and mothers in our Israel raised up amongst us, to encourage others to come look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities, not one of its stakes broken or cords loosed, and they would have found Him indeed to be their counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace.

For "The Friend."

"The Light of Christ" in man, as a fundamental doctrine of Christianity, was so clearly set forth in the article and selections that head in the 20th number of "The Friend" that it is difficult to imagine how they can honestly be misunderstood or ignored by any of our members. There is also unequivocal testimony to the saving value of the sun-blessed doctrine, contained in to-day's number of "The Friend," in the Address to the Members of Brighouse Monthly Meeting.

It seems timely, thus to re-assert and hold up to view, the sentiments that Friends have always held on this vital subject. In regard to the efforts that have been, and are being made to undervalue it, we may well exclaim: "If the foundation be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" It has been interesting to read some of the exercises of S. L. Grubb fifty years ago, when these anti-christian notions began to be disseminated in the Society, and it is believed they will be of interest to the readers of this Journal. Under date 6th mo. 1833, S. L. G. says:

"What shall we do if we suffer ourselves to be drawn from this blessed Spirit of the Saviour of men, or the measure of it which given to all for our profit? Where but within our own hearts shall we find the Comfort and the safe Guide? Surely the Holy Scriptures direct us to Christ within, the hope glory; but now we are told that in looking for inward direction, we subject ourselves to error, and that the Gospel is to be found in the Scriptures, where there is clear comprehensible truth, and "a direct message from God."

For "The Friend."

"9th month. I think I never knew such a trying time in my day, as the present. I cannot close my eyes to the wide deviations from our ancient testimonies, which is, I believe, least levelling us with the world at large. I grieve, I mourn over these things in secret. Sometimes I tell my sorrow publicly, under the constraining influence of gospel love; and I have a word too, for the bowed down ones. But I am told again and again, that my views are not correct; in fact that there is no occasion to take up such a lamentation for us in this day. Some of us see the necessity of being ranged conspicuously on the side of primitive Quakerism, and warning faithfully of the danger of things creeping in, that from their nature and tendency must divide."

12th mo. 31st, 1881.

An Instructive Comparison.

Most persons know that every butterfly (the rock name for which, it is remarkable, is the same that signifies also the soul—Psyche) comes from a grub or caterpillar; in the language of naturalists called a larva. In the last name (which signifies literally a mask) was introduced by Linnaeus, because the caterpillar is a kind of outward covering, or disguise of the future butterfly within. For it has been ascertained by curious microscopic examination, that a distinct butterfly, only undeveloped and not full grown, is contained within the body of the caterpillar; that this tier has its own organs of digestion, respiration, &c., suitable to its larva-life, quite distinct from, and independent of, the future butterfly which it encloses.

When the proper period arrives, and the life of the insect in this its first stage, is to close, it becomes what is called a pupa, enclosed in a chrysalis or cocoon (often composed of silk; as is that of the silkworm which applies to that important article) and lies quiescent for a time within this natural coffin, on which it issues, at the proper period, as perfect butterfly. But sometimes this process is marred. There is a numerous tribe of un-donies; which in their larva-state are rava. The ichneumon-fly being provided with a long sharp sting, which is in fact an ovipositor (egg layer), pierces with this the body of a caterpillar in several places, and deposits her eggs, which are there hatched, and feed, as grubs, (larva) on the inward parts of their victim. A most wonderful circumstance connected with this process is, that a caterpillar which has been thus attacked goes all during the whole of its larva-life, as those that have escaped. For by a wonderful provision of instinct, the ichneumon-grubs do not injure any of the organs of the larva, but feed only on the future butterfly enclosed within it. And consequently, it is hardly possible to distinguish a caterpillar which has so close enemies within it, from those that are untouched. But when the period arrives for the close of the larva-life, the difference appears. You may often observe the common cabbage-caterpillars retiring, to undergo their change, into some sheltered spot,—such as the walls of a summer-house; and some of them, those that have escaped the parasites, assuming the pupa-state, from which they emerge as butterflies. Of the unfortunate caterpillar that has been preyed upon, nothing remains but an empty skin. The hidden butterfly has been secretly consumed.

Now is there not something analogous to this wonderful phenomenon, in the condition of some of our race?—may not a man have a kind of secret enemy within his own bosom, destroying his soul—Psyche—though without interfering with his well-being during the present stage of his existence; and whose presence may never be detected till the time arrives when the last great change should take place?—

—Whateley's Annotations to Bacon's Essays.

For "The Friend."

The Holy Ghost a Witness to us.

Whilst Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour, is "the faithful witness, and the first begotten from the dead; and who 'loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood,' no less, also, the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father hath sent into the world in that Son's place, and name, and power, is a swift witness within us, as saith the apostle, 'The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits,' &c.; and again, 'The Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me.'"

Nothing short of this quickening renewing power of the Holy Ghost, which is shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour, with the washing of regeneration,—all through redeeming mercy—can save any of us. For can we be savingly baptized, either be the recipients of heavenly gifts, but through the influence of this Holy Anointing? Are not our bodies to be made fit temples of the Holy Ghost? and hereby communion with the Father and the Son alone to be witnessed? Is not the Holy Ghost also a witness to us of the one holy offering of the Lamb of God for our sins, and of the new covenant of light and life of which Jesus is the mediator? Were not the Scriptures written by holy men of old as they were moved by the Holy Ghost? and are we not to pray and to teach, if at all effectual for good, in the wisdom and power which the Holy Ghost giveth and teacheth? Did not Peter and John pray for the Samaritans, that they might receive the Holy Ghost? Were not the saints of old filled with the Holy Ghost? Did not Ananias and Sapphira lie to the Holy Ghost? and was not that represented as lying unto God? Was it not the "stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart and ears," that, in the early day, "did always resist the Holy Ghost?" Did not God anoint Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost? and did not the churches, as recorded by the apostle, walk in the comfort thereof? Were not Paul and Barnabas chosen, and sent forth to the Gentiles by this Quickening Power? and was not the former when consorted with Timothy, forbidden by the same Heavenly Unction to preach the word in Asia? And, lastly, can any one say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost?

Similar examples from Holy Scripture of the living, quickening power and authority of the Holy Ghost—one with the Father and the Word—might be largely multiplied. But surely enough has been presented to show without gainsaying, that, though a doctrine, which is according to godliness," it has perhaps been too much overlooked by some in our Society, in the desire to avoid the other extreme too unduly, though loosely, advanced now more than fifty years ago, of sorrowful remission. Notwithstanding which, the indisputable truth will ever remain: "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one."

This fundamental practical doctrine, so believed in, realized, and acted upon, in the early days of the Christian Church, and which was thus foretold by the prophet Joel: "It shall come to pass in the last days, (saith God,) I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams; and on my servants and on my hand-maidens, I will pour out, in those days of my Spirit; and they shall prophesy;" has lost none of its vitality or applicability down to the present day. More-over how fully our blessed Lord and Lawgiver recognized this doctrine! He was begotten of the Holy Ghost. He baptized with the Holy Ghost. He enjoined not to speak against the Holy Ghost. He breathed upon his disciples just before his ascension and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." And, as the crowning, the unspeakable gift, he promised them "another Comforter," in the place of himself, "which is the Holy Ghost," that should abide with them—with us—forever, teach them all things, and guide into all truth. This is the same efficient, operative, holy power unto man's salvation, as "the Spirit of truth," "the grace of God," "Christ within;" "The more sure word of prophecy;" "The Day-Spring from on high;" "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus;" "The engrained Word;" "the 'Unction;'" "the Anointing;" "The Power from on high;" "The Light and the Life of men."

Is there not ground for many fears, lest the overlooking or practically forsaking, with too many of our members, of this fundamental doctrine of the grace of God and light of Christ within men, where our King and his kingdom must, if ever, be known to come and to be set up, has tended very materially to bring about the manifest outwardness and consequent weakness of our present lapsed condition? If this be in anywise so, how desirable that, as professors of such holy faith, we should seek to have our eyes so anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, as to see the gradual and almost imperceptible falling off in duty, which we, as a Society have, through unfaithfulness, through love of the world, through mingling with the people thereof, and the beguiling influence of Satan, been brought to—once highly favored, but now, too much, a backsliding generation. How much this state of things, we repeat, is owing to a denial, or at least a practical disregard of the precious, universal gift of saving light and grace, as always held by this religious Society, it is not in the ability of the writer to determine. But oh! that all might fully recognise this spiritual and truly gospel view of things; and thence be willing to let Christ, our Alpha, as a little seed—"Christ within the hope of glory"—have due place and be permitted to grow up within them unto precious heavenly increase—the thirty, the sixty, and the hundred fold, to the praise and glory of the Redeemer's all-sufficient grace.

The Quaker standard is an advanced and dignified one; and oh! that we might all rally to, and more and more seek to re-erect and to uphold it,—that standard once set up by our worthy forefathers, and bequeathed as a rich inheritance to us. Do not let us, the successors of such worthy parentage, neither in any-wise cast it aside, nor allow it to trail in the dust through any lukewarmness or indifference; but, rather, rallying to the law and the testimony—the second coming and inward appearing of our glorified Emmanuel—become increasingly handed as the heart of one man, in the faithful advocacy and support thereof; and in strengthening one another's hearts and hands in the ever blessed Truth as it is in Jesus, the unconquered Captain of and unto salvation.

Thus turning inward to Christ's spiritual appearance within them, instead of looking outward for that kingdom, which He himself declared "cometh not with observation," such will find their hearts, to a degree unknown before, oft to burn within them from his compassionate regard and sweet communion. He will more and more beautify the place of his sanctuary. He will show himself strong on behalf of these. He will help against the fear of man. He will cause that the conduct and conversation of these shall adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour. He will confirm and settle them in that precious experimental knowledge of himself which is life eternal.

Seeing, then, all that has been done for us; that man was created by an all-wise power for the purpose of his own glory; and when this Divine image was lost through disobedience and sin, redeemed from its bondage and thralldom, so far forth as to be put into a capacity for salvation, through a Saviour's advent, suffering and death; and, finally, to crown all, permitted access, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, into the grace, and light and sufficiency of Jesus the Son of God,—because of his love being "shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us,"—how should we magnify our calling! How work out our salvation with fear and trembling! How rejoice in the hope of the glory set before us! How watchfully and prayerfully guard against grieving or frustrating in any-wise such an inestimable gift!—giving much heed to the expressive words of Paul to the Hebrews: "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape if we turn away from Him that speaketh from heaven." * * "Wherefore," he continues, "we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear," &c.

The advice of David Hogg on his death-bed to the youthful Livingstone, afterward the celebrated African explorer, is advice that may well be given to everyone, and to which everyone would do well to give heed: "Make religion the every-day business of your life, and not a thing of fits and starts; for if you do, temptation and other things will get the better of you."

WORRIES.

The little worries which we meet each day,
May lie as stumbling-blocks across our way;
Or we may make them stepping-stones to be
Of grace, O Christ, to thee.

THE USEFUL LITTLE GIRL.

A little girl I am indeed,
And little do I know
Much help and care I yet shall need,
That I may wiser grow,
If I would ever hope to do
Things great and good, and useful too.

But even now I ought to try
To do what good I may;
God never meant that such as I
Should only live to play,
And talk and laugh, and eat and drink,
And sleep and wake, and never think.

I may, if I have but a mind,
Do good in many ways;
Plenty to do the young may find
In these our busy days;
Sad would it be, though young and small,
If I were of no use at all.

One gentle word that I may speak,
Or one kind loving deed,
May, though a trifle poor and weak,
Prove like a tiny seed.
And who can tell what good may spring
From such a very little thing.

Then let me try each day and hour
To act upon this plan;
What little good is in my power,
To do it while I can.
If to be useful thus I may,
I may do better by-and-by.

THE BURIAL OF MOSES.

"And he buried him in the valley in the land of Moab, over against Bethpeor: so no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."—Deut. xxxiv. 6.

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's vale,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave.
But no man dug the sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er;
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

That was the grandest funeral
That ever passed on earth;
But no man heard the trampling
Or saw the train go forth.
Noiselessly as the daylight
Comes, when the day is done,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek
Fades in the setting sun;

Noiselessly as the spring-time
Her crest of verdure waves,
And all the trees on all the hills
Open their thousand leaves;
So, without sound of music,
Or voice of their great God,
Silently down from the mountain's crown
The grand procession swept.

Perchance the bald old eagle
On gray Beth-peor's height,
Out of his rocky eyrie,
Looked down on the wondrous sight;
Perchance the lion, stalking,
Still shuns that balled spot;
For beast and bird have seen and heard
That which man knoweth not.

But when the warrior died,
His comrades in the war,
With arms reversed and muffled drums,
Follow the funeral car:
They show the banners taken,
They tell his battles won,
And after him lead his matchless steed,
While peals the minute gun.

Amid the noblest of the land
They lay the sage to rest,
And give the bard an honored place
With costly marble dust.
In the great minister's transient height,
Where lights like glory fall;
And the choir sings, and the organ rings,
Along the emblazoned wall.

Selected.

This was the bravest warrior
That ever buckled sword;
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen,
On the deathless page words half so sage
As he wrote down for men.

And had he not high honor?
The hill-side for his pall,
To lie in state while angels wait,
With stars for tapers tall,
And the dark rock-pines, like tossing plumes
Over his hier to wave,
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in his grave.

O lonely tomb in Mead's land!
O dark Beth-peor's hill!
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still.
God hath his mysteries of grace,
Which ways that we cannot tell,
He hides them deep, like the secret sleep
Of him he loved so well.

— Cecil Sarah Frances Alexander

VALUATION.

Selected.

The old "Squire said, as he stood by his gate,
And his neighbor, the Deacon, went by,
"In spite of my bank stock and real estate,
You are better off, Deacon, than I.

"We're both growing old, and the end's drawing nigh,
You have less of this world to resign;
But heaven's appraisal your assets, I fear,
Will reckon up greater than mine.

"They say I am rich, but I'm feeling so poor,
I wish I could swap with you even,
The pounds I have live for and laid up in store
For the shillings and pence you have given."

"Well, 'Squire," said the Deacon, with shrewd common sense,
While his eye had a twinkle of fun,
"Let your pounds take the way of my shillings
—pence,
And the thing can be easily done."

—Whittle

Children and Tree-frogs.—When I was small boy I heard a minister say, "Child are like the little tree-frogs." I wonder what he could mean by such words as the for I could see no resemblance between children and tree-frogs.

"It is said," remarked the minister, "that the tree-frogs become the color of the bark whatever kind of a tree they are on." He said: "Little boys and girls are like them in this way: they partake of the habits of children with whom they keep company. They play with bad children, they will likely soon to form the same bad habits with they practise."

Oh, how true were his words! Even a child is known by the company he keeps. In school it is impossible sometimes to hear improper language, but the boy chooses for his friends and playmates the gar and profane, will soon grow to be them, as the tree-frog becomes like his roundings.—Ex.

Now what is a church but the redeemed flock, family, household or people of God? If then the church of Christ must be pure; not by a vain and fictitious impurity, but a solid and real purgation, redemption and salvation unto righteousness.—Penn.

For "The Friend."

The Salvation Army.

As this body of men has excited considerable attention in some parts of England, the following account has been drawn up, with the belief that it may prove interesting to some who have heard the name, yet know little of the nature of the movement with which they are connected. The information is mainly derived from "Heathen England," a small book issued by them in 1877.

The band of religious workers known as the Salvation Army¹ commenced their labors in England in the year 1865. It originated with a Methodist minister named William Booth, who had resigned his position in the body to which he belonged, in order to devote himself to preaching the Gospel in different localities, without being hampered by the duties of a stated minister. In company with his wife, who shared his labors, he travelled through various parts of England, and came to London in the summer of 1865. Here he found an enormous population of people who made a pretension to religion, never attended a place of worship, and seemed entirely outside of and apparently beyond the reach of any of the bodies of organized Christians. Feeling his heart drawn out in earnest desires for their salvation, he resolved to spend his life in endeavoring to christianize these thousands of his countrymen who, instead of inviting, might be inclined to repel his labors.

It was idle to expect them to go to any place of worship, so he began by preaching in the open air on a piece of land, "where shows, shooting ranges, petty dealers and quack doctors rival each other in attracting the attention of the poor." Gradually one after another of these rough listeners were stirred by new emotions; and as these surrounded him while preaching, and excited attention by their loud and unpurposive singing of hymns, and the earnest confessions of their former wickedness and newly-found sense of forgiveness and Divine favor, the excitement spread. Some of these converts had been notorious for their iniquity, and their testimony was the more impressive to those who had known their former way of living. They are described as converted navvies and thieves, and infidels and drunkards, and gypsies, and sailors, and cut-throats, and dog fanciers—in short, the toughest, most ignorant and wildest men and women who could well have been got together, and set up as witnesses for Him who had plucked them as brands from the burning.

An old dancing saloon was secured for indoor services; and as the movement spread, and additional laborers were enlisted in the work, cellars, sheds, and rooms which could be had at cheap rates, were engaged in other places.

The usual routine of operations, when there are sufficient helpers present, is to form "a ring in some public place, the leader of the meeting and speaker for the time being standing in the centre; those composing the ring making their arms should by appearance of friendly opposition arise." The speaking generally consists of a series of addresses, none of them exceeding five minutes in length.

In these the plainest language, and the most direct appeals to the consciences of the people are used. The following are given as specimens of the homely and uncultured style of some of these appeals. They are not reproduced in full, but merely show the distinctive features of the addresses:

"Praise God! He can save farmers, too! The grace of God found me when I was hoeing turnips in a field. When I sought for mercy, God said to me, 'But you won't give up all?' 'Yes, I will,' I said; and the hanting the silver spurs, the yellow kid gloves, and the silver-mounted whip were all put away. The last four months have been the happiest I ever had, and I am determined to do all I can for the glory of God and the salvation of souls."

"Well, I can tell you that God has saved a sailor, 53 years before the mast, a drunkard, and one of the worst men that ever lived. I have been in irons 90 days, have been in prisons in all parts of the world, and have had many a dozen lashes at the gangway in the service of the devil; but now God has saved my soul, and I'm on my way to glory."

The two points which they profess to present to the hearers, are "that every man is a guilty hell-deserving sinner, and that there is a way of escape for him if he be willing to avail himself of it."

When the speaking is ended, the indoor services are announced, and then a procession is formed to the hall. The biggest men are placed at the front, with one or two to keep troublesome lads away from the leader, sisters in the centre, and a line or two of men at the back.

The whole movement is regarded by those engaged in it, as an effort to awaken the slumbering to a sense of their condition, and lead them to repentance and conversion. They seem determined not to be officially associated with any sect, nor to be the founders of a new one. William Booth, as General Superintendent, occupies the position of the commander of an army; and the preachers move under his orders.

The zeal and earnestness manifested are quite remarkable, and expose the "missionaries" to much abuse, as might be expected, from the rough classes among whom they labor. Cold and rain, wind, sleet and mud, are not allowed to interfere with their efforts. Their historian, G. Railton, remarks:

"We are sure it is unnecessary for us to point out that the men and women who do this kind of work are not of a particularly mild and gentle character. We trust they have learned the meekness of forbearance and the gentleness of constant loving-kindness. But they are a determined lot, as a bystander recently remarked. They have been accustomed to run into sin with excess of riot, and they are now prepared for any lawful acts which may be deemed necessary to break down the kingdom of Satan and to establish the kingdom of Christ."

"One of them, a great navvy, was met in the street one day by some acquaintances and knocked down over and over again to test his temper. A policeman suggested that he should give the men in charge. 'Oh, no; I'll leave them to the Lord,' he said. But the same man expressed his state of feelings as to the work of God admirably when he called out at parting to a friend, 'Hit the devil hard, mate!'"

It is said that the army has now 231 stations in different parts of England, Wales and Ireland, as well as a few in other countries; and that it consists of 12,000 "soldiers." Its weekly paper, The War Cry, has a circulation of 200,000. It teaches its followers to abstain from intoxicating drinks, tobacco, flattery in dress, and worldly books and amusements; and to find their chief delight in promoting the work in which they are engaged.

Its success thus far is an interesting illustration of what may be accomplished by zeal and determination, even in unpromising fields of labor. The methods followed are not in all respects such as commend themselves to our views of propriety, nor are consistent with the direct leadership of Christ in his Church, whose sole prerogative it is not only to qualify his ministers, but to point out to them where to go, and when to speak. Yet a measure of the Divine blessing appears to have accompanied the evident sincerity which has marked the efforts of these people.

For "The Friend."

The Banished Quakers.

(Letter from Ellis Hooks to Margaret Fell.)

DEAR M. F.—My very dear love is remembered unto thee and to thy children and family, to G. Stubbs, Leonard Fell and T. Rawlinson. I have been in the Country a little while but did not stay there so long as I intended, by reason I was not well while I was there. As for passages here in relation to ye Truth, things is pretty well, & our meetings quiet, except on the first days and 4th days we are kept out of the Hall. Morgan Watkins & Josiah Coale are here at present, & concerning the ship in w^h friends were putt soe long since to be banish, they are still in the Downes, & here is news come from the other 8 friends who were to be had to Barbadoes; it seems they were taken by a dutch man of war, who putt about 12 dutch men aboard to take me & the others, but a storm arising they were not able to manage the ship without the help of the English whom they had put under deck as prisoners before, soe they lett them up, and when the storm was over they would not goe downe againe, but sailed wth the dutch men to Ireland & landed there. Here comes sad news, every day of losses by this late great storme at sea. John Tompouss ship is cast away & all the goods lost, but he and his men are saved. I suppose severall friends will be great losers by it; soe this is the most at present, only desiring to hear from thee, I rest thy loving friend,

E. H.

Thy booke has been printed a pretty while since, & I suppose by this thou may have seen it, for Wm. Told me he had sent some down.

[Directed] For my Lo. friend, M. Fell.

Leave this with Thomas Greene, at his shopp in Lancaster.

The writer of the above probably alludes to the case of seven Friends who were sentenced to be transported for attending their own place of worship, of which an account is given in "The Fells of Spargmoor Hall," where also are other letters from Ellis Hooks to Margaret Fell.

"In accordance with the sentence of banishment pronounced by the judge, the sheriff of Hertfordshire directed the jailor to contract with the master of a vessel bound to the West Indies to take the Friends thither. When they were brought to the ship the captain was not ready to sail, and he gave them a written permission to go ashore till he should summon them, merely trusting to their word of promise to return. On the 1st of October, 1864, they were summoned, and accordingly went aboard. The ship then sailed down the river as far as the Red-house, near Deptford, when a sudden change of wind drove her back to Limehouse, where the prisoners were again set on shore. On the 6th again the ship weighed anchor, with wind and tide fair, yet the seamen declared that, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, they could not get the ship to sail, and were, consequently, obliged to anchor again about a stone's-throw from where they lay before. Some of the seamen were both amazed and alarmed; they raised the murmuring cry, "We shall never get out of England while these Quakers are on board!" So they set them ashore the third time. On the 8th they sailed again; the Friends, as they had promised, having duly returned, the vessel sailed down to Greenwich, when a sudden storm obliged them, in order to secure the ship, again to cast anchor; then the prisoners were sent on shore the fourth time. On the 10th they were ordered on board the fifth time, and sailed again; but now the ship with much ado was kept from running aground: then they set the prisoners ashore at Blackwall, and she went down the same tide to Gravesend. Thither the prisoners followed, and by the captain's orders some carried there and others went back to London, till the 28th, when they were ordered aboard the sixth time, and the ship sailed that night to Leigh-road, where they cast anchor till the next day. At night the captain set them ashore, and directed them to Deal, where he met them altogether, and before several witnesses declared that though they had followed the ship so long, he was resolved not any further to attempt to carry them, and they, being left on shore, returned to their homes and sent word of their circumstances to the king and council. An order was issued for their arrest, and they were committed to prison, where they remained for seven years."

Selected for "The Friend."

Extract from the Journal of Elizabeth Dudley, dated 8th month 24th, 1817.

"I am more and more convinced that for public meetings, there is a peculiar and super-added gift. Neither does there seem care enough on the part of Monthly Meetings, respecting who is set at liberty for such work. A little friendly exhortation in the spirit of tenderness, might save some from entering into that which is not their proper business, though undertaken with the purest motive, and pursued in real dedication of heart. I fear elders are not sufficiently willing to undergo that secret exercise of mind which would qualify for discerning spiritual gifts and helping to the rightly occupying there with."

Crime and Sensational Literature.—The direct connection between "Penny Dreadfuls" and crime has been demonstrated over and over again by the annals of our own Police Courts. The mischievous lad who sometime since presented a pistol at her Majesty's head, and got well-whipped for his pains, was found in possession of a collection of lives of celebrated highwaymen; and the various gangs of youthful burglars and would-be highwaymen who have lately appeared in the dock, have one and all modeled their career upon the heroes of criminal novels. Only the other day a terrible illustration occurred of the actual effect of this gallows literature upon weak minds. A young man, nineteen years of age, named Westby, shot his father dead at Nottingham, having first murdered a little office boy at the office of the solicitor where he was employed, "merely to strengthen his nerve," and then took refuge in a fowl-house, where he was captured with a revolver in his possession, with which, as he frankly owned, he intended, when the police came, to shoot as many as possible.

The key to this otherwise inexplicable outbreak of homicidal fury was afforded by the poor mother's words: "My son was very fond of reading, and would sit for hours at his favorite amusement studying periodicals and sensational literature." By this "sensational literature" his habits appear to have been formed.—London Saturday Review.

Religious Items, &c.

For "The Friend."

Witherspoon on Romanism. is the title of a pamphlet issued by the Presbyterian Committee of Publication, at Richmond, Va. Like the famous provincial letters of Blaise Pascal, which so damagingly exposed the sophistry and doctrines of the Jesuit writers, this pamphlet contains numerous extracts from Roman Catholic catechisms and other books, written by Catholics and published by authority of their ecclesiastics. Among the doctrines taught in these books are the following: that neither heretics, protestants, nor any others who die outside of the Roman Catholic Church, can be saved; that the doctrines of Christianity are independent of the scriptures, and are believed, not because they are found in those writings, but because the pastors of the Catholic church teach them; that Protestants never had any faith in Christ; that the Virgin Mary is to be worshipped, and that the Lord has ordained that all mercies which are dispensed to men, should pass through her hands, and should be bestowed according to her good pleasure; therefore she is addressed as the "Mother of God," the "Mistress of the world," the "Queen of heaven," the "Source of our salvation." That "the priest has the power to free the sinner from the bonds of sin and hell, and to open to him the gates of heaven. He has the power to transform him from a slave of the devil to a child of God." "The priest raises his hand, he pronounces the word of absolution, and in an instant, quick as a flash of light, the chains of hell are burst asunder, and the sinner becomes a child of God." So great is the power of the priest that the judgments of heaven itself are subject to his decision. He "opens at will the gates of heaven, speaks to the eternal Son of God, and at his voice the God of heaven descends on earth and subjects himself to his control." That there is a state of purgatory after death, where "holy souls" who have loved God above everything, are made to endure excruciating torments, in order "to expiate for their sins not sufficiently cancelled in this life." That "the invocation of saints is a necessary duty." That "as soon as the priest has pronounced the words of consecration over the host and the wine in the chalice, the real body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ are present upon the altar; his body under the appearance of bread, and his blood under the appearance of wine." "Not only the body of Christ, but Jesus Christ, true God and true man, is entire there, such as he is heaven; so that the blood of Christ, his sacred soul and his divinity are conjointly with his blood in the chalice." That "a confessor may affirm, even with an oath, that he does not know of a sin heard in confession, secretly understanding that he knows it as a minister of Christ, but not as a man." "A nob man who is ashamed to beg or work, mistakes to supply his wants if he is poor." &c.

The titles of the books from which the extracts are said to be taken, are given, with the names of the authors and publishers, and the pages of the volumes where the passages can be found. We suppose they have been fairly and correctly extracted by the writer of the pamphlet, T. D. Witherspoon who is the pastor of a Presbyterian congregation at Petersburg, Va.

Assuming this to be so, it seems to us most marvellous, that intelligent and respectable persons, as we believe many of our Roman Catholic citizens are, can truly believe in such strange doctrines, which are at variance with enlightened reason, with the testimony of scripture, and with the spiritual experience of those who, through submission to the grace of God, which bringeth salvation, have been enabled to walk in the light of the Lord, and to know his Spirit to teach them.

The Scripture assertion that, if he blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch shows that it is very unsafe to trust to men in such important matters; and emphasizes the exhortation, "Come ye, let us walk in the light of the Lord, in the light of Divine grace which illuminates every heart willing to receive it."

For "The Friend."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Butter-producing Cows.—There is a marked difference in the milk from different cows, to the facility with which the cream is converted into butter. Cornelius Dewees, of Chester Hill, Morgan Co., Ohio, writes, that the butter quality of a cow belonging to his brother is so great, that when the milk allowed to stand the usual time, the butter forms on the top without churning.

A Remarkable Feat.—At the recent exhibition at Atlanta, Ga., some of the Yankee exhibitors undertook to show our Southern friends just how quickly a suit of cloth could be made after the cotton was picked. The race against time is thus described:

"It was about sunrise on the appointed day when those who were to gather the cotton entered the field at Norcross, Ga., a small town twenty miles from Atlanta, named for Jonathan Norcross, of Maine. The cotton was of the variety known as oziezer silk, which is not only very prolific, but the staple of it pronounced to be of the highest grade, the short staple cottons. By seven o'clock the necessary quantity of seed cotton to yield the lint for two full suits of clothes was gathered and delivered to the gin, and twenty minutes later the silky lint was on its way to the Kitson picker, where in thirty minutes more it was prepared for the Foss & Foss cards, in use by the William Linn Company. Half an hour later the cards delivered to the railway heads made by the Low Machine Company, where, within another thirty minutes it was made ready for spinning frames, and twenty minutes later the spun filling was on its way to the Com-loom. During all this time and process the gathering multitude looked on with the greatest interest, increasing in number all the time; and when about nine o'clock, the cloth made its appearance, the enthusiasm mounted to the highest pitch. It was a new and an experience.

"By half-past twelve at noon enough cloth for the first suit was delivered to the dyer, and before one o'clock, in less than six hours on the time the raw cotton, bespangled with dewy diamonds, was dangling from the reels on the stalk in the 'patch' the cloth ad for it, for a full suit of clothes for Governor Bigelow, of Connecticut, was placed in the hands of the tailor! Soon after sunset on this memorable day two suits of clothes one for Governor Bigelow, of Connecticut, and another for Governor Colquitt, of Georgia were delivered to them, and a short time afterward the Governor of Connecticut, dressed in his suit, received a delegation from Yanta (colored) University, at the elegant mansion of Director-General Kimball, and her callers, while the popular Governor of Georgia was courteously entertaining and reviving the hearty congratulations of distinguished visitors and exultant citizens.

Snake Bites.—The poison of the rattle-snake induces the same symptoms in men and animals. Immediately after the bite we have the symptoms of a shock or concussion affecting the whole nervous and circulatory apparatus, and this in proportion to the virulence of the snake which has inflicted the wound. The skin is cold and pale; pulse almost imperceptible; heart is agitated and beats with tremulous motion. The countenance is expressive of alarm. The patient complains of a burning pain in the wound, which is swelling rapidly. I have seen this stage of shock continue for a period of three days even under the best treatment. With proper treatment a stage of reaction comes in one or two hours. The experience of twenty-five years has taught me that the following plan will relieve every case where it is adopted in time. First tie a strong structure between the wound and the heart strong enough to prevent the return of the venous blood. Scarcely the wound freely and the blood flow, applying the cupping glass, further continue to invite a flow from the wound by applying a warm meal poultice equally saturated with nitrate potash. Pure corn whisky is the best stimulant for the first stage, given in moderate doses, every ten minutes, with sugar and water, until reaction takes place. It is a grave error to push the whiskey to beastly drunkenness, because this reaction provokes the nausea and fever of the next stage. When reaction takes place the figure must be slackened, full doses of calomel and nitrate potash will relieve all the early symptoms, and these should be carried on the bowels with four-ounce doses of oil given every six hours until free purgation ensues. Should the limb remain still swollen it may be discharged speedily by giving four times per day with a liniment equal parts of olive oil, spirits turpentine, spirits camphor.—Dr. W. M. Shuler, in the Medical Gazette.

of very long ago a portion of hard dry was found underneath the bossed head of a huge iron nail that was fixed into the floor of the Chapter House at Westminster. On this skin were found several hairs. —

Quekett, curator of the museum of the College of Surgeons, recognized the hair to be human, and asserted that it belonged to a fair-haired person. In former times the Danes came up the mouths of the English rivers to pillage the church buildings. When they were caught they were skinned, and their skins nailed to the door of the building they attacked. In the course of time all the exposed portion would peel off, that covered by the nail would remain protected, and thus bear testimony to the cruelty of our ancestors. In the College of Surgeons may be seen three specimens of human skin presented by Albert Way—viz: a portion of human skin, said to be that of a Dane, from the door of a house at Hadstock in Essex; a second specimen is from Copford in Essex, and a third from the north door of Worcester Cathedral.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 21, 1882.

A pamphlet entitled, George Fox and his Salvation Army, 200 years ago, has been sent to us from England. It was prepared by George Railton, one of those connected with William Booth in the labors among the rougher classes of society, known as the Salvation Army movement.

The pamphlet is a very readable outline of the life and labors of that great reformer; and aims to show the substantial agreement of his objects and methods with those pursued by the followers of Booth at the present time. The points of real agreement are well put by George Railton, and are certainly numerous enough to attract the interested attention of Friendly readers. They are mainly those which grow out of similarity in zeal and outspoken boldness of action, leading to self-denying labors and exposure to ridicule, reproach and even personal abuse. In some points of practical doctrine too, the soldiers of the "Army" approach more nearly to Friends than perhaps any other body of people, especially in the full acknowledgment of equal rights in the ministry, of men and women—that all are one in Christ Jesus.

But the similarity between the Friends of 1681 and the "Soldiers" of 1881 is overestimated. The soldiers make much use of hymn-singing in their efforts to attract the people; and G. Railton thinks the early Friends were not opposed to this, but merely to "the mere machine singing of jaws, without the Spirit." When they were "merry in the Lord, they sang aloud, just as we do." The truth is, that the Journal of George Fox and the whole history of the Society show, that neither he nor his fellow ministers practised or encouraged the singing of hymns in religious meetings as is done by most other denominations of Christians. In that respect, the meetings of Friends have remained unchanged from the earliest times down to the present, except in those localities where a spirit of change has possessed the minds of some under our name, and led to practices which our forefathers would have repudiated.

George Fox relates that when unjustly beaten by the jailor in Carlisle prison, he "was made to sing in the Lord's power." There is nothing to show that this was anything more than an inarticulate outburst of melodious sound, indicating the peace and joy which the Lord bestowed at the time on his faithful followers. This incident gives no support to the use of music in religious meetings.

The "soldiers" are under the command of their General Superintendent, William Booth, and labor in such places as he directs. This pamphlet states that the early ministers in the Society of Friends acted "under [George Fox's] direction, as well as the Lords," in their ministerial work. George Fox never assumed or exercised such authority in a general way, although in particular instances he might have felt that he had a word of encouragement or advice to one or another. The journals of those early laborers continually speak of the movings of the Lord, as the impelling cause of their travelling abroad. They were sent of the Lord and not of George Fox or any other man.

Any Salvation Army believe with Friends that a Divine command is necessary for any one to preach the Gospel. One of their publications says: "We want nobody, male or female, to do any ordinary preaching. We only wish people to speak when and as they are moved by the Holy Ghost, for only such speaking can break sinner's hearts, and lead them to the Lamb of God." So far we can unite with them. But they go on to say, "What we maintain is, that the Spirit of God does move every converted man and woman, so to speak in public at times." This assumption is not in accordance with the belief of our Society. For, while all are called upon to be preachers in life and conversation, and to promote the cause of vital religion in their respective spheres of action, yet, neither experience nor the scriptures warrant us in assuming that all are called upon to preach in the assemblies of the people.

We have no desire to undervalue the good results that may have been effected by the salvation army, and we can heartily wish that they may be successful in awakening thousands of sinners from the sleep of death; but it seems to us, that those who are fully convinced of the doctrines of the Gospel as held by our Society, will feel restrained from joining in this as well as in many other movements of a professedly benevolent or religious character. The Lord of the vineyard alone can assign to each of his servants, his place of labor, and the kind of work in which to engage; and it is our part to follow his directions.

We wish to call the attention of our readers to a work entitled, "Passages from the Life and Writings of George Fox," which has been recently issued. It is an abridgment of the journal of that eminent Christian, made by simple omission, without the introduction of any new matter. It has been very carefully prepared, under the belief that such a book would be acceptable to many persons to whom the full journal might seem formidable. In size and appearance, it is an attractive volume. That it is both interesting and instructive, scarcely needs to be said to any one familiar with the unabridged journal. The retail price is 50 cents. It is for sale at Friends' Bookstore, No. 304 Arch St., Philada.

A friend has written to us expressing doubts as to the correctness of the statement, couplfrom a California paper, of a pumpkin growing to such a size that when the seeds were removed a young woman could be enclosed in the cavity. It may render the story less wonderful, if he will consider, that the air or water displaced by a person of 120 pounds weight, would not fill the inside of a globe of 20 inches in diameter. The projecting points of the human body would require a somewhat larger space than this; yet, when the body is placed in a sitting position, with the knees closely drawn in, and the head and trunk bowed down, it approximates pretty closely to a globular form.

Before inserting the item, we inquired of an observant and judicious friend, who had resided for a considerable time in the neighborhood where these vegetables were said to have been grown. He expressed his belief that the account was correct.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate on the 11th instant, a petition from Omaha Indians, asking a grant to each of the full title to the lands which they worked, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The total exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during 1881, were valued at $224,118,560, against $275,936,859 in the preceding year.

The New York Express train, which left Albany at 2.40 p. m. on the 13th inst., was run into by a Tarrytown passenger train in the rock cut at Spuyten Duyvil, and two of the rear cars were destroyed by fire. Eight lives were lost, and about forty persons sustained injuries. The train contained a number of members of the New York Legislature, who were returning from Albany. Senator Wagner is reported among the killed. Most of the deaths occurred in consequence of the stores being returned, and the cars taking fire.

The New York State debt on 9th mo. 30th last was $9,109,054, and after deducting the amount of assets in the sinking fund, the net debt on that date was $6,768,073.

A correspondent of the Charleston News says there is great unrest among the negroes of Sumner county, S. C., and that at least 500 families are preparing to leave in the spring. Their complaint is high rents, high taxes, the Stock and Election laws.

At Langley cotton factors of Augusta, Georgia, has just declared a semi-annual dividend of $12.50 per share, making over 20 per cent. for the year.

At Dallas, Texas, 5725 bales of cotton were recently sold by M. D. Cleveland to Major A. Rutt Kay for $290,000, payment being made in cash. This is said to be the largest single sale of cotton ever made in the United States.

Governor St. John, of Kansas, denies that the Prohibition amendment to the Constitution of that State has been invalidated by the recent decision in a liquor case, of its Supreme Court.

There were reported in New York last week 269 cases of scarlet fever, 197 of measles, 124 of diphtheria and 31 of small pox. The last named disease is also prevalent in Port Jervis, N. Y., at various points on Long Island, at Pittsburgh, Pa., Richmond, Virginia, and many other places. In Wilmington, Ohio, a few days ago, a child died of what was supposed to be chicken-pox, and its funeral was largely attended. Since then fifty cases of virulent small-pox have developed in the town.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 390, as compared with 367 for the previous week, and 366 as compared with 367 of last year. Of the whole number there were 196 males and 194 females; 64 died of consumption; 46 of pneumonia; 20 of diphtheria, and 16 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 3's, 101½ a 102½; 4½'s, 114½; 4's, 114½; currency 95.

Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 124 a 122 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 61 cts. for export, and 5½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is dull and unchanged. Sales of 2000 barrels, including Minnesota extra, at $6.25 a $6.75 for clear, and at $6.75 a $7 for straight; Penna. extra family at $6.37½ a $6.50; western do. at, at $6.75 a $7.20, and patents at $7.25 a $7.70. Rye flour is dull at $4.75 a $5. Corn meal is unchanged.

Grain.—Wheat was a fraction higher. Sales of 1800 bushels red, at $1.41. Rye is scarce and steady at 97 cts. Corn is in fair demand and firm. Sales of 7000 bushels, including new yellow, at 71 cts.; do. at 70 cts.; old yellow, at 71 cts.; do. steamer, at 69½ cts.; No. 3, 69 a 69½ cts., and rejected at 68 cts. Oats are at 50 a 51 cts. S. P. No. 1 straw, 85 to 95 cts.; white at 50½ a 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 49 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 1st mo. 14th, 1882.—Loads of hay, 268; loads of straw, 57. Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20 per 100 pounds; S. P. No. 1 straw, 85 to 95 cts.; white at 50½ a 51 cts., and rejected and mixed at 49 cts. per bushel.

Beef cattle were rather dull this week, but prices remained about the same as last quoted; 3200 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 7½ cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

Sheep.—Sheep were in demand at full prices; 9500 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 6¼ cts. per lb., and lambs at 4½ a 7½ cts. to condition.

Hogs were unchanged; 4000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 8 a 10 cts. per pound, the latter rate for extra.

FOREIGN.—The London Times says it understands that the Government have carefully considered the case of the suspects who are members of Parliament, and have decided that the leaders of the Land League do not call for exceptional treatment.

The Observer says, it understands that the Earl of Shaftesbury, Dean Bradley and Carons Lindon and others, in communication with each other on a scheme for organizing a conference or committee with the view of calling public meetings throughout the country to raise a fund for the relief of the homeless Jewish families in Russia, and to facilitate their immigration. A prominent Lancashire has volunteered to head the subscription list with £10,000, and considers that one million pounds will be necessary to carry out the project.

The Berlin correspondent of the Daily News writes as follows: "There are signs of apparent unpleasantness between Prince Bismarck and the Crown Prince, Frederick William. The latter is said to be hot temper. He is no means satisfied with the reception the emperor's rescript met in England."

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 14th inst., Gambetta ascended the tribune, and read the bill for the revision of the Electoral Law. The details are as follows: The bill are as follows: The election of life Senators by both Chambers voting separately, instead of by the Senate alone; instead of the Senatorial delegates being chosen by the Communes, one to be elected by each 500 electors; the principle of scrutin de liste to be inserted in the bill. The details are as follows: To be increased, as settled by an ordinary bill. The Senate is to be deprived of the power of restoring items stricken from the budget by the Chamber of Deputies. The final clause of the bill provides for the discontinuance of public prayers at the opening of the Legislature.

In the Chamber of Deputies on the 16th inst., the Government introduced its bill prescribing regulations for the admission of foreign pork. It provides that pork must be accompanied by certificates attesting that it has been properly prepared, and is of the description known as "fully cured." The certificates are to be issued by the consular agents, and to be countersigned by licensed experts, and certified by French Consular agents. The importers will also be required to declare when paying the import duty, that the meat is perfectly preserved. The importation of uncured chopped meat, such as sausage, remains absolutely prohibited. A breach of the regulations is punishable by imprisonment of from two to six months, and a fine of from 100 to 500 francs.

The French budget for 1883 is nearly settled. The expenditure is estimated at 2,972,000,000 francs, being an increase of 115,000,000 francs, as compared with the previous estimate. For the revenue, the Government, as accounted for by the desire of M. Alain-Targé, Minister of Finance, to insert in the ordinary budget many items hitherto figuring in the extraordinary budget. The revenue is estimated at 2,976,000,000 francs.

The recent slips in Switzerland are ascribed to the small slight depression of the market, less than twenty-one months have been observed since 12th mo. The Czar has signed a ukase, in accordance with which the payments by peasants on account of the lands they received at the time of their emancipation will be reduced by twelve millions roubles per year.

It is announced that the telegraph line will soon be opened to the world by telegraphic communication. Intensely cold weather prevails on the Sahara frontier, and hundreds of camels and many soldiers have perished from the cold.

Advices from Santo Domingo, of the 27th ult., state that "an American war steamer is quietly surveying Samana Bay."

Advices from Peru to the 28th ult. report that a Commission of Commissioners had left Lima for Chilo. There was a severe earthquake the day of their arrival at Callao. Nothing had yet resulted from their visit and affairs were in statu quo. The probable results of their mission were the absorbing topic of discussion along the coast.

A girl, named Mary, as a witness in a criminal case at Hamilton, Ontario, a few days ago, refused to take the oath on the ground that the Bible commands us to "swear not at all." Persisting in her refusal she was committed for forty-eight hours for contempt of court.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

NOTICE TO PARENTS AND OTHERS. In consequence of a change in the railroad arrangements, ALL PASSES to be forwarded to the School from No. 304 Art St., must in future be there by HALF PAST TEN O'CLOCK on Sixth-day mornings, instead of by twelve o'clock as heretofore.

Renewed attention is requested to the printed Rule of the Committee restricting the sending of etables the pupils, the practice being, in almost all cases, a only unnecessary but positively injurious.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward, Philadelphia.) Physician and Superintendent—JESSE C. HALL, M. D. The free admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Marlboro Stark county, Ohio, 12th mo. 29th, 1881, THOMAS CRAWFORD and SARAH, daughter of John and Hattie Brantingham, both members of Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting.

DIED, at the residence of her mother, Elizabeth Pennell, the 10th day of 10th month, 1881, in the 51st year of her age, HANNAH S. PENNELL, a member of Methodist and Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, Delaware Co., Penna.

MARRIED, on the 31st of 12th mo. 1881, MARY ALL in the 41st year of her age, a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. For some time it had been evident that this dear friend was loosening from earth, and sweetly preparing for a better world. Her last life was short and severe, but she bore it with patience, pressing, that she could restore her health to do to do. When told of her critical condition, she received information with calmness, and spoke of the mercy of our Heavenly Father, that "He was good and full of compassion," and of her willingness to be released, if she was prepared. Being told, as she approached, that it was believed her suffering would be over, with a look of joyful surprise, she said "It will be a great mercy and favor." Very soon as this she sank into the sleep of death,—to awake, reverently believe, through the mercy of God in Christ her Saviour,—to eternal life; realizing the fulfilment of the language, "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness."

DIED, on the 7th of 1st mo. 1882, THOMAS HUCE SOS, in the eighty-second year of his age, a beloved member, and for many years an overseer of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. This dear Friend having been brought under the influence of the Holy Spirit, on his youth, and attending to the dictates of his conscience, became prepared to maintain throughout a long the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society as held by early Friends. He was a diligent attendant of meetings, and though he had an humble opinion of his own merits, yet he believed it to be his duty faithfully to fill up his place in the church militant. He was a devoted and faithful member of the church militant, and he had been gathered, "as a shock of corn fully ripe into the Heavenly garner." "Mark the perfect and behold the upright, for the end of that man peace."

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, FIRST MONTH 28, 1882.

NO. 25.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to

JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by

JOHN S. STOKES,
AT NO. 118 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Extracts from the Diary of Rebecca Dewees.

(Continued from page 156.)

1847. 9th mo. 11th. "Having just entered my 26th year, I turn to take a retrospect of the past—humiliating indeed is the review. While I behold abundant cause for deep self-amenagement and awful prostration at the footstool of Him who is indeed long suffering and slow to anger, how shall my feeble pen set forth the goodness of that power that has spared hitherto; though I have often thought late that it might be said to me as to Israel, 'How thou art sidden back by a perpetual backsliding.' My soul desires to adore in the dust such matchless loving-kindness, it is enabled still to put my confidence in Him who is the healer of breaches; and who by his all quickening influence reanimate the dead, that I may even yet know, by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, a preparation for my allotted place in the church militant; enabled to walk as becometh the gospel, bringing no reproach upon the cause of truth, and finally be spared, when done with time, to join the host of all generations in ascribing glory and honor, thanksgiving and praise to the Lord and to the Lamb who is worthy, worthy, and now and for ever.

1849. 5th mo. 13th. "What important changes hath the hand of time wrought for me! I dropped my pen; having been invited, soon after the date of my last, to a most affectionate companion in the conjugal relation, and standing as now in the responsible station of mother; new duties of a most important character seem devolving upon me. It is necessary increasing to remember the admonition: 'Take heed lest at any time your hearts are overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and cares of this life—since we know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh.'"

1851. 5th mo. 11th. "Poor beyond all depiction, unworthy of the least crumb from the Master's table; yet favored with a little strength to put up a feeble but heartfelt petition for that ability which comes only from Him, to be found making straight steps for me.

1853. 5th mo. 28th. "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? I have been ready to conclude sometimes of late that there never was any one who had more cause to trust confidently in the everlasting Arm, nor ever any more faithless, more distrustful. 'Surely goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life;' and would that I could add with the confidence of the Psalmist, 'and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever.' Increase my faith.

1854. 5th mo. 30th. "Trust in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.' Even from my very childhood unto this hour has this been as a cordial to my wounded spirit; as a stay to my tossed mind in times of trial and danger; and notwithstanding it has ever been the grand aim of the enemy to destroy my confidence in his Almighty power; yet blessed and for ever adored be his excellent name. He has not permitted to prevail. 'Thou art the confidence of all the ends of the earth.'

7th mo. 8th. "They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever.' How inexpressibly great is this privilege; how unutterable is that love which thus condescends to enable the helpless to look to their Almighty helper, and thus experience Him to be their strength in weakness, their support under every trial, their joy and the crown of their rejoicing.

8th mo. 30th. "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and hath set my feet upon a rock, and established my going; and he hath put a new song in my mouth, ever praise to our God.'

9th mo. 30th. "If thou seek Him he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake Him he will cast thee off for ever.' Fervent has been the engagement of my heart that I might even so walk before the Lord as in nowise to offend or grieve his good Spirit, that haply I might be favored to know what He does indeed require at my hands, and be strengthened to do it. In vain is every human effort to do the Lord's work: 'Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.'

11th mo. 26th. "In my silent waiting this day, I was led to take a view of that period of my life when the terrors of the Lord were upon me for sin, and when it might truly be said, there was nothing but a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation; when the enemy had nearly succeeded in wholly destroying my confidence in that goodness that careth even for the sparrows, but before whom I was persuaded my transgressions had rendered me even more contemptible than they. A deep and abiding sense of my unworthiness of the Divine protection and regard, seemed ever present with me, and almost wholly disqualified me from even looking towards his holy temple. How often since that trying period has my cup been made to overflow with thankfulness to Him who delights not in the affliction of his creatures; but when the will is sufficiently subdued, and the poor penitent becomes even as the clay in the hands of the potter, He will in his own appointed time, give the 'oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;' will speak peace to the tossed mind, and enable it to know that the earth has nothing on which it can lean; yet his name is a strong tower and a rock of refuge in which none ever trusted and were confounded.

1855. 4th mo. 8th. "It is in vain that we seek for further manifestations of the Divine will, if we are yet unwilling to yield obedience to the degree of light afforded. Oh, that I might more and more become as the clay in the hand of the potter, that my will might indeed be the will of my Lord and Master,—that simple child-like obedience might mark all my goings. But that nature which stumbles at the cross is still alive,—that nature which shrinks from appearing as a fool before him, which trembles at the thought of becoming a reprob in the gate. How does it strew my way with briars and thorns, and cause tears to be my meat and day food.

17th. "How often is the tribute of gratitude and thankfulness raised in my heart when the recollection of by-gone days is fresh before me, when the enemy of my soul was permitted to try me as to an hair's breadth, even suggesting that my transgressions had rendered me altogether unworthy of Divine protection and regard, and that, therefore, I need not hope for it; that I was rather an object of Divine displeasure, and was liable at any moment to be cut off in judgment. But oh, the unbonded condescension of Him 'who will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax,' who will in his own appointed time speak peace to the troubled elements, and enable his poor, erring, backslidden, though penitent ones, to put their trust in the shadow of his wing, and in that ability which He alone can give, to say: 'Get thee behind me, Satan.' May I never cease to ascribe thanksgiving and praise unto Him to whom forever it is due."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Remember the Poor.

As I was one day walking along the streets of Philadelphia, my attention was attracted to a little girl, probably ten or twelve years of age, sitting along side of the pavement, with her face buried in her apron, apparently in distress. I looked at her and passed on, as we often do; but somehow my sympathies went unusually out to the child. As I passed on, I wished much I had stopped and given her a little aid. However, I went on a few squares and transacted a little business. I had one more stop to make before taking the cars; and on looking at my watch found I had some time to spare. So I retraced my steps and found the child still in the same place. She said she had lost the rent-money which her mother had given her, (which was not a very large amount,) and appeared to be quite grieved about it. I gave her some assistance, and told her to cheer up, perhaps some one else would give her some too. She thanked me, and I felt much comforted for doing this little act of charity, and went on my way much happier than when I first passed her by. We may remember the words of Scripture are, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these—ye have done it unto me."

I know that we are apt to meet with many similar cases in our walks in the city, and know not whether the stories of such are always true; but I think, when our sympathies go out in an unusual manner towards these, it may be taken as an evidence that it will be right for us to attend to our feelings and extend a little aid. Even a trifle, or a kind word only, may tend to soothe a breaking or over-burdened heart. Though no one individual can help all who are in want, yet we ought not to turn a deaf ear to, or pass by all—even those who do not ask for assistance, but who are evidently in distress—without favoring them a little.

We are many of us familiar with the lines:

"Not more than others I deserve,
Yet God has given me more."

C.

For "The Friend."

Colorado and California.

(Continued from page 186.)
FRUIT—WINE-MAKING.

A letter from Los Angeles, written on the 22d of 10th month, thus speaks of an Agricultural Fair held at that place:

"The display of fruits, &c., they say is much better than usual. But it certainly does not do justice to the country,—ten minutes in a vineyard, where all kinds of grapes are hanging in two or three pound clusters not a yard from the ground, and at the same time in some of the orchards here, where apples, figs, pears, peaches, pomegranates and walnuts are growing side by side with rows of orange and lemon trees, all loaded with fruit, would convey to a stranger a much better idea of its productiveness than the half-dried, dusty exhibits left by distant owners. There are huge squashes and pumpkins shown, some of which weigh over 200 lbs. But there are large pumpkins at all fairs, even Jersey ones; but those exhibited there are the exception, here tons of such may be seen in many a patch. It requires two men here to gather them in the field. One man alone cannot handle them.

Yesterday visited a wine-making establishment near here. I found three or four wagons loaded with grapes in boxes waiting their turn to discharge. Several men were busy pushing the grapes into the hopper of something like a huge coffee-mill, that crushed the grapes and threw the stems one side, just as fast as they could be unloaded and weighed, or at the rate of about sixty tons per day. They estimate, the proprietor told me, six gallons to the 100 lbs., and are paying $22 per net ton for the fruit. This would make the unf fermented juice worth a little less than 20 cents a gallon. We tried some of it made from the white raisin grape, as it ran from the mill, and found it very sweet and luscious, and such as must make a very strong wine when fermented, unless well watered. Such an adulteration, perhaps, might be a benefit to the consumer.

The grape juice, when drawn from the tank into which the pulp runs from the mill, is pumped through a hose into large vats some ten feet high and twenty feet in diameter, standing in long rows in the building. This establishment belongs to parties in San Francisco, one of whom is generally present during the grinding—or from four to six weeks—and every thing about the premises is very neat and clean. The mill stands back from the road, and is approached through an avenue of orange trees some 20 feet in height, all loaded down with green fruit.

Near this place is a large orange orchard, in which the trees are about the same size. How many acres it contains I cannot say, but was told that the average value of the yield, for several years past, had been more than $20,000 per annum. It is no wonder then that everybody who can command water for irrigation, is planting orange trees. In some soils here, not only fine apples and pears, but also grapes can be grown without water. At the fair there was a fine display of these from both Pasadena and Florence, said to have been grown without irrigation. But both lemon and orange trees require it; and I believe the walnut trees do also."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Departed Worthies.

1842. 11th mo. Our meeting was much favored, our beloved friend C. Healy, amongst much instructive testimony, was led to set forth in its true light, the necessity of preparation for another state of existence; and that sufficient grace is bestowed upon every man to enable him to make his calling and election sure; and if this Grace is rightly heeded, death would not find him unprepared; repeating these solemn warnings, "As the tree falls, so it lies; as death leaves us, so judgment will find us;" "there is no repentance in the grave, nor pardon offered to the dead." He also brought to view, as a warning to the lukewarm, the condition of the church that was neither hot nor cold, and the judgment denounced upon it; a state of lukewarmness being so offensive in the Divine sight. And in our meeting for worship occurring shortly after a fatal accident in the neighborhood, he was evidently moved to speak in reference thereto; holding up to view the necessity of preparation for another state of existence: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." There are gifts dispensed to every one of us, by which, if we properly profit, death will not find us unprepared, though it come upon us as a thief in the night. No soul is lost that has not had the opportunity of being saved; but if we are not careful for the improvement of these gifts, we cannot expect to grow in grace, for it is only as we are faithful in the little that we shall be made rulers over more.

And in another meeting for worship occurring about the same period, our dear friend distributed instructive testimony, "If any man love me he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." We are the children of Abraham if we do the works of Abraham; and it is an evidence that we love our Saviour if we keep his words;

holding up to view the precious reward coming unto Him who is the way, the truth and the life; the necessity of having faith in God; and that the reason why some of us do not grow in grace is for the want of faith. We make a partial sacrifice, and do not give up the whole heart. If we had faith as grain of mustard seed, mountains of opposition would be removed, and a way made where no way is seen by the art of man. I expressed a desire that we should love one another, and that our church might be a church of love. He also brought into view the preciousness of the example of those who have served the Lord, and their generation in their day, and have been gathered to the rest. Their usefulness does not always dwindle with them, but they being dead yet speak by the pious examples and precepts they have left behind them; and who finally had nothing to do but to die, and join the general assembly and the Church of the First-born whose names are written in heaven."

In a meeting for worship about this time our dear friend Christopher was again led to distribute persuasive counsel, "Oh! my soul look thou unto the Lord, for my expectation is from Him." Bringing into view the necessity of this being the prevailing inclination of our desires, and without which we shall never know the excellency of silent waiting; and that there is a vast difference between those who feel poor, weak, and unworthy, and whose expectation is from the Lord; and those who endeavor to worship Him in their own will and wisdom, and whose expectation is much from the poor instrument. It is on the humble, dependent, waiting ones, that we will come to know the excellency of silent worship.

In another meeting for worship he was instructively led to describe that rest which remains for the people of God; and told that the Lord will not forsake us, unless we first forsake him.

In our Quarterly Meeting held at Buckinham, our dear friend Alice Knight appeared in the ministry, and handed forth instructive testimony. She believed there were those present whose situation might be compared to that of the Psalmist, when he said, "The hart panteth after the water-brooks, panteth my soul after thee, O God!" and that if these were faithful they would be like pillars in the house of the Lord, that shall no more out. We were exhorted to abide in Christ, for "the branches cannot bear fruit themselves unless they abide in the vine; neither can we bring forth fruit unto holiness unless we abide in Christ. And she believed there were present of different ages and conditions in life, those of another class, who had been tenderly visited with the Day-spring from on high, and had tasted of the bread of waters of life, but by unfaithfulness had fallen in discouragement. She earnestly desired to encourage these to greater dedication in future, believing that the Lord was yet willing to be merciful unto them.

In our meeting, our young friend M. Lovett again dropped a few words of testimony, "Pull off the shoes from off thy feet for the ground on which thou standest is holy ground;" this was an expression delivered by Moses when he saw the flame in the bush, and it seems to me to be peculiarly applicable to us at the present day, that when we come here and present ourselves before the Lord we should in a spiritual sense, pull off the shoes from off our feet, for the ground on which we stand is holy ground, that we may not be encumbered with the things of the world upon these solemn occasions. In another meeting he said, "Go ye forth as lambs among wolves, not as wolves among wolves; with the armor of unrighteousness, but with the armor of faith."

For "The Friend,"

Westtown Boarding School.

For which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first and counteth the cost, whether he hath sufficient to finish it? Lest haply, after he hath laid the foundation, and is not able to finish it, all that behold it begin to mock him, saying, This man began to build, and was not able to finish."—Luke xiv. 28.

In accordance with this instructive language we find the worthy friends who were entrusted with the care of bringing into practical form the crude ideas and desires for a select Boarding School for Friends, were careful first to provide the means wherewith to purchase land and erect the necessary buildings. On page 1, the first recorded minute forms us, that the meeting was held in the evening of 10th mo. 3rd, 1794. Thos. Morris appointed clerk, and that "after due deliberation upon the subject committed to our charge, and the most proper mode of procedure in carrying into effect the views of the Yearly Meeting, it was concluded to name two friends each of the Quarterly Meetings to receive voluntary contributions and subscriptions the members of our religious Society; not doubting the disposition of many to devote a portion of the worldly substance committed their trust in promoting a work so desirable as the guarded religious education of our youth. The following are therefore appointed, viz: Philada. Quarter, Thos. Fisher and Jos. Sansom," and others in the several Quarters, which there were then nine. Thos. Fisher appears to have been the first Treasurer, on the minute which follows, it appears at another location than the present one and been thought of.

"Some of our number who for a considerable time past have had their attention turned toward the subject of our appointment, proposing to the consideration of the present meeting, as a situation for the Boarding school in contemplation, a tract of land called Langhorne Park, in the county of Bucks, bounded on one side by Neshaminy Creek, miles from this city, and containing about 60 acres." Humphrey Marshall, Jona. Evans, even Biddle and eleven others were named to view this spot and report their judgment respecting it to our next meeting; they are authorized to view any other places which may be thought more likely than the above-mentioned to answer the purpose, and bring forward their opinions respecting them."

At the next meeting of the committee, held 12th of 12th month, a minute states: "The friends named to view the land in Bucks county, mentioned in the minutes of last meeting, and such others as they might believe proper as situations for the proposed Boarding School, reported that they have all, except even Biddle, been on the plantation called Langhorne Park, but having one or more other places which they propose to attend to, they are continued and desired to report to our next meeting." Eight more Friends being added to the committee.

At a meeting of the committee held 12th mo. 20th, in the evening. "The sub-committee laid before the committee at large a description of the several tracts of land which they have viewed, and the general sentiment being expressed in favor of the land being offered by James Gibbons, in Westtown township, Chester county, containing 595 acres, Humphrey Marshall, John Pierce, Thomas Fisher and Samuel Canby are named to treat with James for the purchase thereof, and to confirm a bargain with him, if the terms and title should be to them satisfactory; and if the contract be completed, it is agreed that the deed be made in trust to Jona. Evans, Jos. Sansom, Thos. Morris, Thos. Stewardson, John Field and Jno. Wistar."

At the following meeting, held 12th of 1st mo. 1795, "the committee appointed to bargain with James Gibbons for his plantation in Chester county, produced 'Articles of Agreement' indented, signed and sealed by him and his wife Elinor, dated 29th of last month; to perfect the bargain the committee continued with the addition of Henry Drinker, John Morton and Roger Dicks."

It was thought proper to state all the names of the committee who made the agreement with James Gibbons for the sale of his farm to the Westtown Committee, for reasons which will afterwards appear. In the History of Chester County, as prepared by Judge Futey and Gilbert Cope, of West Chester, there is some allusion to this farm, and the sale of it to the committee for the purpose of a Friends' Boarding School. James Gibbons, of whom they purchased, was the third James in regular descent who had owned this tract of land.

He was educated chiefly in his father's house by his parents; was a diligent student and became an accomplished scholar, linguist and mathematician. He was for some time Treasurer of Chester county, and was a representative of the county in the General Assembly for the three years immediately preceding the declaration of Independence. A member of the Society of Friends, and a non-combatant; he retired from all public service at the outbreak of the Revolutionary war; but in private pursuits he was a valuable and honored citizen. At his residence on his plantation, he opened a private school for instruction in the French, Latin and Greek languages, and several of the young men of the county, who afterwards became honorably distinguished, were among his pupils. When disputes arose among neighbors, they were generally referred to him for settlement, and in open quarrels he was the peace-maker of his township. His judgment and advice were rarely appealed from even when they involved rights of property.

His services as surveyor were in frequent requisition, and many of the deeds and wills executed in Chester county were prepared by him. About the year 1780, he removed to Philadelphia, where he opened a classical school on Pine street below Second, which was largely attended. But he soon grew weary of city life and returned to his ancestral home. He retained his property until 1795, when he sold it to the Yearly Meeting of Friends for the site of a Boarding School for the education and religious instruction of children of Friends. The cause of education was one in which he took a lively interest, and when the committee of the Yearly Meeting appointed to purchase a proper site for the school signified a preference for his property, he fixed in his own mind a price for it which was much less than its actual value. His intention was to encourage the scheme by a donation, and he preferred to do it in that way. He imagined that the members of the committee would understand and appreciate his motives in fixing the price of a parallelogram containing 600 acres of land at the low price of ten pounds per acre, Penna. currency. But in this he was disappointed. The chairman of the committee was an Englishman living in Philadelphia, a sharp, loquacious and successful man of business, who never lost an opportunity for a display of his business acumen. When James named to the committee the price which he proposed to accept for his plantation, the chairman, after a brief silence, remarked that the committee had been viewing another property in the county which he thought would suit them quite as well and perhaps a little better on some accounts, which could be obtained on more reasonable terms, 'but,' he added, 'if thou wilt sell at nine pounds per acre I would be willing to advise the committee to take thy land at that price.' James was indignant. He quickly replied: 'Why Friends, you deal like jockeys!' 'If you are not content with my offer our business is ended!' 'Quite content! Quite content!' the other members of the committee at once responded. They were as much mortified by the suggestion of their chairman as James was incensed by it. The deed was delivered on the 1st of April, 1795, but not until the committee had executed to him a covenant that the property should be used for the educational purposes for which he had sold it to the Yearly Meeting."

The incident above related is probably incorrect, perhaps only a legend in the family, as Friends are not in the habit of doing business through a chairman, and there was no Englishman on the purchasing committee, all being natives of this country.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Rise and Progress of Beaconism.

[The letter accompanying this article states, that it is intended "to be a brief and true statement of the radical defects of I. Cresswell's teaching, and the extent to which his views are permeating Society; hoping, that to some who are drifting with the current without much thought of the revolutionary influences at work, it might be as a word of caution."—Ed.]

Most readers of "The Friend" may be aware, that in 1835, when the desolating effects of Hicksism were so lamentably manifesting themselves, Isaac Cresswell, a minister of Manchester, England, published a work, entitled "A Beacon to the Society of Friends," intended, as he states, "to bring before the view of the Society some of the errors that led to such fatal results."

Though his object, as thus expressed, might have been a worthy one, yet the publication of his book made it evident to Friends, that while endeavoring to expose the errors which he had in view, he, like many others, under similar circumstances, had been led into the opposite extreme; even to the adoption and promulgation of sentiments no less at variance with the belief of the Society, as set forth by its authorized doctrinal writers, particularly in regard to the doctrine of universal Light; the immediate influence and perceptible teaching of the Holy Spirit, and the nature of true worship and ministry.

The dissemination of those erroneous views eventually claiming the attention of London Yearly Meeting, a committee was appointed for careful consideration of the subject, who, after much faithful, but ineffectual labor with the author, advised him to withdraw, for a time, from public ministry.

"This advice," as one of the committee records, "not being complied with, and the distance between Friends and Isaac Crewdson and his followers becoming greater and greater, as indicated by a variety of circumstances,—especially by certain devotional meetings, held by the dissentients, on First-day evenings, and conducted on principles of worship essentially different from Friends—the committee felt constrained to report to the Monthly Meeting of Manchester, the advice which they had given, and which had been disregarded. The Monthly Meeting, after long and painful discussion, came to a solid conclusion to confirm the advice of the committee. New overseers were appointed; the irregular meetings for worship, which the dissatisfied party had instituted, were discouraged, and as a result of the disciplinary proceedings, Isaac Crewdson and many others resigned their membership in the Society. These established separate meetings, but finding little to distinguish them from other communities of professing Christians, their meetings were soon discontinued, and most of them found a home in the Established Church, or with different dissenting bodies. No distinct body now survives to preserve a memorial of this secession."

Subsequently individuals still retaining their membership in London Yearly Meeting, holding some of the same views, and condemning as unscriptural the writings of Robert Barclay, and other early and faithful expositors of Christian Truth, as professed by Friends, have been instrumental in more widely spreading the defection.

Recently Robert Barclay, a descendant of the Apologist, and one who does not conceal his sympathy with Beaconite views, asserted in his "Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth," that "although the Beaconites did not preserve the same separate existence as the Hicksite Body, the views of Isaac Crewdson's followers have taken root in the Society of Friends in England and America."

The truth of this assertion no thoughtful observer of the course things have taken during the last few years, within the limits of most of the American Yearly Meetings, will be prepared to deny.

We find the same great distinguishing doctrines of Friends, the Universal Light, and the immediate influence and perceptible teaching of the Holy Spirit ignored or openly attacked; and their views respecting worship and the ministry are so far departed from, in theory and practice, that in some sections meetings have lost nearly all that would characterize them as Friends' meetings.

Beaconism has indeed "taken root in our land," and is bearing its legitimate fruits. The views of Isaac Crewdson and his school, accepted and urged by dissatisfied and restless members and ministers, are working their sad effects of revolution and disintegration; and unless the Society, baptized into Christ, and under his Divine leading, with clear sight and abounding love, and a wise administration of its Discipline, has strength enough to stay the tide of error, it can hardly be doubted that Beaconism, with principles and methods as much at variance with Friends on the one hand, as those of the Hicksites are on the other, and more misleading, because more specious, will ere long embrace a large portion of our members.

With these three distinct lines of religious belief and teaching apparent at the present day, among those claiming to be Friends, would it not be well in designating them to use such applications as may be just and discriminating? The term "Progressives," as sometimes applied to those of Beaconite proclivities, seems inappropriate, since that movement is clearly retrogressive in character, indicating a return to views and practices which Friends, from the rise of the Society, have uniformly rejected as incompatible with the spirituality of the gospel dispensation taught by our Lord and his apostles.

They who are convinced of the Christian principles and testimonies, so nobly and fearlessly defended by George Fox and his coadjutors, who were instruments in gathering the Society, will alone be entitled to the name of Friends; and as these remain true to their mission—as the "old banner" continues to be upheld by their loyal hands, He whom they acknowledge as their only Head, and who "with two can put ten thousand to flight," will still bless and use them to his praise; strong in the Lord, they will still be found successfully resisting the encroachments of both Ritualism and Infidelity, and as good soldiers of Christ, extending his kingdom of peace and righteousness in the earth.

G. W. C.

Selected.

HIDE AND SEEK.

ALICE CAREY.

As I sit and watch by the window pane,
The light in the sunset skies,
The pictures rise in my heart and brain,
As the stars do in the skies.

Among the rest, doth rise and pass
With the blue smoke curling o'er,
The house I was born in, with the grass
And roses round the door.

I see the well-sweep, rough and brown,
And I hear the creaking wheel
Of the bucket going up and down
On the mossy sides of the well.

I see the cows by the water side,—
Red Lily and Pink and Star,—
And the oxen with their horns so wide,
Close locked in playful war.

I see the field where the mowers stand
In the clover flowers, knee-deep;
And the one with his head upon his hand,
In the locust shade asleep.

I see beneath his shady brim,
The heavy eyelids sealed,
And the mowers stopping to look at him,
As they mow across the field.

I hear the blue-bird's 'twit-te-tweet!
And the robin's whistle blithe;
And then I see him spring to his feet,
And take up his shining scythe.

I see the barn with the doors swung out,
Still dark with its mildest streak,—
And the stacks and the bushes all about,
Where we played at Hide and Seek.

I see and count the rafters o'er,
Nearth which the swallow sails,
And the sheaves on the threshing floor,
And the threshers with theirails.

I hear the merry shout and laugh
Of the careless boys and girls;
As the windmill drops the golden chaff,
Like sunshine in their curls.

The shadow of the years that stand
'Twixt me and my childhood's day,—
I strip like a glove from off my hand
And am there with the rest at play.

Out there, half hid in its leafy screen,
I can see a rose-bud show,
And up in the hay-mow I catch the sheen
Of the darling head I seek.

Just where the whoop was smothered low,
I have seen the branches stir,
It is there that Margaret hides, I know,
And away I chase for her.

And now with curls that thro' so wide,
They shade his eyes like a brim,
Runs Dick for a safer place to hide,
And I turn and chase for him!

And rounding close by the jutting stack,
Where it hangs in a rustling sheet,
In spite of the body that presses back,
I espy two tell-tale feet!

Now all at once, with a reckless shout,
Alphonse from his covert springs,
And whizzes by with his elbows out,
Like a char of sturdy wings.

Then Charley leaps from the cattle-rack,
And spins at so wild a pace,
The grass seems fairly swimming back
As he shouts, "I am home! Base! Base!"

While modest Mary, shy as a nun,
Keeps close by the grape-vine wall,
And waits, and waits, till our game is done,
And never is found at all.

But suddenly at my window pane,
The lights grow dim and die,
And the pictures fade from the heart and brain
As the stars do from the sky.

The bundles slide from the threshing floor,
And the mill no longer whirls,
As I find my playmates now no more,
By their shining cheeks and curls.

I call them far and I call them wide,
From the prairie and over the sea,
"O why do you tarry, and where do you hide?
But they may not answer me.

God grant that when the sunset sky
Of my life shall cease to glow,
I may find them waiting me on high,
As I waited them below.

TO THE MARK.

Selected.

"Tis a sharp rugged hill that seems to mock
The climber's strength and skill, where rock on rock
Shoots sternly upward to the bending skies;
Yet right in front of these its steep steps arise,—
And thou must climb!

"Tis a thick throng of foes, afar and near;
All hail in front, a hating wall in rear;
Yet flee thou canst not, victory must be won
Ere fall the sh.dows of Time's setting sun;—
And thou must fight!

Gird on thine armor; face each weapon'd foe;
Deal with the Spirit's sword the deadly blow;
Forward, still forward, in the fight divine,
Slack not the warfare till the field be thine;
Win thou the crown!

"Tis a fair crown which never can grow old!
A crown of heaven's own everlasting gold!
Wages of service rendered here below,
Reward of battle for the conqueror's brow,
Win thou the crown!

—Horatius Bonar

For "The Friend,"

Satan as an Angel of Light—The Poor in Zion.

The apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Corinthians thus, in the present tense, writes: "Satan is himself transformed into an angel of light. Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works." While the foregoing testimony, written of that day for the instruction of this, cannot be gainsaid, its suggestiveness should incite us all to watch closely our steps, even to "watch unto prayer with all perseverance," lest the imposing and artfully gotten up resemblances by our transformed enemy, deceive through their also attractiveness and plausible, though deceiving and misleading, influences. Is it not well to bear in mind that the temptations of his wily foe are, with consummate skill, ever presented to us in the way most captivating, most conformable to our natural inclinations, and on the side least guarded, and upon which we are most vulnerable to his soothing blandishments.

Thus it is that Satan endeavors to beguile the leaders of the people, even ministers, as well as other prominent members; which, if he succeeds, causes more, through their influence, to be led into captivity to him. For in the exercise of the ministry, and other gifts bestowed for edification in the church, the great preparation is an humble, faithful, filial abiding in the Lord, our great Teacher; and when an inward, earnest waiting upon Him for wisdom and strength to do his will, which our sanctification. This the grand enemy endeavors to thwart through his specious subtilty. He artfully prompts to a love of eloquence; to an unholily desire of being thought well of, or coveting the praise of men; to lengthening out ministerial offerings until they become light-weighted, or more words than living substance. These are insidious snares, but ever tending to weakness. As he has well said, that "A few steps taken in the life and power of God are much safer and sweeter than a hasty progress in the empty forward spirit." "My time is not yet come," said the Saviour to some of old, "but our time is always ready." It is this waiting upon our Heavenly Teacher in his inward manifestations as our guide into all truth, and as the eye of the servant is to the hand of his master; that constitutes true discipleship to Him; and distinguishes between the believing disciple that "maketh not haste," and him that hastens to sacrifice without due praying for the anointing from on high. In this view the homely lines may not be wholly devoid of truth:

"How ready is that man to go
Whom God hath never sent;
How deliberate and with the we
The chosen instrument."

There is but one effectual antidote to Satan's insinuating, destructive, poisonous baits, and that lies in thorough subjection to, filial abiding upon, and close, patient abiding in the Eternal, even Him who giveth strength and power to his people, in whom, the Lord Jehovah, is everlasting strength. He it is, who is above all the power of the enemy and his deceiving transformations; who hath anointed, through his prophet, to those who bear his name, "When the enemy shall come like a flood, the spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." The Lord Jesus Christ, our blessed and holy Redeemer, the unconquered Captain of salvation, came into the world that he might destroy the works of the devil. And it is as we let the government of our hearts be upon his shoulders, and cleave to Him in fear, in faithfulness, and in deep humility, that we shall be enabled to overcome through the power of his Spirit who, as we are thus passive, worketh in us, both to will and to do of his good pleasure. How encouraging is the testimony bequeathed us by the apostle Paul: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

We believe that there are those up and down, whose faith is often closely proven through the presentations of our cruel enemy to draw them away from the waiting state—the deep inward exercise of soul, they are at times clothed with, both on their own account and that of the Church—into more conformity with some others; more creaturely zeal; at least more apprehensible if unsanctified, efforts to build up "the waste places," like to offering sacrifices, as did king Saul, before the prophet of the Lord came. But may these keep steadily on the watch, keep low, and inward, and patient, all the Lord's appointed time; breathing to Him with simple dependence upon his everlasting arm, with whom are the times and the seasons, and who is ever sufficient for his own work, that He will be to them "as a little sanctuary," whithersoever He may lead them. May these, as the poor in Zion, put on the whole armor of God, that they may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; and experience, through the Saviour's wonder-working power, the shield of their faith to be so re-anointed, as to be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. May they, in seasons of close trial, recall the encouraging record concerning the prophet Elisha and his servant (2 Kings vi, 15, 17), when the latter exclaimed, "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" And Elisha prayed, and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw, and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha. "There is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few." He can make of a little one a strong nation in his own way and time. Then, however poor and stripped, tempted and faith-tried any may feel, He can and will preserve through all, and do them good, as they abide in and cleave to Him with the whole heart.

As a true-hearted remnant are concerned to wait diligently upon the Lord, as the alone source of all true counsel and sufficiency, for their direction and strength, and for power from on high to guide their steps; as they are patient in tribulation, continuing instant in prayer, and faithful to Him in service or in suffering; being willing to abide all the turnings of his holy hand upon them, and resolved in no wise to limit the dear Master in what He would have them to do; if He who is omnipotent, and who delights to show himself strong on behalf of those who love, and fear, and serve Him, will make a way where there seems to be no way; and will cause such, as they follow on to know Him, to realize "his going forth to be prepared as the morning;" yea, even Jordan to be driven back for their rescue from the power of the enemy, and they shall sing his praise on the glorified banks of everlasting deliverance. Then also shall this song be sung: "The Lord hath founded Zion, and the poor of his people shall trust in it;" and "Let Israel rejoice in Him that made him; let the children of Zion be joyful in their King."

Anecdote of Big Chief.

Big Chief, the leading man among the Osage Indians, died on the 1st of 12th mo. last, from lockjaw, caused by an injury to one of his feet. He was a man of more than ordinary ability and always had the interest of his people at heart. The following anecdote is related of him by A. B. Meacham, editor of the Council Fire.

"Upon one occasion when the Osages were out on the annual buffalo hunt in what is now western Kansas, the Cheyennes made a visit to the Osages. The encampments were near each other, and while the Osages were playing the part of hosts, a runner arrived from the Pawnees, at the Osage camp, informing Big Chief that the Pawnees were coming to make him a visit. Big Chief received the Pawnee visitors with some trepidation, because he knew that they and the Cheyennes were enemies who always fought on coming together.

"As soon as the new visitors were in camp Big Chief called upon them. He ascertained that the Pawnees were a smaller party than the Cheyennes. Both were his guests and he determined that there should be no bloodshed. Day after day this noble red man labored for peace. He made presents to each and finally brought the two tribes into council. But both were suspicious, and when they were assembled the Cheyennes, discovering the weakness of the Pawnees, made demonstrations of hostile character. While the latter came in good faith, they were in peace prepared for war, and quicker than can be described the two parties separated and made ready for action. Big Chief saw that a fight was imminent. With that kind of heroism that belongs only to great men, he sprang between the two lines and throwing his arms aloft shouted, 'Peace, peace; if you will fight, shoot me first! I will not live to see my red brethren kill each other. Shoot me; for you shall not fight while I live!' Such was the power of this great man that neither party dared to begin. He reminded them that they were both his guests, and that if his voice was disregarded that his young men would speak for him—which meant that they would take the part of the weaker. No battle ensued, and the Cheyennes and Pawnees became friends through the efforts of Big Chief."

Religion and Insanity.—An idea prevails that because the delusions and freaks of the insane often take a religious turn, religion is to be accounted one of the causes of insanity; and that if there were less religion in the community, or if it were less earnest and emotional, there would be fewer lunatics. Some persons have said, apropos of the Guiteau case, that ministers should be careful how they teach a high view of inspiration, or preach on the story of Abraham, or inculcate the most solemn doctrines of the Church, for they may make their parishioners insane. In so far as this idea arises from attributing religious delusions to religion, it is simply foolish. The topics of a lunatic's wandering thoughts are not the cause of his aberration, and no one supposes they are except when religious delusions are in question. A man imagines he is a glass jar; no one calls the art of glassmaking the cause of the vagary. A woman is overcome by a diseased propensity to take goods from shop counters; no one thinks the shops must be closed. In delirium tremens the patient sees snakes; are snakes the cause of delirious tremens? Or would there be less of the disease if there were fewer reptiles? Insanity is an impairment of the physical condition and powers of the brain, and its causes must be sought either in original defects or in influences which have hindered normal brain action. The tendrils of the vine wind around the oak, but the oak has nothing to do with causing the vine's growth. So the wandering thoughts of the lunatic stray toward all sorts of subjects, but that is no indication that the subjects have produced the malady. The insane belief that one is Jesus Christ, or that he is inspired, or that he has committed the unpardonable sin, is not in any sense caused by the doctrine of the incarnation, or of inspiration, or of future punishment. The cause is physiological.—Tribune.

The Fakir's Answer.

It is related that in one of the countries of the East there lived a fakir or dervish, a man who lived in voluntary poverty and asceticism. Some of the fakirs of the East are simply fanatical and disgusting. But others are of a higher type; men of deep earnestness and thoughtfulness, who are really seeking God, and striving after the attainment of inward purity and perfection in a mistaken way. Such as this was the man we speak of. Giving himself to religious contemplation, he was exceedingly chary of words. As long as he could make himself understood by signs, nothing would induce him to open his lips; and he was highly esteemed for his piety, being generally called "the holy Dervish."

In the same town lived a rich man, famous for his lively social qualities, and his amiable ingenuity in finding amusement for his friends. One day he had a numerous company at his house. They freely enjoyed the pleasures he offered them, and then, as usual, looked out for some novelty to crown the entertainment.

"Come, let us see our old friend, the holy dervish," said the host: "I have three questions to put to him. Let us see how he will answer them."

The proposition was received with enthusiasm, and all the company set out gaily towards the hut of the poor fakir.

They found him quietly seated beside a freshly dug field. The leader of the party composed his laughing face, assumed an expression of profound humility, and addressed him thus: "Holy father, my soul is in anguish because of three deep and difficult questions which exercise it. Will you deign to come to my assistance, and help me with your wisdom to answer them?"

The dervish made a sign in the affirmative. "Well, then," said his visitor, "the first of these questions relates to God. They say that there is a God; but I cannot see Him, and no one can show Him to me. How, then, am I to believe that He exists?"

The dervish only answered by a sigh expressive of profound attention.

"My second question relates to Satan. We are taught that Satan is an angel of fire. If, then, he is fire himself, what has he to fear from the flames of hell?"

Another expressive and impressive sigh. "And now for my third question. It is written that all our actions are fixed and decreed by God, even before we commit them. How then can God call us into judgment for acts which do not depend upon our free will? How can we be accountable? Holy father, I implore you to answer me."

Another sigh. Then, suddenly seizing a sod of earth, the dervish threw it with all his force full in the face of his questioner.

Transported with rage at this unheard-of insult, the rich man instantly had the dervish seized, and the whole party appeared before the judge.

The plaintiff made his statement, and added the assault was a serious one, as the pain in his head from the blow he had received was almost unbearable.

The judge, turning toward the accused, asked what he had to say in his defence.

The dervish made a sign.

"Explain yourself intelligibly, if you please," said the judge, severely; "I will not put up with signs."

"Be it so," said the dervish. "I have only to say that this gentleman came to ask me three questions, and that I fully answered them all."

"Answered them! What! by throwing a sod of earth at my head! Oh! this dreadful pain. No one knows the pain I suffer!"

"Explain yourself further," said the judge to the dervish, impatiently.

"I will do so," said the dervish, with perfect calmness. "The gentleman asserts that there is no God, because he has never seen Him, and because no one can show Him to him. Will your excellency have the goodness to ask him to show me the pain he feels in his head. Not having seen it, I cannot believe that it exists."

The company smiled, and even the stern features of the judge relaxed a little.

"The gentleman also asked me how it is that Satan, who is an angel of fire, should have anything to fear from the flames of hell. Now, we all know that our first father was formed of the dust of the ground, and that we are composed of the same. Dust we are, and to dust shall we return. I am sure the gentleman will admit this. Then, if he is earth himself, what harm can a sod of earth do to him?"

"And now for my third answer," said the dervish, drawing himself up with dignity: "here it is. Since it was decreed that I should strike this gentleman with a sod of earth, why has he brought me before the judge?"

Here every one laughed, and it was generally agreed that the dervish had defended himself well with his adversary's own weapons.

"I admit," said the judge, "that your sod of earth contained these three answers. Your reply was ingenious, but rather too forcible. In future, holy father, you must answer the questions proposed in a different manner. Another time you might not escape as well as to-day."

Such is the Eastern story. It teaches a lesson as suitable for our Christian lands, as for the Mohammedan East. Plausible objections against Bible truths are easily raised but are in many cases capable of being answered by a simple appeal to the analogy of facts of daily experience! There are myriads above human comprehension connected with these; but he who will not believe he cannot comprehend, ought not to believe even his own existence, or a thousand facts connected with his own wondrous nature. How then can he expect to comprehend the nature and the ways of the self-subsisting infinite God, his Creator? He cannot comprehend; but the humble man will restfully believe, and be blessed in thus leaning upon God.

The child leans on its parent's breast
Leaves there its cares, and is at rest;
The bird sits singing by his nest,

And tells aloud
His trust in God, and so is blessed
'Neath every cloud.

He has no store, he sows no seed,
Yet sings aloud, and doth not heed;
By flowing stream, or grassy mead
He sings to shame
Men who forget, in fear of need,
A Father's name.

The heart that trusts, forever sings,
And feels as light as it had wings;
A well of peace within it springs;
Come good or ill.

Whate'er to-day, to-morrow brings,
It is his will.
—British Messenger.

For "The Friend."

In reading the enclosed [the extract from M. Capper, which follows], it seemed so fitting to follow the Editorial remarks on the Home Mission Report [London], I have copied it "The Friend." Well would it have been that Yearly Meeting if the warnings of the faithful watchmen and watchwomen, who divinely attended vision foresaw in measure the approaching dangers; had been heeded. And well will it be for us, if we of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting profit by their experience.

An Exercise of London Yearly Meeting, 18

Some tender cautions were given, with respect to those benevolent associations, in which members of our Society are now so conspicuous. There was a fear in some minds, even while they rejoiced in the spreading of knowledge, the distribution of the Scriptures, the instruction of the poor, lest a danger might secretly lurk in the pleasure received from eloquent speeches and flowing language at the public meetings of these associations especially lest our dear friends should there lose their relish for simplicity, and be gradually drawn from the love of silent waiting our meetings for worship; that waiting while in they may know Jesus to be in the midst teaching as man never taught; and by whom we have access to the Father. There was much worthy of observation in these remarks.—Mary Capper.

I just now found a black beetle which had been turned over on its back on a smooth surface. It seemed to be feeble, probably from a long struggle to right itself; still it put forth efforts to get right side up, without success. I held out to it a straw which it seized at once, turned itself over. It felt better, and felt better to see it released. I thus increased in some degree the sum of sentient happiness. My Father made the insects.—Walker.

Moderate Drinking.—In the days when everybody drank brandy, most persons of those called temperate, felt, at times, the exhilarating influence of intoxicating liquors. I think I never was so affected by liquor that strangers would notice its effect upon my walk and conversation." But I have been exhilarated by it, and prompted to conversation and conduct, that in my more thoughtful moments I would have eschewed. I learned by experience that the moderate drinker is not a safe man to trust with the management of affairs that require close thinking. No man after he has taken a glass of spirits will nature his thoughts so perfectly, nor look to results of his actions so carefully as he would have done without it. No one knows how any of the failures in business and of the unexpected defects in moral conduct are to be attributed to this cause.—J. B. Walker.

Historians versus War-Heroes.—Looking at the long roll of men in all ages who have devoted their lives to so ignoble a purpose [as the pursuit of war], we have been astonished at the conduct of historians who have selected one above all others as the heroes whose character and conduct most deserves to be recorded. For what are the current histories of the world but a tissue of licensed crimes perpetrated by military desperadoes? How much better would it have been for the world, their deeds had been remanded to that obscurity which they merited, and the noble deeds of worthy heroes had constituted the main substance of such histories?—Christian Index.

For "The Friend,"

Natural History, Science, &c.

The "Asia Rip."—B. Ayeridge, in the Episcopal Recorder, describes this as observed during a voyage on the steamer "Adriatic," from New York to New York. "When about half of Nantucket the ship was stopped, the landing taken, and a specimen of the bottom adhering to a lump of tallow, which had been in the bottom of the lead, was taken by the captain into the chart-room. When he came out I requested him to let me have this specimen (as he had done before) to examine under a microscope. He brought it out and said, 'Do you see that white sand with red specks?' Yes. 'Come in and I will show you the chart.' Then pointing to a small spot on the chart, he showed the word 'Asia Rip.' I said that the peculiarity of a rip in the bottom sea where there were twenty-four fathoms of water, was discovered by the captain of the steamer 'Asia,' and thence the name; I said, 'I was on the lookout for this rip, and when I saw it, stopped the ship half an hour sooner than I expected, for she had over her reckoning half an hour. We then landed and found twenty-four fathoms as on the chart, and 'white sand and red specks' as this little spot on the chart, and nowhere else. Hence the presumption that we are out there.'

We had then been running for a long distance by dead reckoning. Under the microscope these 'red specks' appeared to be water-worn agates. This rip must be caused by a projecting ledge of rocks arresting the tide and forcing this rip to the surface 144 feet above bottom, with sufficient force to make it evident among the waves."

The Formation of Vegetable Mould, through the Action of Worms. By Charles Darwin.—After a brief account of the physical and mental structure of the common earth-worm, we have a series of painstaking observations on the habits of the animal and the effects which it produces.

These worms burrow in the ground to a depth of rather more than three feet, and in very dry or very cold weather, to a depth of, perhaps, six feet. They accomplish this by pressing forward the anterior end of the body, attenuated to a mere thread, into the ground, and then, by a peculiar process, enlarging it so as to compress the ground. They also swallow some of the ground. By these means they make their way through even rocky soil and the mortar of ancient buildings. The earth is swallowed both for the purpose of tunneling their way and of extracting as food whatever of organic substance it may contain; but they always mingle with it a salivary secretion by which, in most cases, it becomes dark-colored or even black. The worm frequently opens a passage-way to the surface, so that its track into the earth is not a closed chamber. The earth which it swallows is always voided at the surface.

Our author found by careful observation, weight and measurement, that in many places these worms throw up on the surface of pasture or meadow lands, and especially in gardens and ploughed fields, an amount of black earth which gave an annual aggregate thickness of two-tenths of an inch. And, on each acre of land, more than ten tons of dry earth are annually brought to the surface.

Nature often works by agencies which seem at first view too trivial to require notice. The effect of the atmosphere in the decomposition of the most perfect marbles is imperceptible for a few years; but in a century the fine lines of sculpture are obliterated. The minute hillocks of earth which the earth-worm leaves on the surface, if but one or two-tenths of an inch in a year, become important results in one or a few centuries. Thus, if the tenth of an inch be brought up annually, it would, in a hundred and twenty years furnish a layer one foot in thickness over the surface of what we usually call soil or vegetable mould. Twelve inches is more than the average thickness of this black earth. It consists in part of decaying vegetable tissue, and the worms re-deposit much of it several times over. Yet this animal process does, beyond question, contribute largely and mainly to the formation of that layer of our fields from which all vegetation draws its chief support.

The earth-worm then makes the soil. It opens air-passages to facilitate the decomposition of the sub-soil and the sub-jacent rocks. It forms the aqueducts by which the rain-water is carried downward into the earth more rapidly than the porosity of the soil alone would allow it to enter. These insignificant creatures are, therefore, among the most important aids to agriculture.

There are some other effects to be ascribed to them which require long periods before they can be recognized. Thus, it has often been observed that fields which have been left in a rough and broken condition gradually assume a uniform and level surface. The worm-castings would naturally be in greater quantity in the lower ground, and that which is deposited on the higher portions is, when dry, in such a pulverulent condition as to be most readily moved to the lower levels by rain and air currents. And thus gradually the inequalities of surface disappear. Thus, also, the bricks and mortar and portions of walls, not too protuberant, of ancient buildings, allow the plough to pass over them without revealing the ruins over which the harvest is now reaped.

In England such fields have been accidentally discovered which are now known to have been the sites of ancient Roman villas. When suitable excavations have been made, pavements are discovered, but they show certain inequalities and subsidences which are attributed to the removal by worms of the underlying earth. Such settlements often occur in paved areas which continue still in use. The castings which worms continually bring up through the joints of the paving bricks are constantly swept away; but by their whole amount, they diminish the support on which the pavement first rested.

These facts are brought out by our author with such detail and exactness. He chose a subject which had no promise of interest, if it did not promise to be revealing. But he has surrounded it with real interest. We acknowledge ourselves under great obligations to him for giving prominence to one of the great, though slowly operating, agencies by which the earth has been fitted for giving sustenance to man.—J. R. Loomis in Christian Advocate.

When a man or woman comes to this pass, that they have nothing to rely upon but the Lord, then they will meet together to wait upon the Lord; and this was the first ground or motive of our setting up meetings, and I would to God that this was the use that every one would make of them that come to them.—S. Crisp.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 28, 1882.

The investigation into the causes of the recent railroad accident at Spuyten Duyvil, on the train bound from Albany to New York, has produced a statement from the conductor of the train that was wrecked, which, if true, is a humiliating commentary on the low standard of character which marks some of those moving in political circles.

The accident was caused by the improper stopping of the train; which, while standing on the track, was run into by a train following, causing loss of life and other injuries. The conductor thinks that some one of the passengers stopped the cars mischievously by pulling a rope which connected with the air-brakes. He said, "there was a party on the train who were singing, making jokes, and conducting themselves in a very disgraceful manner. They were passing around bottles of whisky, and the foundation of that accident was run. Among the passengers were many number of ex-senators, assemblymen and aldermen, and he could not deprive them of their bottles."

Without endorsing the accuracy of the conductor's statement, we refer to this subject to enforce the lesson, which we believe is greatly needed, that the people who elect the legislators and executive officers who administer the government, are in measure responsible for their conduct. It may well be doubted, whether a voter can, without violation of his duty, cast his ballot for any candidate for office, whose moral character or personal habits he has reason to believe are impure or degraded. Respectable men have often voted for persons to be their representatives in important positions before the community, because they were the selected candidates of the party to which they were attached; when, at the same time, they considered them unworthy of being admitted to social intercourse. In so doing, we believe they have not realized the responsibility which rests on all, to exercise their influence for the promotion in the world of righteousness and purity. If they put in power those who will, in all probability, be examples of immorality, intemperance, dishonesty, corruption, or injustice; they are themselves promoting these vices and evils.

The facility with which the nominations of candidates for office, are controlled by those who make a business of politics; renders it difficult for the ordinary citizen to do much in that early stage of the elective process. But if it is once well understood, that a large body of the voters will uncompromisingly refuse to assist in the election of any man, who is tainted with vice or corruption; then politicians will be compelled to select for their candidates men of such high character, that we will no longer be ashamed to own them as worthy representatives of a great people.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Secretary Frelinghuysen is advised from Paris that the bill introduced in the French Chambers on Seventh-day will result practically in the free admission of American salted meats. It is expected to become a law at an early date.

The total number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during 1881, was 116,363. Of this number there came from Germany, 248,323; England and Wales, 77,550; Ireland, 70,896; Scotland, 16,441; Dominion of Canada, 94,159; Norway, 19,667; Norway, 26,824; Sweden, 55,805; China, 20,628; all other countries, 86,575.

At the annual meeting of the Insurance Patrol, the report showed that the estimated loss by fires was $1,750,447.73, this exceeding that of 1880 by $461,419.43. The number of fires and alarms was 782, being 102 less than the previous year. The main causes of fire were explosions from oils, 112; gaslights and jets, 54; defective chimneys, &c., 48; and stores, 41; matches, 30; incendiary and supposed incendiary, 35; cotton and woollen mills, 41.

The present population of Chicago is estimated in that city at about 630,000, or 125,000 more than in 1880, when the last census was taken.

John Denver Post, a prominent example of the enormous growth of mail business in the West. During the last five years the expenses of the office have increased only one-half, while its receipts have nearly quadrupled. The money order receipts were over $2,600,000 last year, against $500,000 in 1879.

Enoch Pratt, a prominent capitalist of Baltimore, has contracted for the erection, at a cost of $225,000, of a fire-proof building in that city, capable of holding 200,000 volumes, for a free public library. The building is to be finished in the summer of 1883, and E. Pratt proposes to deed it to the city with an additional gift in money of $833,000, provided the city will create an annuity of $50,000 for its support. It is to be known as the "Pratt Free Library."

The Executive Committee of the National Board of Health, at a meeting in Washington recently, declared small pox epidemic in the United States, and ordered strict inspection of the several of the principal quarantine stations in the country, to determine whether the rules of the Board, approved by the President on the 14th of 11th mo. last, are being properly enforced.

There were 450 deaths in this city during the week ending First month, 1882, as compared with 390 for the previous week, and 360 for the corresponding week of last year; 77 deaths were caused by consumption of the lunges; 16 by diphtheria; 16 by heart disease; 54 by inflammation of the lungs, and 23 by small pox.

At the close of the 3d, 3d, 1014 1882; 4th, 1153; 4th, 1113; currency 6's, 130.

Cotton continues quiet, but prices were steady; sales of middlings are reported at 124 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white, 7 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. for home use.

Flour is quiet but firmer; sales of 2100 barrels, including Minnesota extras, at $6.37 1/2 a $6.50 for clear, and at $6.50 a $7 for straight; Penna. extra family at $6.20 a $6.50; western ditto at $6.75 a $7.15, and patents at $7.25 a $7.70. Rye flour is steady at $4.05 a $4.10.

Grain.—Wheat is quiet, but h. e. higher. Sales of 2600 bushels red, at $1.43 a $1.43 1/2. Rye is dull at 90 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is quiet but steady. Sales of 9000 bushels, including yellow at 71 cts.; white at 73 cts.; sail, mixed at 71 cts.; steamer, at 70 cts.; No. 3 at 69 cts., and rejected at 69 cts. Oats are quiet and steady. Sales of 8000 bushels, including white at 54 a 52 cts., and rejected and mixed at 48 1/2 a 49 cts.

Hay and Straw Markets.—For week ending 1st mo. 21st, 1882.—Loads of hay, 251; loads of straw, 54. Average price during the week: mixed, $1.20 a $1.20 1/2 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 a $1.20 per 100 pounds; Straw, 85 to 95 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were rather dull this week, but prices were unchanged; 3000 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 4 a 71 cts. and to quality.

Sheep were rather lower; 15,000 head sold at the different yards at 3 a 9 1/2 cts. per lb. and lambs at 4 1/2 a 71 cts., as to condition.

Hogs were in demand and prices were steady; 4500 head sold at the different yards at 5 a 10 cts. per pound, as to condition.

FOREIGN.—Henry Stafford Northeote, member of Parliament, who recently returned from America, addressing his constituency at Exeter, said he did not believe in the decrease of American competition in the food market. It was, he said, idle talk of the exhaustion of American lands. The supply of land for many years to come in the great Northwest will be boundless. Swedish Paris dispatches indicated that Gambetta's utterances at a recent meeting of the Committee on the bill for the revision of the Constitution, when he declared that should the Congress of the two houses go beyond the scheme for revision previously adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, would be the cause of a revolutionary position, requiring the intervention of the President of the Republic, has created a great sensation. His opponents consider the matter as conveying a distinct threat.

The Republique Francaise seeks to minimize the very bad impression created, by explaining that Gambetta's words meant that in the event of the Congress passing an illegal decree President Greys would, in accordance with his constitutional prerogative, refer it to the Chambers for reconsideration.

A panic has occurred in the Paris Bourse in consequence of the embarrassment of the Union Générale, which has been the subject of its affairs and allowed an examination of its books, showing that it owes a large sum to authorized brokers of the Bourse, but that still more are due it from dealings with the Petite Bourse. Financial establishments still make advances to the Union on security of stock certificates. Settlements of Paris dispatches indicated that Gambetta's utterances at a recent meeting of the Committee on the bill for the revision of the Constitution, when he declared that should the Congress of the two houses go beyond the scheme for revision previously adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, would be the cause of a revolutionary position, requiring the intervention of the President of the Republic, has created a great sensation. His opponents consider the matter as conveying a distinct threat.

The London Standard's correspondent at Paris says: "The panic has ruined thousands of families, but it is hoped that a powerful syndicate of financiers which has been formed to facilitate settlement will restore confidence."

A confidential report of Dr. Pazzi, of the French Red Cross Society, asserts that, notwithstanding M. Gambetta's statement that the deaths among the troops in Tunis only amount to 1000, they are nearer 30,000, but that the fact is concealed by the removal of invalids.

A despatch from Vienna, 20th, 1882, is published, showing that the rising in the Balkan peninsula commenced in Herzegovina, extending to the border districts of Dalmatia, Bosnia, Albania, and probably Montenegro. It has been determined to dispatch an army corps to crush the insurrection.

The totals of the revenue and expenditure are made to balance, both being 762,000,000 roubles. This fact the budget appears to be conjectural. Thus the extra ordinary revenue from the State railways is estimated at an exactly equal amount with the expenditure namely, 25,000,000 roubles. The ordinary revenue of the Empire, which is estimated at 654,000,000 roubles falls short of the ordinary expenditure by over 4,000,000 roubles.

Sturjakoff, the merchant who owns the steamer Len which aided in Prof. Nordenskiöld's expedition, at which is now stationed on the River Lena, has placed that vessel at the disposal of the searchers for Lieutenant De Long. The steamer will be utilized by explorers in the spring if the difficulties of journey beyond Yakutsk by sleigh during the winter prove insuperable. Intelligence from Yakutsk states that nine Americans, under Lieutenant Danenhower, had left that place. They are expected at Irkutsk at the end of the month. The search made by Engineer Melville for Lieutenant De Long and his comrades in an expedition from the mouth of the Lena has been fruitless although some of De Long's letters have been found abandoned camps, as well as the ship's log and various instruments. The places in which these were found have been indicated by the erection of cairns. Lieutenant Danenhower's party left Yakutsk on the 8th of 1st month.

Advices here mail, received at Lisbon, from Buen Ayres to 12th mo. 20th, have been received. It was reported that a revolution had broken out in Bolivia; and that ex-President Piorola, of Peru, had sailed for Europe. The attitude of the United States towards the affairs of Chili and Peru was viewed with dissatisfaction by all the South American Republics.

WANTED

A female Friend as teacher of the School for Indian children at Tunasassa. Also a young or middle aged Friend and his wife, to reside in the States north of the Ohio, and to be conducting the farm and other concerns under care of the Committee.

Persons who may feel drawn to engage in the above services, address—

Jos. S. Elkinton, 325 Pine St., Philadelphia.
John Sharpless, Chester, Delaware Co., Pa.
Ephraim Smith, 1110 Pine St., Philad.

WESTWON BOARDING SCHOOL.

NOTICE TO PARENTS AND OTHERS. In consequence of changes in the railroad arrangements, ALL PAC AGES to be forwarded to the School from No. 304 A St., must in future be there by HALF PAST TEN O'CLOCK on Sixth-day mornings, instead of by twelve o'clock as heretofore.

Renewed attention is requested to the printed rule of the Committee restricting the sending of cables to the pupils, the practice being, in almost all cases, not only unnecessary but positively injurious.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, Near Frankford, (Twenty third Ward), Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M.D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house on 12th & 1st mo. 4th, 1882, ELLWOOD COOPER to RACHEL WILES, both of Philadelphia, Pa.

DIED, on the 26th of 9th month, 1881, WILLIAM SMEDLEY, in the 78th year of his age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, for the Northern District.

—, in this city, on the 17th day of 12th mo. 1881, SENECA E. MALONE, in the 77th year of his age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, for the Northern District. His last illness was one of great suffering; which he bore with patience, and with Christian resignation.

—, at the residence of her son-in-law, John Day in Wellington Co., Ontario, on the 23rd of 12th mo. 1881, ELIZABETH, widow of Joseph Kiteley, and daughter of dead at Ellwood Co. of Pennsylvania, in the 78th year of her age, a member and elder of York Street Monthly Meeting of Friends, Canada. She adhered strictly to the principles of the Society of which she was a member, and deplored the manifest departures from its ancient principles and practices. The memory of the just is blessed.

WILLIAM H. PILE, PRINTER,
No. 422 Walnut Street.

THE FRIEND.

A RELIGIOUS AND LITERARY JOURNAL.

VOL. LV.

SEVENTH-DAY, SECOND MONTH 4, 1882.

NO. 26.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY.

Price, if paid in advance, $2.00 per annum; if not paid in advance $2.50; 10 cents extra is charged for postage on those sent by mail.

Communications to be addressed to
JOSEPH WALTON,
NO. 150 NORTH NINTH STREET.

Subscriptions and Payments received by
JOHN S. STOKES,
AT NO. 116 NORTH FOURTH STREET, UP STAIRS,
PHILADELPHIA.

For "The Friend."

Extracts from the Diary of Rebecca Dewees.

(Continued from page 193.)

1855. 5th mo. 20th. "Felt this evening, while endeavoring to turn the eye of the mind inward, that there was nothing in this world so much to be feared as a separation from the source of all good; nothing so much to be dreaded as the frown of Omnipotence; and longing desires were begotten in my soul that purity, that holiness, which alone acceptable in the divine sight.

31st. "When all thy mercies, oh my God,
My rising soul surveys,
Transported with the view I'm lost
In wonder, love, and praise.

Last night watered my couch with my tears, in humbling view of my own barren, fruitless condition; and the secret breathings of my soul were, that I might even be thoroughly searched, that every thing which worked abomination and made a lie, every thing that hindered my progress Zionward or retarded the work of sanctification, graciously and gently, might even be done away.

5th mo. 2nd. Often have I thought, when reflecting on the past, none had more abundant cause of gratitude to the Author of mercies and God of all comfort than myself. Even that period of my life is before me when I stood as it were upon the brink of a precipice, and was scarce able to discern one gleam of hope. He who saw meet to try me as to an artist's breadth, was pleased to pluck me as to a reed from the burning, and enable me once more to look towards his holy temple. May that which is within me bow in humble thankfulness for such unmerited mercy. And may I ever be permitted to destroy my conscience in that arm of power which has hitherto been my refuge and support. And oh! that strength might be afforded me so to walk that pure and perfect way, as in nowise to offend or grieve his good Spirit who hath so graciously dealt with my soul.

7th mo. 1st. "He that dwelleth in the secret places of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." What here in this fleeting, fluctuating scene, to be compared to this safe abiding, this humble abiding in the Divine protection.

7th. "My soul, wait thou only upon God, all my expectation is from Him; all the benefits which have ever been bestowed upon me from my cradle until this hour, all that I enjoy or yet hope for, is the gift of the all-bountiful Giver. Deserted of his quickening virtue and no living creature could be poorer, but animated and strengthened thereby, how light, how trivial are all the afflictions of this changing scene. Truly there is nothing that my soul desires in comparison of the favor of my Judge; nothing that it fears like the frown of his countenance. Only enable me, I pray thee, to walk before thee as in no wise to offend. Only be pleased, in thy unutterable mercy, to grant me pardon for the past and strength for the future. That I may even yet be found blameless and harmless before thee: thy child without rebuke in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation.

20th. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." What can be compared to this perfect peace, this confiding trust? O Lord God of Hosts, take from me what thou wilt, only be thou pleased to grant me this; only in thy adorable mercy remove far from me every thing that is offensive in thy holy, thy pure eyesight: "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin; then will I teach transgressors thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

23rd. "Zion shall be redeemed with judgment, and her converts with righteousness." Oh how prone is the human heart to err. How many are the washings, the purgings, the fiery dispensations that seem needful.

8th mo. 25th. "Boast not thyself of tomorrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth." What abundant evidence of the truth of this is everywhere to be seen and felt. And since we know neither the day nor the hour when the Son of man cometh, how urgent the necessity to have our lamps trimmed and our lights burning.

9th mo. 25th. "How much owest thou unto my Lord?" When most loaded with the choicest of gifts, are we not most prone to forget the giver? Strange propensity of the human heart while enjoying the gifts to become unmindful of the great Fountain and Source. Thus it is that He who knows the end from the beginning, oft sees meet to hide from us our bosom idols, that that which was designed a blessing may not prove to us a curse.

11th mo. 5th. "Oh for more clearness of spiritual vision! Oh for an eye truly anointed to see what the Lord does indeed require at my hands! That I may not be found a loiterer by the way, or like him who buried his Lord's talent in the earth, is often the secret breathing of my soul."

1856. 4th mo. 13th. "He that cometh unto God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of all them that diligently seek Him." How precious is this living faith! When the soul under a humiliating sense of its own vileness and unfitness, [can feel] that there is One who is mighty to save even to the uttermost; how comforting, how consoling!

18th. "A little secret breathing after help and strength from the alone unailing Fountain; a little secret wrestling for ability to do or to suffer.

5th mo. 27th. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits! Surely no living creature ever had more abundant cause for gratitude to the Author of mercies and God of comfort, than myself; helped and supported through various afflictions, blessed beyond all that I could have asked or thought, how shall I be sufficiently grateful? and may I not learn more confidently to trust in the Helper of the helpless who hath in adorable mercy even helped me hitherto?

7th mo. 3rd. "Felt the tribute of thanksgiving and praise for mercies past and present, but most of all for that unspeakable gift, without which all other gifts would be nought to me.

18th. "Whilst my hands were engaged in my temporal affairs, felt strong desires raised in my heart, that that refining, purifying work, once graciously begun, might even be perfected in us; even though great and sore trials might be seen needful by Him who afflicteth not willingly; if only we might not be cast out of his sight, nor his Holy Spirit taken from us.

9th mo. 18th. "The reply of the king to the poor afflicted widow has often been brought to my remembrance in these days of treading down and perplexity: 'If the Lord do not help thee, wherewith shall I help thee, &c. If the Lord doth not help us, truly in vain is the help of man; if He doth not arise to plead his own cause in the hearts of his rebellious and backslidden people, shall not we be as Sodom and Gomorrah; would that our eyes might be directed to Him, even as the eyes of servants look to their master, and as the eyes of a maid to the hand of her mistress, that haply our eyes might be opened to see, our ears to hear, and our hearts to understand, that one may even yet chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight."

26th. "Felt this morning like giving way to discouragement at the difficulty in the way of getting to meeting with my little babe; but having persevered, felt peaceful in the retrospect."

1857. "That I might experience preservation on every hand from the power of evil; that I might indeed be enabled to know and strengthened to do what is really required at my hands, has been the breathing of a heart that feels its own poverty and weakness."

3rd mo. "Though discouragements within and without abound; felt a little comforted in endeavoring to flee to the stronghold for refuge, and pouring forth my sorrows before the alone sure Helper.

4th mo. 27th. "Having been permitted to welcome the coming of another spring, the solemn inquiry often arises whether the day's work has been keeping pace with the day; and when I recollect that twelve springs have rolled away since that period of Divine favor in which I was ready to believe that nothing should ever be able to separate me from the love of God, through Christ Jesus my Lord, or to turn me aside from following Him, very humiliating reflections arise; that there should have been no growth in religious experience, no advancement in the strait and narrow way during a lapse of so many years, is indeed a most painful reflection. May it arouse me even yet to redoubled diligence; and may that mercy which has long waited to be gracious, bless my feeble efforts."

Though the humility and diffidence of our dear friend, led her in this last extract from her diary, as well as in other places, to speak of her own attainments in a very modest manner, yet the diary itself bears ample evidence that a "growth in religious experience," and an "advancement in the strait and narrow way" had marked her course through life. It has been refreshing and instructive, in preparing these extracts for publication, to observe her fervency of spirit, her living faith in God to whom she turned as her refuge in all times of trial, her concern to be found waiting on Him, and her desire to be faithful in the performance of all that was required of her.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend,"

Westtown Boarding School.

(Continued from page 195.)

The four Friends who made the agreement with James Gibbons for the sale of his property for the purpose of a Friends' Boarding School to be under the care of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, were Jno. Pierce of Thornbury, Delaware Co., Pa., born 4th mo. 28th, 1756, son of Caleb and Ann Pierce, an uncle of James Enlen; Samuel Canby of Wilnington, Del., born 8th mo. 6th, 1751; Humphrey Marshall, of Marshallton, Chester Co., born 10th mo. 10th, 1722.

Thos. Fisher, the records of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting state, was born 3d mo. 6th, 1741. He was the son of Joshua and Sarah (Rowland) Fisher. To perfect the bargain, Henry Drinker, John Morton and Roger Dicks were added to the committee 1st mo. 12th, 1795, but not until after the former committee had reported an agreement with J. G.

At an adjourned meeting held on the evening of the above named day, steps were taken for the erection of a saw-mill, and to "improve the cleared land," and Joshua E. Pusey, Owen Biddle and six others, were appointed to attend to both concerns. "And as some repairs to the present mansion house and barn are immediately needful, they are at liberty to have them done in the most economical way, so as to answer the purpose."

"It being desirable that the committee at large should take an opportunity of viewing the farm now agreed for, it is proposed that as many as can will attend there at 10 o'clock in the morning of the 11th day of next month; being the day following the youth's meeting at Concord."

"A very considerable expense being now incurred, it becomes necessary to procure money for its reputable discharge, and for the prosecution of still further work before us, it is therefore recommended that the Friends appointed will attend to the procuring subscriptions for the purpose, and that the committee generally in all the Quarters will consider themselves interested in this particular."

At a meeting of the committee held 23d of 3d mo. 1795, Thos. Stewardson, Benj. Sweet, John Drinker and Owen Biddle, were desired to attend at James Gibbons' on the first of next month, in order to get the deed executed; also to keep in mind a declaration of trust, which they have in charge to prepare. They are also to take with them bonds for the payment of the whole purchase-money.

4th mo. 15th. "It being represented that the creek which passeth through the farm runs off in a small degree upon the lands of Robert Green and Wm. Ashbridge, the surrender of their right to which they may suppose of some value to them, the committee last above mentioned, (viz., the committee to repair the mansion, &c.) are desired also to attend to this subject and are authorized, if they find it needful, to refer any differences which may happen in opinion between them and the said Green and Ashbridge, or either of them, to the judgment of suitable arbitrators."

At the next meeting, held 5th mo. 22d, it was reported: "A satisfactory settlement hath been made with Robert Green respecting his right to the water of Chester Creek, running off our farm in Westtown township upon part of his land, and Josiah Bunting and Samuel Canby have paid him six pounds for his surrender thereof, according to the award of Thos. Purnell and Abraham Sharpless, now produced, together with his receipt in full for that sum. It is expected that a deed for his right to that part of the creek above-mentioned is in forwardness, and will ere long be executed by Robt. Green. Wm. Ashbridge being lately returned from Ireland, it is intended to promote a like settlement with him for a claim he hath of a similar nature."

The grist and saw-mill at Milltown, on the West Chester road, was then the property of the Ashbridge family, perhaps solely belonging to William.

The early settlement of these water-rights by arbitration exhibit the pacific disposition of Friends, as well as the soundness of their judgment; as such privileges, when unsettled, are a fruitful source of litigation as well as unpleasant feelings on both sides.

"In order for the accommodation of such of the members of this committee when at the farm on business, Henry Drinker and Thos. Morris are desired to provide two beds, bedsteads and bedding and two mattresses at the expense of the general fund." Henry Drinker informs the committee, that by a letter lately received from our friend John Elliott of London, he, from a desire to promote the Institution under our care, hath authorized Henry to draw upon him for £100 sterling, to be applied for its benefit, and that he is about to draw a bill of exchange for the above amount, having sold it for 175 pounds currency."

Josiah Bunting, Owen Biddle and Samuel Canby have entered into an agreement under articles with Silas Green, "to cut out of the woods such timber as shall be requisite for a saw-mill; frame and finish the millwright-work in a masterly workmanlike manner, on terms therein mentioned. Joseph Larkin hath also been agreed with to erect a mill-dam and dig a race, as stipulated in writing, for the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds."

This mill-dam and mill were located north west of Walnut Hill, and not far from the northern boundary of the farm, though south of Chester Creek; some traces of the race and dam being yet discernible.

At a meeting of the Boarding School Committee at the farm, 17th of 8th month, 1795: Present, John Shoemaker, Owen Biddle, John Wistar, Jonathan Evans and eight others. "Viewed the eminence north of the old mansion, remarkable for the fine prospect it affords. Its situation, aspect for a garden and general properties rendering it a desirable spot for the buildings to accommodate managers, teachers and pupils; in which sentiment there appears a general uniting. In the afternoon viewed the dam and race; the latter, the undertaker thinks, may be finished with eight days; respecting the former the late heavy rains evincing a defect in the plan its construction, a remedy therefor claims attention."

18th of the month. The following minute is interesting as being the first allusion to the women Friends meeting with men Friends care-takers of the institution:

"The committee of women Friends appointed by their Yearly Meeting to unite with us in this service, it is agreed should be requested to procure, as early as they conveniently can, two good feather beds, bolsters and pillows, and two good hair mattresses with bolsters and pillows, together with the necessary covering, for the accommodation of such of the committee, men or women, who in attending to the duties of their appointment may be occasionally at this place. Any order that our said women Friends may more particularly informed and better prepared to judge of such other services as may properly fall on them by visiting the farm &c., it is further desired they may attend the committee of men previous to our next Yearly Meeting." No names of women Friends appear upon the minutes.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Superfluities of our Houses.

But few, perhaps, would, theoretically at least, call in question the sage testimony John Woolman: "The superfluities of our own houses are against us." While at the same time it may be, as in "The love of the world detected,"

"Each thinks his neighbor makes too free,

Yet likes a slice as well as he."

If excess in these matters called forth such a cautionary precept in the time in which Woolman lived, what would this single-eyed servant think and write of our age when so increased facilities for obtaining, with so increased liberties in indulging, mark the epoch? When practical heed to the preaching of the cross and of self-denial is more persistently turned from; and when the sincere enquiring mind is greatly conficted, if stumbled; and as an unavoidable sequent weakness of hand and dimness of spirit vision to them who set the example. Moreover, also, the vanity of the heart, the seditions of the world's spirit, and general injury to the mind of our beloved youth, are fostered to an extent scarcely to be appreciated.

These superfluities, of whatever description and under whatever plausible pretexts used

'are against us' in that they go to prove a shaking hands with the spirit of the world, coupled, it is to be feared, with the desire to reconcile the narrow with the broad way—in their nature ever discordant—and instead of feeling and living as "strangers and pilgrims" here unto the better country, such find the world rather an agreeable place of sojourn, and even capable of producing pleasant and grateful fruits to their refined tastes. But what complicity had the dear Master and High Priests of our profession with these ungodly customs or delights of the unrenowned world? Though Lord of all, He had not there to lay his head. He was the great Pattern of self-denial; who, while He regarded the useful, condemned the vain and carnal. He came into the world to set us an example that we should follow his steps. And can any one suppose that He, who wore the crown of thorns for our sakes, ever intended that his followers should surround themselves with garlands of luxury and superfluity?

Some may be plain and simple and keep in good degree of moderation as respects their dress; but accompany them to their houses, and how will their self-gratification rather than their self-denial be manifested! Mark the nicety, the softness, the superabundance, the richness and even luxury of their dwellings. Reminding of the poetical lines:

"What contradiction—grave the dame and sire—
—congeals their dwelling, dimple their attire!
Their children nodding to the place they dwell,
In London fashions, Paris manners, swell—
While parents scarcely wish to set them free—
For what they won't restrain they love to see."

